But there is a point in Paul's argument I want to look at for the sake of some who claim, that a greater and a more glorious reward awaits those who have believed since Christ came into the world. The apostle says, "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Gal. iv. 4. Is there any distinction here, between those that were under the law, and those that were not? They both receive the adoption of sons. Redemption is the same for one as for the other. If there is a distinction it is without a difference. Again Rom. iv. 16. "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace to the end, that the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; (without the law) who is the father of us all." Is there not a perfect equality, an even plane! all under grace. There under the law come in under grace just the same as those who were never under it. "That it might be by grace," covers the whole ground. One more reference upon this head. See Heb. vi. 17. "Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise, the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." We see the strong consolation is derived from the oath, which confirmed the promise made to Abraham in which Jew and Gentile alike are both interested. So far we have only touched upon bottom facts. The simplest intellect can understand these things if they are honest. A few there are who claim that Jesus is heir of all things. This is perfectly correct when we have a proper conception of what constitutes the all things he is heir to. But in the minds of these few, all things with them means the whole universe of God. I think the apostle fixes the limit of all things in his letter to the Hebrews ii. 8. "He left nothing that is not put under him." Why was it that Paul said this? He was quoting from the eighth Psalm, and the "all things" referred to embrace the limit of the whole earth and nothing more.

Try hard as they may, they can make nothing more out of it. What would be the use of telling mankind about something they know nothing about? What do they know about the stars or their occupants? The earth may be a better place to enjoy everlasting life in than any other sphere. More especially as we know what a beautiful earth it is to be when the curse is removed. I must confess I have no longings to be absent from here. I should feel lost anywhere else. I know Jesus is coming again; yes to take up his abode here in Mount Zion. "Beautiful for situation is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King. For the Lord hath chosen Zion for his dwelling place; here will I rest forever for I have desired it. And the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, before his ancients gloriously. And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Ayo, my apostles, who have followed me in my temptations, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, shall also sit upon thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Thou hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth. For he must reign until he hath put all enemies under his feet. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all."

It is pretty clear where the Son is to reign, and what the all things are that are put under him. There is nothing more promised to the Son (that is Scripturally speaking) than the earth for a possession. "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Psa. ii. 8. This promise covers the whole groundwork of all that is taught concerning the inheritance of Christ and the saints. It is true we read of heavenly places both in the Old and New Testaments. But does it ever signify anything more than exalted stations. For instance, the principalities and powers in heavenly places, conveys a very clear idea of what is meant. See Eph. iii. 10. Are not the powers referred to, simply the powers that ruled in Paul's day. Remove these powers, and substitute Christ and the saints; what then? Why you have them in the heavenly places. We read that Christ is at God's right hand in the heavenly place. It surely does not signify that any one else is to ever occupy such an exalted position. And what is this heavenly place other than the most exalted station? It is the most glorious seat of honor, and Jesus alone has been invited to a seat there for a time. It is his Father's throne, and Jesus in his only begotten Son. His own throne will be upon earth. It is his by right of inheritance, and when he comes to occupy it, it will be the throne of the kingdom of heaven.

We get an idea of the meaning of heaven in Gen. i. 8. God called the firmament heaven. This, we understood, was the space above the earth. We read in Daniel, the heavens do rule. We understand this to be the overruling power of God in the affairs of men, developed through the angels of his power. Again the earth helped the woman. Of course this is highly figurative language, but if it indicates anything, it shows a distinction in the powers ruling upon the earth, which might be designated as heavenly and earthly. Again, Moses makes use of the term heaven, which clearly indicates he is addressing two distinctive classes, the rulers and the ruled. Deut. xxxii. 1: "Give ear, O, ye heavens, and I will speak, and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth."

From what I have deduced from the Scriptures, we learn, in regard to the term heaven, or heavenlies, that it signifies the ruling powers in the high places. It never means that a person must be taken up into some undefined region, and there remain invisible rulers over the destiny of this world or any other. The heavenly places in the world to come will be filled by Jesus and the saints, just as visible and tangible as was Jesus after he rose from the dead. He was seen by mortal eyes, the angels have been seen by mortal eyes, and it does not follow because they withdrew or ceased to be seen, that Jesus or the saints will be invisible to mortal eyes. I do not say the power to do so will not exist with them, and may be exercised, but it does not follow that that will be the order of things. Jesus will have a table in his palace, and the twelve apostles have been especially invited to a seat at it. Communication between heaven and earth will be established. Then the heavens will be open, and the angels of God will ascend and descend upon the Son of man. The Eden condition will be re-established. The nations will then be joined to the Lord and become his people. And the Lord of hosts (Jesus) shall reign in Mount Zion before his ancients gloriously. Come Lord Jesus, come quickly. JOHN GOODLIFFE.

None Liveth to Himself.

God has written on the flower
That sweetens the air, upon the breeze
That rocks the flower upon its stem,
Upon the rain-drops that swell the mighty river, upon the dew-drops that refresh the smallest spray of moss that rears its head in the desert, upon the ocean that rocks every mammoth in its channel, upon every downiest shell that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, as well as upon the mighty sun which warms and cherishes the millions of creatures that live in his light—upon all he has written, "None of us liveth to himself."

SOME STRIKING WITNESSES FOR CHRISTIAN TRUTH.

A child, instructed in a Sabbath School, on being asked by the teacher if he could mention a place where God is not, gave the following striking and unexpected reply: "Not in the thoughts of the wicked." "God is not in all their thoughts." "He that believeth not is condemned already," John iii. 18.

These solemn and significant words speak of condemnation in the present, and imply a terrible retribution hereafter. What a lookout for the unbeliever! "Sowing the wind, reaping the whirlwind," presents to us a picture too awful for contemplation. If so, what must the realization be? The unbeliever is "without God and without hope" in the great future.

From Jewish history we may have some rays of light, to remove the dark shadows of infidelity, which are spreading over the land its noxious pestilence, and bringing with it such a sad calamity to our churches, families, and the social fabric. If we refer to Matt. xxvii. 3–8, we read, "And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in." In Dr. Wilde's narrative on Palestine and Egypt, published in the year 1844, he gives a deeply interesting account of his journey to Jerusalem, also of his visiting the Aceldama—the field of blood, the potter's field. He contrived to secure several skulls, which he found there, and brought them to England to have them examined by Dr. Owen, who declared them to belong to the Caucasian and Mongolian tribes. Not a Jewish skull could be found among them. The cemetery is a silent witness for the truth of God's inspired Word; and stands forth a living record of the fulfilment of prophetic writings, and administers a stern reproof to the prevailing scepticism of the age. During eighteen centuries, this place of sepulchre has been set apart exclusively for the burial of strangers. "The Scriptures cannot be broken" by all the subtlety and arguments brought to bear against them. This field of blood still retains its name, and is so called in every language, and by every people, within or about Jerusalem—Aceldama. Dr. Wilde adds that it is not far from the stream of Gihon. At the period of his visit, there were still the marks of old remains of bricks and pottery ware in the adjoining ravine; a place always likely to be used for their manufacture, as it contains the clay suited for such purpose, and was in the vicinity of a rivulet. It is in itself a wonderful proof of divine prophecy fulfilled to the very letter.

Next we have to look to a remarkable prophecy concerning the Eastern, or Golden Gate of the city of Jerusalem. In the forty-fourth chapter of Ezekiel, 1–3, we read: "Then he brought me back the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary which looketh toward the east; and it was shut. Then said the Lord unto me; This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut. It is for the prince, he shall sit in it to eat bread before the Lord; he shall enter by the way of the porch." Dr. Wilde remarks, "May not this entry of the Lord through the gate have been fulfilled when our Lord came from Bethphage, which is eastward of the city, and made that triumphant entry when the people cast their garments in the way and acknowledged him as a Prince and King, crying, 'Hosanna to the Son of David!'" In the forty-third chapter, and 4th verse, there is another reference made to the same fact: "And the glory of the Lord came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is towards the east." This, so far as we can interpret, alludes to the Messiah's second coming, when his feet shall stand in that day on the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, opposite to the gate. Tradition states it to be the Golden Gate, and from this gate it is that, an inspired writer records, that the waters are to issue out toward the east country, and go down into the desert and sea; evidently a picture of the flowing of the water of life from the river that "maketh glad the city of God," to bring healing and salvation to the people. In the fortieth chapter of Ezekiel, and 6th verse, the Eastern Gate is also spoken of, and described with much precision and accuracy. In Dr. Wilde's narrative, he says: "The upper part of this gateway consists of a double arch, with part of the capital and pillars; but all the rest is built up in the wall, and guarded with the greatest care by the Muslims; not only because it is the outer wall of the mosque, but because they have a tradition that through this gate the Christians and Jews are one day to enter in, and retake Jerusalem. It can plainly be distinguished from Mount Olivet. The ornaments exhibited on the gate are of undoubted Hebrew origin." The Jews are not allowed to come near the gate, without the visit of severe punishment.

We will now turn to the eleventh chapter of the Book of Deuteronomy, verses 13–15: "The rain . . . in his due season" was promised continually, solely on the obedience of the Israelites to the laws of God. In the third chapter of the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah, and 3rd verse, we further read, that "the showers have been withholden, and there hath been no latter rain." In the fifth chapter, 24th verse, there is another reference to it: "Neither say they in their heart, Let us now fear the Lord our God, that giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in his season." It is a remarkable fact how minutely God's threats of withholding the showers of rain have been verified. In an interesting paper written on the Holy Land, we have the testimony of Mr. Lowthian, a gentleman from the north of England, who, under some peculiar religious impressions, proceeded to Palestine with the view of renting a farm, and cultivating it after the English fashion, and teaching the natives to do the same. His experience was that there was a deficiency of seasonable rain, which rendered cultivation precarious, and high cultivation impracticable. The inference drawn therefrom is, that in consequence of the final great disobedience of the house of Israel, the latter rain has been withholden, and thus the soil, although rich and capable of being fertilized by timely rains is left comparatively unproductive. There is, hence, a deficiency of the products, not only of tillage, but of pasturage. How completely have God's judgments been executed upon this devoted land.

We have next to turn to the third chapter of the Book of the Prophet Micah, 12th verse: "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest." How literally this prophecy has been fulfilled has been attested by numerous writers on the condition of Palestine, and the city of Jerusalem. The heaps of rubbish are said to be fifteen feet deep before the solid work of ancient Jerusalem is reached.

In one of the "Eastham Series" of Book Tracts, No. 32, there is a most interesting account given of Solomon's quarry, from which the huge stones were prepared for the building of the temple. The entrance—through a large cave—to it, lies at the bottom of a perpendicular rock or cliff. The city wall and streets of Jerusalem were over it. It is a most known cave as spacious as an immense church, and from this, passage after passage went in different directions. This wonderful place was once a huge, massive quarry; it is three thousand years since it was worked. On the ground were lying stones cut from the rock, but never removed, because of some flaw. There they lie, just as they were left three thousand years ago. The marks of the workmen's tools—the axe, and the hammer, and the chisel—are visible. On the sides of the quarry are here and there little niches roughly cut out in the rock, for the workmen's lamps to stand in. Even the black smoke from the oil lamps of the workmen, which blackened the niches where they were placed, is as plainly to be seen as when the lamps were removed. Each stone was to be exactly prepared for its place in the magnificent temple. This great sight corroborates the fact that a clue has been found by the discovery of this quarry, for the building of the temple, affording as it did greater facilities for the removal of the large blocks of stone from the proximity of the quarry to the city of Jerusalem.

In the first chapter of the Book of Exodus, 11th verse, we read: "Therefore they did set over them taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Raamses." In the year 1883, there was a deeply interesting narrative in the Congregationalist (p. 845), of the discovery of Pithom, or Succoth, by the Egyptian Exploration Society; the account was written by the late Sir Erasmus Wilson (the President). The mound at Succoth, where the Israelites first camped on leaving Egypt, was first discovered by Mr. Naville, an eminent Egyptologist, at a station called Ramesse. Ramses was the new king over Egypt which "knew not Joseph." On excavation, a tablet was found, on which was written a long paragraph by Rameses the Second. On the 7th of February, Mr. Naville found a statue of a standing man: his title was—"The Chief of the Storehouse," also a title of a magistrate, the good Recorder of Pi-tum, or Pithom; and its civil name, Succoth. And so the site of the first camp of the Israelites, or the route of the exodus, is accurately fixed. Exodus xii. 37. The builder of Pithom was Rameses the Oppressor. In six weeks the city was laid bare; the temple wholly excavated. The wall of the city was twenty-two feet thick, the extent was ten acres; bricks large and well-made were lying about, some with straw, others not. The place was full of large, square pits. There were no doors to the rooms: one room was placed above another; the upper room was the dwelling-place, the lower was a granary for the corn, for stores of grain or treasures. Mr. Poole says: "I have not only walked within the very rooms which the Israelites built, but I have slept a night where they slept, when Moses led them out of the land of Egypt." The granaries of Pithom, or Succoth, stand alone, apart from all the other buildings of the Pharaoh's. Surely there is enough in all this minute statement and discovery to prove the truth and authenticity of Bible history, and confound the awful sinfulness of ungodly men? With the fearful spread and progress of infidelity, such proof and facts, which are now brought to light by scientific research should lead to solemn reflection and sober judgment, to check the tide of scepticism abroad.

In a small book, whose title is "Stone Witnesses; or, What some old stones say about the Bible," published by Messrs. Morgan & Scott (price 6d.), there is to be found at page 18 a most deeply interesting account of Joseph, who was the king's prime minister. "We choose Sakkara, one of the large pyramids, the tomb of Pharaoh Apophis. By its side is the tomb of a prince, whose name and titles are in hieroglyphic writing. The name is 'Eliuph,' and from his many titles we choose two,—Director of the king's granaries,' and the other is an Egyptian title—'Abrech,' this signifies a sort of viceroy in high office; he was something approaching to our Lord Mayor, and, like him, was distinguished by a chain of office, and a signet ring. Pharaoh Apophis reigned in Egypt in Joseph's time, and if we turn to our old book, Genesis xlii., and read the history of Joseph, we find how—because the Lord was with him—he rose from the degraded position of dungeon-slave to the highest point of honor in the land of Egypt; was made director of the royal granaries; rode in the king's second chariot, attired in his state robes of silk, with his chain of gold about his neck, the signet ring on his finger, and before whom the royal herald cried 'Abrech,' to announce his approach. The term, or name 'Eliuph' was an indication of the identity, it means 'to save;' the name given to Joseph was 'Zaphnath-paaneah,' a word like 'Abrech,' which is purely Egyptian, and means 'Savior of the age.'" —Frederick E. Garvin, in Jewish Herald.

SOME specimen numbers of a paper entitled the Primitive Catholic have come to hand. The paper is edited by E. H. Walsh, an ex-Trappist Monk. In this journal the abominations of Romanism are handled with a truthful and unsparing vigor. Like C. Chiniquy he shows that Romanism is, politically, socially, and ecclesiastically, the master-piece of Satan; just what the Revelator described her as being prophetically, Rev. xviii. 2.

THE condition of the Emperor Frederick of Germany is reported worse, as symptoms of bronchitis and attendant fever have increased. As the prolongation of peace in Europe seems to depend, to a considerable extent, on the life of this newly crowned monarch, the question of life and death with him becomes one of importance to all the world at this crisis of its history. Spring has come, and now will Russia make some movement toward the consummation of her long cherished designs? It is clearly discerned that a Russian invasion of Bulgaria would be only a preliminary step toward the capture of Constantinople. A pretext for the invasion of Turkey and the overthrow of the Ottoman power is all that is sought for by the great Northern Power in meddling with the affairs of Bulgaria. Austria at present seems to block the way, but the Czar may conclude to take all risks. God rules, and out of all the confusion and political entanglements will finally evolve his own glorious plan.

1. Three from J. C. Welcome, Yarmouth, Me., entitled respectively, "The Rich Man and Lazarus," "The Evidence of a Future Life," and "Everlasting Punishment." These are tracts varying from eight to sixteen pages each, very well worthy of perusal on the subject matter discussed.

2. Two pamphlets, constituting numbers 18 and 19 of the Anti-Infidel Library, a monthly publication issued by H. L. Hastings, Boston, Mass. No. 18 is entitled, "The Wonderful Law," and No. 19 bears title, "The Separated Nation." These are very interesting pamphlets, containing over 110 pages each; price 20 cents. No better investment can be made than to take this serial, as its cost is only $1 a year. Taken altogether the nineteen numbers issued leave infidelity with scarcely a fig-leaf apron to hide its naked deformities.

3. A pamphlet from C. H. Jones, written by Edwin R. Graham, entitled, The "Ancient of Days," or the Pyramid of Jeezeh, containing 72 pages. Contains a good condensed view of the subject of its title. Price 25 cents.

THE GLORIFIED AND THE SAVED.

To wear a crown of glory, as one of the "priestly priesthood," is one thing; and to be merely saved, is a very distinct and different matter. It has been the common and prevalent opinion that the highest good or hope proffered in the gospel system, is for human beings to be saved from a common guilt and ruin on the one hand, and on the other, to enter upon a common enjoyment of blessedness in the future heavenly life. To "sit with Christ in his throne" is a special preferment, an exaltation, the "prize of the high calling," and "of the heavenly calling," far beyond the blessedness of being merely saved so as to enjoy the boon of a future endless existence. Without doing more at this time than to suggest these distinctions to our readers, so far as presenting our own conclusions from Scripture teaching is concerned, we will at once proceed to present some testimony appropriate from the comments of Jamieson, Fausset & Brown on 1 Cor. vi. 2. In speaking on this particular passage they say: "There is a distinction drawn by able expositors between the saints who judge or rule, and the world which is ruled by them; as there is between the elected—Matt. xx. 23—twelve apostles who sit on thrones judging, and the twelve tribes of Israel that are judged by them. To reign, and to be saved, are not necessarily synonymous. As Jehovah employed angels to carry the law into effect when he descended on Sinai to establish his throne in Israel, so at his coming the saints shall administer the kingdom for and under him. The nations of the earth, and Israel the foremost, in the flesh, shall, in this view, be the subjects of the rule of the Lord and his saints in glorified bodies. The mistake of the Chiliasts was, they took the merely carnal view, restricting the kingdom to the terrestrial part. This part shall have place with the accession of spiritual blessings such as Christ's presence must produce. Besides this earthly glory, there shall be the heavenly glory of the saints reigning in transfigured bodies, and holding such blessed intercourse with mortal men as angels had with men of old, and as Christ, Moses, and Elias, in glory had with Peter, James and John, in the flesh at the transfiguration. 2 Tim. ii. 12; 2 Pet. i. 16–18."

Many of our dear Advent friends would see far less difficulty in the fulfilment of prophecy regarding the national restoration of Judah and Israel if they noted the difference there is in forfeiting royalties and forfeiting salvation. It is the "kingdom" the "princely priesthood" that has been taken from Israel and given to the Church of the living God. Compare Ex. xix. 4–6 with Matt. xxi. 43; 1 Peter ii. 5–9; Rev. iii. 21; Rev. v. 10. Salvation is glorious, but the crown is the prize. Phil. iii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8.

THE JEWS AND PALESTINE.

The fulfilment of prophecy has far more to do with Judah, Israel, Jerusalem and Palestine than very many who are looking for the soon appearing of our Lord are disposed to admit. We make it a specialty, in conducting THE RESTITUTION, to place before its readers all important news in reference to the descendants of Abraham, as well as what is transpiring in the land from which they have been expelled, and to which they are now destined very soon to return. The Jews and Palestine are important factors indeed in the Oriental Question, and factors, too, that can never be left out in its final solution. From our latest exchanges we quote some important news for our columns for the present week. The Hibis Standard for April of the current year, says: "We call the following instructive facts from a letter from Palestine, published in the Age to Come Herald. The Russian Government is building a large Russian Hospital in Jerusalem. The same Power is building a tower on Mount Olivet, which, when complete, will be 120 feet in height. It is to have a large bell which may be heard for thirty miles. The bell is on the spot, having been drawn from Jaffa by 500 Russian pilgrims. A fine new road is being cut, by the Turkish Governor, from Jaffa to Jerusalem; 2000 men are employed upon it, 'cutting through the mountains and levelling up the valleys.' The writer was so surprised that he said to himself, 'Can this be Palestine? or am I dreaming?' Speaking of the new residences which are rising up, he adds: 'I can see very distinctly that God has put his Spirit into the hearts of the rulers and people of Jerusalem to prepare places for his people, Who are at hand to come. Those who build do not seek their personal interest altogether, but seem to be looking more particularly to the improvement of the country.' A new road is being built to connect Jerusalem and Hebron, eighteen miles distant. Roads are shortly to be made from Haifa, Acre, and Beyrout, to Nazareth Tiberias, and the Hauran. The latter is declared to be 'one of the finest grain countries in the world.'" The roads will simplify the transit of the grain to the coast for export, and so poor wealth and labor into Palestine. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem."

In addition to this quotation we take another from the Watchword. The Editor, Dr. Gordon, makes an extract from a recently printed volume with some prefatory remarks which we give verbatim as follows:

In the last edition of his "Jews—Prediction and Fulfilment," Prof. Kellog shows how steadily along many lines of Providence the movement towards the restoration of Israel to their land is progressing. What a significant fact which he mentions, that "In Russia alone, between forty and fifty Palestine colonization societies have been formed in the past four or five years!" He further says: No less significant is it, that simultaneously with these incipient colonization movements, and in a more rapid degree, goes steadily forward the general improvement of the Holy Land. On this, besides many others, we have again the valuable testimony of Mr. Oliphant, who says: "It is a remarkable fact, that while every province in Turkey has been steadily retrograding during the last few years, Palestine alone has been rapidly developing in agricultural and material prosperity." Abundant proofs of this statement are given by himself and other travellers. Within the past twenty years the price of building sites about Jerusalem has risen fifty per cent., and is still increasing; while in twenty years the population has doubled. A later writer from Jerusalem in the Jewish Chronicle, says, that about the Jaffa gate the price of building sites has increased fourfold in the last five years. The population of Haifa has doubled in ten years, the value of exports and imports has largely increased, and land has increased threefold in value from 1878 to 1883. Almost every acre of the great plain of Esraelon is in a high state of cultivation, and "presents one of the most striking pictures of luxuriant fertility which it is possible to conceive." In 1882 the cost of transporting Surseck's share of the wheat crop of this fertile plain to the seaport was $50,000. The Bedouin raids which made the fruits so uncertain a few years ago throughout Eastern Palestine, have become a thing of the past. Roads are now being constructed in a land where, till lately, there were none. In Haifa, a few years ago, a cart had never been seen; but lately an omnibus was running four or five times a day to Acre, and a good road has been finished to Nazareth. A road is also in progress from Jerusalem to Hebron. Similar accounts reach us from other points. In 1883 a company of Syrian capitalists obtained a concession from the Sultan for a railway from Acre to Damascus, and for placing steam tugs upon the Sea of Tiberias, and the route was surveyed. The concession lapsed "through difficulties which arose at the last moment in the formation of the company," but Mr. Oliphant adds, that he has "little doubt but that the work will be ultimately accomplished."

Such then, very briefly, is the present state of things with regard to the Jewish nation and their land. The remark made by Dr. Moody Stuart, in the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, a few years ago, is still as true as then: "The modern world is at a loss what to do with the Jews, and the Jews are at a loss what to do with themselves." Slowly the idea of restoring the people to the land, and the land to the people, is taking shape and form in the minds of increasing numbers of Jews and Christians.

In copying the above into THE RESTITUTION, we feel prompted to add in the spirit and language of love that the stern logic of events will finally convince many, who are looking for the Lord's speedy return, of their error in denying that prophecy touches the return of Judah and Israel to the land of their fathers. The fulfillment of prophecy has a distinct relation to the future of the Church, Israel and the nations. In the Old Testament Scriptures vastly more is predicated of Israel and the nations than of the Church. And while the Church becomes prominent in the Scriptures of the New Testament, Israel and the nations are by no means lost sight of by the inspiring Spirit. That Israel is an Everlasting Nation, is none too strong language to employ in our appeal to the Scriptures.

PERPETUATING LIFE.

He that loveth his life shall lose it: and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal, John xii. 25.

The following, which we take from Words of Reconciliation, furbishes an illustration from nature that God is not willing that any should perish, but rather that sinful man may return and live. In human experience the quickening influences are brought to bear again and again upon the heart, before God abandons the soul to death. The lesson from nature is beautiful and instructive. Heavenly, spiritual, and divine influences alone can bring immortality.

THE FIVE LIVES OF SEED CORN:

Professor J. Boal's record of interesting and useful tests of the germinating possibilities of small grain, especially wheat, was communicated to the Tribune some weeks ago, showing that repeated sprouting followed drying up, the fifth or sixth time. Dr. E. Lewis Sturtevant of our State Experiment Station, has since published a report of similar investigations with the seeds of maize, indicating the same wise provision of kindly nature to the end that harvests may not fail. He introduces his data with a pleasing statement of the curious fact, the existence of which may well excite wonder and gratitude.

"It is often surprising to see how admirably a plant has sometimes become possessed of functions for meeting and overcoming the variable changes to which it is subjected by climate. Seed is planted, germinates, a drouth comes and the soil becomes dry and parched. The swollen seed has commenced its life, but apparently the attempt has been in vain, for the seed is now dry and hard, and the caudicle appears withered and dead; the rains come; the seed again swells and renews its attempt to grow. The vital functions of the seed are so strong, and so arranged that its resistance at this period of its life to unfavorable agencies is great, and with a return to the conditions favorable to growth, its suspended life starts again into animation."

That this vital function should withstand one repression is indeed noteworthy; that it should endure to be nipped four successive times and still show some degree of effective life, is very remarkable.

"THE FOUNDATION OF GOD STANDETH SURE." 2 Tim. ii. 19.

Dear Restitution:

As we are bound by natural and moral ties, we cannot dissolve them. Hence, in the spirit, we are prompted to aid each other, and as we can, "each one seek each other's welfare."

The two groups of the sun, moon, and earth—my six-fold argument, noted in my last—copied from Webster, suggested the inquiry as to the number of eclipses in a year, or a hundred years.

From Herschell's astronomy I get these answers—very satisfactory. "In 223 lunations, full months—eighteen years and ten days—there are ordinarily seventy eclipses." This averages nearly four in a year, 400 in 100 years! The fractional variation is unimportant to the grand, unshakable facts in the result as "seen and known of all men." They belong, "not in a corner," but fill all space!

There are over five and one-half times eighteen in 100 years, and hence the number of eclipses—over 400—in a century, is quite enough to confound all scepticism as to the orbicular form of the earth, the same as that of sun and moon, all in harmonious movement.

Please note that back of all this number of eclipses, we see that all bodies within sight, the sun, moon, and stars (transcending our capacity to count) appear as they are, ovall! Nay, more, they appear without any material foundations, as you claim for the earth! These universal, unnumbered facts are primary and essential! They are not speculative, or theoretic, but all in reality! So far, they are like the four seasons of the year, the day and the night, summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, all sealed to us by God in the rainbow covenant! Nay more, they are founded and maintained by the Omnipotent will of Almighty God—their Creator!

Please, then, look again at the sun, moon and stars, and ask yourself if our earth is likely to be an exception, and so divorced from the sun that makes and rules its day and seasons, and gives us the rainbow, according to the covenant; or the moon that rules its night?

Note. A coal dealer said he could float only about 150 tons gonefully to his dock, but with the favoring and ruling moon at perigee, he could carry 600 tons! Please reflect, there cannot be such an exception or divorce, because the universe is one. It bears some slight analogy to some grand mechanism of man, each part fully needful to achieve some stupendous purpose in our rushing "time of the end!"

The thought of such isolation of earth from its relation to the floating orbs, sun, moon and stars abroad through all space, would involve universal collapse and perdition in our world, for all life on earth depends, under God, on this order for its seed time and harvests. Gen. viii.; Psalm civ. 24-30. Stagnation involves corruption.

You see, that my rest of faith is in the Creator and his wisdom and loving will to sustain this order of his own creation, with reference to the regeneration as revealed in the gospel, and to show to the angels, principalities and powers in heavenly places, his manifold wisdom, according to his eternal purpose in Christ, the second Adam, our coming Restorer, to "make all things new!" As the present order of the universe had its germ in "the Logos," John i.; Gen. i., so the future glorious consummation, has its foundation in "the same word!" For of him, through him, and to him, are all things." Amen. Rom. xi. 36.

Faith fastens here and "builds on this foundation." Hence it is all assumption of divine truth that is based on the human sound and usage of words, like foundation and pillars. Nay it must be a delusion. Please see 1 Cor. iii. 10–12; 1 Tim. iii. 15; 2 Tim. ii. 19; Gal. ii. 9; Eph. ii. 20; Heb. 2–6; Isa. l. 8; xxviii. 16; ii. 16; iii. 8; Jer. xxvi. 18. St. Paul says, as he was the apostle to the Gentiles, I have laid the foundation—for the Gentile calling—another buildeth thereon; other foundation can no man lay, who is Christ Jesus. 1 Cor. iii. 10-12. If any man build on this foundation, it is for the house of God, the pillar and ground (stay) of the truth, the gospel system. 1 Tim. iii. 15.

James, Cephas and John seemed to be pillars, and gave me the hand of fellowship. Gal. ii. 9.

"The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal: The Lord knoweth them that are his" 2 Tim. ii. 19; Deut. xxxiii. 26, 27.

"Ye (Gentile Christians) are built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone, builded for an habitation of God, through the Spirit." Eph. ii. 20-22.

The Old Testament usage corresponds. Hence it is like Swedenborgian, Shaker, and Jesuit bewilderment, that parallax and others stumble and so greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God," for "of him, through him, and to him, are all things." Rom. xi. 36. No creature, no dispensation, is self-sustaining, and independent. The Roman Church is "the mother church, yet the mother of harlots," all personified, and descended from or identified with Rome, "the great city that reigned (then and since) over the kings of the earth," Rev. xvii. 1–18; but its end is to be burned like Sodom! Rev. xviii. 8.

Thus Mt. Zion also had "her daughter," and is noted as daughter twelve times by the prophet Isaiah. Then Jeremiah has this daughter as a widow, sitting solitary; and yet we read, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation; he who believeth (on him, Rom. ix. 33) shall not make haste; Isa. xxviii. 16; this is applied seven times, N. T., to Christ. Here then is the foundation of God's great purpose. Nay more, the stability for the universe restored lies in this arrangement.

Note. "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, Zion (as then, and yet, existing) shall be (and now is) ploughed as a field." Micah iii. 12 re-affirms it. The facts of Zion are historic, like those of Rome. Zion had both her daughter and her foundation! Nay, more, we read of her city, Jerusalem, as "daughter," sitting solitary as a widow; the words are of course used in an accommodated yet truthful sense.

In this light you may talk of Mount Zion and the earth as a plain, and loose your mind in your conclusion. But you should know that "God in Christ," the maker, is above those temporalities as "things made;" and that his power and loving will are as the everlasting arms of the eternal God, underneath, and that the foundation for "the earth" like that for Zion, lies in his eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord, (Eph. iii. 8–11; Titus i. 1–3, before the world) to the intent that now unto principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God," (which opens up to) "the whole family in heaven and earth the riches of his glory, the breadth and length, and depth and heighth, and the love of Christ, that ye might be filled into all the fulness of God!" To him be glory in the Church by Christ Jesus throughout all the generations of the age of the ages. Thus the moral system for earth and heaven, for men and angels, has its foundation in Christ and its superstructure is in progress! Its consummation centers in the new heaven and the new earth! "All very good!" Your notion, with its author, is as grass; but the word of the Lord abideth forever.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 60.

LOVE TO GOD.

LESSON Chapter 1 John ii.

GOLDEN TEXT:—Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. Matt. xxii. 37.

Q. Why should we love God?

A. Because he first loved us, Rom. 5: 8; John 3: 16; 1 John 4: 19: and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins, 1 John 4: 10. Sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him, 1 John 4: 8; and hath given us all things that pertain to life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue, whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these we might be partakers of the divine nature having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. 2 Pet. 1: 3, 4 These promises are, Eternal life. 1 John 2. 25. New heavens and new earth. 2 Pet. 3: 12. Eternal inheritance, Heb. 9: 15; a crown of glory, 1 Pet. 5: 4; James 1: 12; rulership, Rev. 2: 26, 27. David loved the Lord because he had heard his cry.

Q. What is the first step toward accepting the love of God?

A. Believing the love that God hath to us, by confessing that Jesus is the Son of God, and that he is our Savior. 1 John 4: 15, 16.

Q. How can our love to God be perfected?

A. By dwelling in love and so dwelling in God.

Q. What will be the result of dwelling in love?

A. We shall have boldness in the day of judgment. Perfect love casteth out fear. If we dwell in God, there will be no fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation to devour. 1 John 4: 17, 18; Heb. 10: 27, 28, 29.

Q. Can we love God and yet hate a brother?

A. If a man say, I love God and hate his brother, he is a liar.

Q. What then is the commandment?

A. That he who loveth God, love his brother also. He that loveth not knoweth not God.

Q. How may we know that we do not love God?

A. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. 1 John 2: 15; John 5: 42. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death. 1 John 3: 14.

Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer, 15 verse.

He that seeth his brother have need and has no compassion, 17 verse, how dwelleth the love of God in him?

He that loveth me not, keepeth not my commandments. John 14: 24.

Q. How are we to love God?

A. In deed and in truth, not in just words of the tongue—that is, we are to relieve want, to help the destitute, to comfort the afflicted.

Q. If we do not so love God, will not our own hearts, or conscience condemn us? and can we have confidence before God, that he will not condemn us?

A. Most assuredly we stand condemned, knowing that we are not doing right in God's sight, who is greater than our hearts, and who knoweth all things. He knows when we shut up our bowels of compassion, against the cry of a needy brother, and that our profession of love to him is but a profession of the tongue, and not that of deed, and of truth.

Q. What had the Pharisees passed over in tithing mint and cummin?

A. Judgment and the love of God.

Q. How is the sincerity of our love shown? How is it to be proven that we are what we profess to be?

A. By the abundance of our joy, even in deep poverty, abounding in riches of liberality, in ministering to the saints, in the grace of giving to the glory of the Lord. 2 Cor. 8: Matt. 6: 28, 24. 44; Prov. 22: 29. By supporting the weak. Acts 20: 35. By bearing the burdens of those who have gone to the war. 1 Cor. 9: 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14. By keeping God's commandments. John 5: 3; 1 John 14; 15, 23.

Q. What should love be without?

A. Dissimulation: there must be the deed as well as the profession. Rom. 12: 9; 2 Cor. 8: 8.

Q. How does faith work?

A. By love.

Q. If our love is sincere, will anything be able to separate us from the love of God?

A. Rom. 8: 35–39; Psalm 48: 20; Nah. 1: 5.

Q. Can we be the disciples of Christ and love anything more than we do him?

A. Matt. 10: 37; Rev. 12: 11.

Q. What was against the church at Ephesus?

A. They had left their first love.

Q. What were they to do?

A. To repent and do the first works, begin again doing deeds of mercy.

Q. What should be the closing exhortation?

A. Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works. Heb. 10: 24, 25, and building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, keep yourselves in the love of God looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling and to preserve you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God, our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and for ever. Amen.

Satisfied.

When King David was in the wilderness of Judah, fleeing from his rebellious son Absalom, and hard pressed by those who sought his life, he had a wondrous appreciation of the presence and smile of Jehovah. He was happy even in the desert. "There was no desert in his heart, though there was desert around him." How sweet the language in which he expresses his holy desires after God, and his confidence in him: "O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is; to see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary. Because thy loving kindness is better than life, my lips shall praise thee. Thus will I bless thee while I live: I lift up my hands in thy name. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness; and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips; when I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches. Because thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice. My soul followeth hard after thee: thy right hand upholdeth me." What a blessed state of mind! With the Eternal Comforter as our abiding portion we may rejoice evermore, and find causes for continual thanksgiving. Life is dear, but the smile of the Lord is dearer. And this unspeakably precious boon is within the reach of all.—Evangelical Messenger.

The appalling earthquake in China, a brief report of which was received in January, shortly after its occurrence, appears to have been more disastrous to both life and property than was then supposed. A lengthy despatch from China was published by the New York Herald on April 2, from which it appears that not less than fifteen thousand persons were killed during four days during which at short intervals the shocks continued. The capital district of Yunnan is absolutely one mass of ruins. At Lainon, another Chinese town, the effect on buildings has been almost as terrible, with the additional horror of the earth yawning till a frightful chasm was produced, from which red-colored water was ejected. Further north, at Lo Chin, where ten thousand met their doom, the aspect of the country has been completely changed. Large tracts of land suddenly disappeared in the course of the visitation, and in their place lakes formed.

Lines on the Sunset.

Oh, the sunset on the mountains, it is beauteous to behold,
And it sometimes forms a mirage like a wondrous sea of gold;
I often think when gazing on it of the glorious mount of old,
Where the chief disciples saw Christ transfigured, shining bright,
For his face was like the sunshine, and his raiment like the light.
All this glory was a vision of the kingdom yet to be,
In which, if we are worthy, there is a place for you and me:
Then let us try to form his image on this dreary world of sin,
That when Christ comes in glory, we will be sure to enter in;
And amid life's toils and trials, all the Psalmist we can sing;
I shall be satisfied to awaken in the likeness of my King.

Funeral Sermon on the death of Miller Barber, Salem, O., Dec. 4, 1887.

THE RESURRECTION.

Miller Barber, the subject of this memoir and discourse, was the son of John and Nancy L. Barber. He was born November 14th, 1861, and died November 19th, 1887. His age was, therefore, 26 years and 4 days. His early youth was marked by conduct unusually exemplary. He was kind and benevolent. It is said that he was never known to tell a lie, or do a mean act.

Being early drawn towards Christian duty, he became obedient to the commands of Christ: confessed publicly his faith in the atonement; and put on Christ in the act of immersion. At the time of his death he had been a member of the church of God for about 9 years, taking an active part in all its acquirements.

He leaves a tender and beloved wife and one child to mourn this sad bereavement: also an affectionate father, kind mother, devoted sisters and brothers.

Discourse—The Resurrection. Bible readings. The following passages will serve to give a proper direction to our Scripture interpretations and expositions. It may be well to say, that the doctrine of the resurrection is a matter of pure revelation, and not of human research. It is true that the resurrection has, in nature its analogies. The chrysalis, the spring season, and other physical phenomena demonstrate the practicability of the event.

One of the most ancient questions propounded for the consideration of the human family is found in Job xiv. 14, and fully answered in Job xix. 25, 26 and 27. "If a man die, shall he live again?" "I know (that) my Redeemer liveth, and (that) he will stand at the latter (day) upon the earth: and (though) after my skin (worms) destroy this (body), yet in my flesh shall I see God: Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; (though) my reins be consumed within me."

It has often been a query whether the doctrine of the resurrection was revealed to God's chosen family the Hebrews. It is quite reasonable that it should be; and it is made clear by the following passages, the first being Gen. iii. 15. Here the resurrection is intimated in the denunciation against the serpent, and his seed. The sentence is that of taking away his power, that of holding the human family under the dominion of death.

Those that seem to think that the resurrection was not known to the Hebrews, do not discern God's purpose in the resurrection of the dead. God has promised his Son, Messiah universal dominion over the earth, in the place of the first Adam. That nation will be composed of the nation of Israel as the central family, associated with the choicest spirits out of every nation, kindred, and tongue, and people. The great masses of those that shall compose that empire are now sleeping in the dust of the earth. That kingdom is in the coming age, and must be organized out of the dead as well as from the living. The promise to Abraham is founded on the doctrine of a future resurrection since no other act can gather all the elements of the kingdom. Let us examine some of the old covenant promises relative to a resurrection. Gen. iii. 15, has been examined, Exodus iii. 6 reads as follows:—"Moreover he said, I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Jesus explains this passage as follows: But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Matt. xxii. 32. See also Mark xii. 26; Luke xx. 30; and Acts vii. 32. God had made a promise to Abraham, confirmed it to Isaac and Jacob, which was not accomplished while here living. And since it involves God's oath, it must be fulfilled in the resurrection state: consequently there must be a resurrection. Such also is the interpretation of the Abrahamic promise as given by Stephen: and by Paul, Gal. iii. 16; and Acts xxvi. 6, 7, 8. In 2 Kings iv. 34, is the following: And he (Elisha) went up, and lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands: and he stretched himself upon the child; and the flesh of the child waxed warm, vs. 33, then he returned, and walked in the house to and fro; and went up and stretched himself upon him: and the child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes. This case is very peculiar, yet it is a sample of a resurrection, since the child had been dead. The doctrine of a resurrection from the dead is very distinctly taught in Is. xxv. 8; and in Is. xxvi. 19; Ezek. xxxvii.; and in Dan. xii. 2, 13. In Is. xxv. 8 it is said, He (God) will swallow up death in victory. In Is. xxvi. 19, it is said, "Thy dead (men) shall live (together with) my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew (is as) the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast forth the dead." A resurrection is here taught in very clear and distinct language. In Ezek. xxxvii. 1–11 is taught the resurrection of the whole house of Israel. In Dan. xii. 2, 13, The sleepers in the dust of the earth awake in two classes. Some to endless life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. These are specimens of the old covenant teaching relative to the resurrection. No one can fail to see that the Hebrew teachings relative to a future resurrection had a common origin with the New Testament instruction. The New Testament, or Christian Scriptures. What did Jesus teach relative to the resurrection?

Jesus said (Matt. xxii. 23, 28, 33; Luke xx. 36; and Jno. v. 29; and xi.) in answer to the Sadducees, "You do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven. But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." God is not a God of the dead but of the living. Ex. iii. 6, 16. In Luke xx. 37, it is said, Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; for he is not a God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him. It is said in Jno. v. 28, 29, Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which, all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation (condemnation.) In these passages a resurrection is distinctly taught. And it is also clear that two classes have a resurrection. Jesus not only taught the doctrine of the resurrection, but he illustrated its practicability, and his power over the dead by raising three persons to life. Let us now examine these cases, as they bring to view all the facts and the elements of the future resurrection.

1. Daughter of Jairus. Matt. ix. 18, 19, 23, 26: "While he spake these things unto them, behold there came a certain ruler, and worshiped him, saying, My daughter is even now dead: but come and lay thy hand upon her and she shall live. And Jesus arose and followed him, and (so did) his disciples. And when Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the minstrels, and the people making a noise, he said unto them, Give place, for the maid is not dead, but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn, (knowing that she was dead, Luke viii. 53). But when the people were put forth he went in, and took her by the hand, and the maid arose. And the fame hereof went abroad into all that land." On this record we remark, (1) the maid was really dead according to the testimony of the father and all the people. (2) Jesus called it a sleep, since it was to be followed by life. Death that is followed by waking or bringing to life is truly called sleep. (3) If Jesus calls such a death, why may we not make the same application under like circumstances? (4) Jesus raised the maid by his own power, the power was communicated by his hand, and, therefore, went out of himself.

2. Only son of the widow of Nain raised. Luke vii. 11–17.

And it came to pass that after (the healing of the centurion's servant), that he went into a city called Nain; and many of his disciples went with him, and much people. Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow, and much people of the city was with her. And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And he came and touched the bier, and they that bare (him) stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. And he that was dead sat up and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother. And there came a fear on all: and they glorified God, saying, That a great prophet is risen up among us; and that God hath visited his people. This is an affecting narrative of a most interesting scene. A widow, highly esteemed is, by an early death, deprived of a son:—an only son, her support and comfort, in the years of her declining vigor. The certainty of his death; and, consequently, of his resurrection made it a noted topic throughout the city and upper Galilee. The meeting of the two companies, the love, boldness, and power of Jesus on that occasion, are worthy of all admiration. His confidence in his ability to raise the dead, command our profound attention; and fully assure us that Jesus of Nazareth is what he declared himself to be: The resurrection, and the life. Truly has he the keys of hades and of death.

3. The resurrection of Lazarus.—Jno. xi. 1–47. This narration is too lengthy to repeat in full. Let us therefore call your attention to some of its most noted incidents. Jesus, when in Bethany, made the house of Lazarus his home. It is said that Jesus loved him, and also his sisters Mary and Martha. He was at a distance when informed of the sickness of his friend Lazarus. When a physician is called to see a patient dangerously ill, feels it a duty to hasten to his bedside, to administer all possible relief. Here Jesus, the beloved physician, sent for to aid his most devoted friend, one whom he dearly loved, knowing his situation, abode still two days in the same place; till Lazarus was dead. This fact he knew; for he said, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth, is dead. What was the nature of this death? Why did he keep at a distance till the fatal termination? Its nature is explained by calling it sleep. The reason of his delay is given in vs. 4. This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby. He even says in regard to Lazarus's death, I am glad for your sakes that I was not there to the intent ye may believe. As this resurrection is the most noted of the three, it will be well to dwell more at length on some of its distinctive features. 1. The fact that Jesus said, I am the resurrection and the life, should be carefully considered, since it fully demonstrates that Jesus is not only the author of eternal life, but its life-giver, so that having put on Christ, and continued in him, being partakers of his nature we shall come forth in his likeness at the resurrection.

Three points in the narrative, are worthy of special attention; the conversation of Jesus with his disciples when informed of Lazarus' illness; and his free intercourse with his sisters Mary and Martha after his arrival at Bethany. The doctrine of the resurrection, and his power over death, and the dead are fully explained with his own divine nature and mission set forth in a clear and interesting light.

It seems, that, to this time, Christ's character and the work that he came to accomplish, were not understood by his disciples and apostles themselves. This appears from their questions and answers. They mistook Jesus' ideas relative to the term "sleep," and "death;" also his power in defending himself against impending dangers; since they were opposed to his going to Jerusalem. It is evident from vs. 4, 28 and 40, that Lazarus was allowed to sicken, die, and be buried, that Jesus' supreme power, over the dead, and death itself might be fully demonstrated. Jesus desired by a clear example of a resurrection to establish his claim to be the great Life-giver. "I am the resurrection and the life." Why in speaking of the nature of death, should we fear to call it sleep, when Jesus himself, who fully knew its nature, called it sleep? "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep. "Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead." What language is more distinct than that used by the Savior? Having corrected the notions of his apostles and disciples he goes to the late residence of Lazarus, where he meets with his sisters Mary and Martha.

His conversation with Martha, corrects many false views. "If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died;" as if his power was limited by distance, and that he had no inherent power to life. Her view of the future resurrection seems to leave out the agency of Jesus.

Mary appears to have the same view of Jesus' power over the dead, for she fell at his feet saying unto him "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died:" as if she had said if you had come immediately while his breath was in him, but now his life is beyond your power to recall, since he has been dead and buried a number of days, and no power on earth can recall him to life before the resurrection at the last day. How little did they know of his true character and mission. When following Jesus to the grave of their brother Lazarus how little did they understand the intention of that visit. Mary and Martha supposed that it was simply a visit of affection to the grave of his beloved companion, not discerning the object of that ardent and protracted intimacy, thus to culminate in this very noted resurrection. Let us now come to the act itself. He stands by the tomb of his sleeping friend. He has come from a distance to wake him out of his profound slumber. A man of sorrow stands over his dead friend, whom he proposes to restore to life. "Jesus wept," out of sympathy, not out of any fear that he should fail in his effort as the great Life-Giver. His words are simple yet all-powerful, "Take ye away the stone." "Lazarus, Come Forth." And he (Lazarus) that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. "Loose him and let him go." This act of power over the dead made many converts. We have dwelt upon this act of Jesus, because it demonstrates him to be the divine Life-Giver. Jesus is still the same Life-Giver, and has unlimited power over the sleepers in earth's dust. What a consolation to those who have friends asleep in Jesus. His unlimited power over death is seen in his own resurrection. He said I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it up again.

The great Empire (Roman) instigated by the Jews urged on by supreme Satanic power, put forth its mightiest efforts to hold Jesus under the dominion of death, that his mission might be a failure; but on the morning of the third day he arose, with the keys of hell (hades) and death suspended to his girdle. His victory over death sealed his character as the Life-Giver.

Allow us to close our remarks by noticing two passages from the writings of Paul, viz: 1 Cor. xv.; and 1 Thess. iv. 13–18. In connection with those please read Phil. iii. 20, 21.

1 Cor. xv. Our limits will not allow us to quote this chapter. We simply state the drift of Paul's argument relative to the resurrection of the dead. (1) The resurrection of Jesus is first established by first class testimony; (2) then the dead, being in the power of him that holds the keys of hades and of death must come forth at his call. The resurrection of the righteous is sure, for Christ is the first of the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming, 1 Cor. xv. 23.

1 Thess. iv. 13–18. Our brother Barber was much interested in the doctrine of the resurrection as taught by Paul in the above passage from the first epistle to the Thessalonians. (1) This letter is addressed to believers and those who are spoken of are those who sleep in Jesus; and such language cannot be applicable to such as are in possession of active, conscious bliss, as the popular churches represent the righteous dead. (2) The order of events is clearly stated: (a) the dead in Christ rise first (before the living righteous are changed) hence the living righteous shall have no advantage over the righteous dead. This language would not be appropriate if the righteous sleeping were conscious; for, then, being in perfect bliss, the advantage would be with them.

NATURAL IMMORTALITY THE BASIS OF THE DOGMA OF ENDLESS SUFFERING.—No. 1.

Human destiny is a solemn subject, and is fraught with interest to every human being. None should approach this subject with indifference. A spirit of reverent inquiry, a spirit of earnest devotion, and a spirit of fervent prayer is the disposition in which we should approach it. What are we? What is our nature? What are our capabilities? What is our future destiny? What awaits us beyond the grave? Shall we be, or what shall we be, or what shall we do, if we be, a thousand years hence? These are questions of momentous import. But where shall we find the answers to these questions? We shall find them in that Book, and only in that Book, which claims to be divinely inspired. To the book of nature we need not look for light concerning these great problems. Our inquiries can be met and satisfactorily answered only in the word of God.

The command of the great Teacher to search the Scriptures has, in every age of the church, been a reasonable command; but in no age has the injunction been more needed than it is today. The only hope for the spread of true views on this subject is, in men ceasing to rely on the creeds and on the traditional teaching of the sects, and coming direct to the Sacred Oracles.

Now the popular creeds and the popular teaching on the nature of the soul, and the teaching of the Bible, are in conflict. The creeds teach that the soul in its nature is immortal, imperishable, indestructible, that it cannot die, that it possesses in itself an eternal existence. The Bible teaches the exact opposite of this, and it teaches the opposite of this uniformly from the beginning to the end of the Book.

On some questions in theology we would speak with great caution. There are some phases of some doctrines, some details of some great truths, or some plainly revealed broad outlines of things, which are left in a measure of obscurity; and on such matters we would never speak positively. But on the question of natural immortality, there is no need for such caution. If we may speak dogmatically on any subject, we may on this. We have no hesitation in affirming that the common doctrine of natural, inherent immortality is false. It is false, because there is not a single passage in the whole Bible that teaches it; it is false, because there are a great multitude of passages that are opposed to it.

Adam and Eve, the first parents of our race, had immortality placed before them on the condition of obedience to the command of their Maker; they disobeyed the command, forfeited the proffered boon, and became mortal. The eating of the tree of life was necessary to their immortality; but on account of their disobedience they were not allowed to eat of it. The tree of life was guarded that they could not touch it or approach it. The Lord God placed at the east of the garden of Eden the Cherubim, and the flame of a sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life," lest the man "put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever." Thus failing when put on trial, not standing the test, choosing to take what God had forbidden, and falling into sin, God in mercy would not permit Adam to eat of the tree of life, and live for ever, or to become an immortal sinner.

And our first parents, forfeiting immortality through their disobedience, all their descendants were and are still mortal. Natural immortality, and the various terms in common use by which it is expressed, are all foreign to the Bible. Even learned Jewish writers who have embraced this popular error, and therefore, contend for the soul's inherent immortality, nevertheless acknowledged that this dogma "is not to be found in the Mosaic writings." The search for it in the Pentateuch is acknowledged to be a vain search. And, indeed, the search for it in any part of the Bible, whether the Old Testament or the New, were equally a vain search.

But immortality, which the first Adam forfeited by sin, the second Adam has won—won for the Adamic family—by his righteousness, or his obedience to the death of the cross. This is the position we take; this is the ground on which we stand; this is the doctrine we hold and which we affirm to be the teaching of the Holy Scriptures. Paul teaches that Jesus "abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light through the Gospel." 2 Tim. i. 10. And this life and incorruption, this immortality is conditioned to us on our faith in the Son of God. Numerous passages, especially in the Gospel of John and the Epistles, teach this most plainly. Take one, as a sample of many: "He that hath the Son[1] hath the life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life." 1 John v. 12. This life, this immortality, is a part of the Divine nature, and it will be given to none but believers in Christ. In 1 Tim. vi. 15, 16, the apostle Paul declares that he "only hath immortality," "Who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords." But if God only hath immortality—if he only in his nature possesses immortal life, the evidence is clear and full and absolute that we do not possess it by nature; therefore, immortality can only become ours by special gift. And this is what Scripture teaches, and what we teach. Immortality is the great, the wonderful, the precious gift of God through the Christ to them who believe in his name. The very pith and marrow of the Gospel is life—eternal life—to men under condemnation of death, conditioned on their acceptance of the gift. This is a message which must needs cause joy and gladness to those who receive it. And we would emphasize the fact that this doctrine is not supported simply by a few difficult and misunderstood texts; it has the support of all the plain texts in the Bible on this subject. Especially does it run through the New Testament. Hence it is rooted so deeply in the Word of God that nothing can overturn it; no sound principles of exegesis can separate it from that Word.

When men understand the true doctrine of immortality—when they learn that immortality is given to none but believers, and that the germ of it is given in the new birth, it will enable them to read the Scriptures, in respect to man's future, in the light of the Holy Spirit. Much that now seems dark and gloomy, and mysterious and distressing, will then be removed, and God himself will be better understood, and his character will be seen in a clearer light.

When men see that there is immortality only in the Christ, they will be more likely to realize the fact that they must perish if they continue out of Christ. The multitude having been taught that they are immortal by nature, and hoping, though conscious that they are sinners, that they will somehow escape eternal suffering, that being a penalty in excess of their demerit, neglect to seek immortality in whom alone it is to be obtained.

We believe that the Almighty Creator has implanted in the human heart the desire for immortality; that this desire is universal in the Adamic race, and no doubt in other races also that have been civilized; but that desire is evidence not that immortality is a natural possession, but just the opposite; for what is inherited as a birthright we need not wish or long for. The desire for immortality is evidence that it is placed as a glorious prize within our reach, to be obtained on certain conditions.

Immortality is to us a most precious doctrine, and our faith in it is so strong as the faith of those who oppose our view of it. They regard it as inherent in their nature, for which view they are unable to adduce a single proof from Scripture. We regard it as God's gracious gift to us through his only begotten Son, and for this view we have abundant proof in numerous plain passages. They look upon it as a natural possession by birth; we look upon it as a supernatural possession through the second birth, or the being born from above. We submit, therefore, that for our view of immortality we have some of the plainest and most definite statements found in the Gospels and the Epistles; while for the common view of immortality by natural birth, not a single passage can be given from Genesis to Revelation.

My Seventh Day Sabbath Experience. No. 2.

After we had been in Michigan some two or three years, laboring as best we could, and raised up many friends, we, by private conveyance, left Michigan for a visit in Western New York. We were gone some nine months. When we were absent Joseph Bates and Edson came to Jackson, Mich., came in among our dear little church of some thirty members, and succeeded in drawing nearly all into the Sabbath delusion. Upon our return to Jackson we called on Brother Dan Palmer. Mrs Seymour alighted from the carriage and went into the house, and I drove to the barn as usual and put up my horse, and then went to the house. Dinner was soon ready and we were invited to take a seat at the table. When the family became seated Brother Palmer said to his son, "pass the bread." He did not stop to ask a blessing, nor did he ask us, which he never failed to do before. The idea was, they had been sealed with the Sabbath seal, and we had not got rid of the mark of the beast, so the two classes could not worship together. We felt strange enough over this sad departure from thanks giving for the temporal blessings of our Heavenly Father, but we kept quiet and watched carefully every movement.

When we had been there some three hours we hitched up our horse and drove out to Brother Cyrenus Smith's, some three miles from Jackson where we had made our home a great deal. When we got there we discovered the same influence there as at D. Palmer's, but not quite to that extent. Brother Smith and wife, three daughters and two sons composed the family. We loved them dearly and they seemed to love us before we went to New York, but now they had changed very materially since we left them. When supper was ready we sat down to the table and Brother Smith said to his son William, "pass the bread, William." So no thanks for the blessings that lay before us given. They had never failed in calling upon us before, but the sequel is revealed above, the "seal" and the "mark" had made the difference.

After supper the Sabbath question was introduced, and the evening was spent in talking over the Sabbath, till finally the children began to retire. At last all retired but myself without any prayers, which they had been very punctual in doing before. I became so tried and afflicted by such a departure from the purity and sublimity of the Christian religion that I took my hat and retired to the barn, where I crawled down under the horses' manger and prayed and wept bitterly till twelve o'clock at night, wondering what kind of an influence had come among us that had utterly destroyed all love and affection for Christian friends that had formerly become so strongly attached to each other, and had done so much to cheer and comfort them with the blessed hope of the soon coming of the dear Savior.

Mrs. Seymour, who had retired, could not sleep, and becoming somewhat troubled by my long absence, she aroused Brother Smith who took his lantern and came into the stable where I had lain for some three hours, but he did not happen to see me so went out to another barn close by; as he did not find me, and believing he was looking after me, I crawled out from under the manger, went to the house and went to bed. But neither of us slept a bit all night; we could not cease from thinking, so as to sleep, wondering why the devil should send to deceive God's dear people, and bring them into such a sad condition of mind and spirit. But we got through the night full of sadness and sorrow. Breakfast was made ready, and as soon as seated, Brother Smith said, "William, pass the bread." As soon as this came out as on the evening previous, I could scarcely restrain my feelings. Well, I said to myself, we are not welcome here; so I shoved back from the table. Mrs. Seymour followed my example. I harnessed my horse, drove up to the door, we both got in, and rode twenty-five miles that forenoon before we got anything to eat.

Now I ask, is this Christianity, the religion that Jesus Christ brought into the world? No, no; emphatically no, nor any part of it. My mind has undergone no change from that day to this. The people that are at work practicing this deception are not worthy of any Christian confidence. The leaders are deceived and those who follow their influence are deceived also and both will fall into the ditch sooner or later. But I do thank God with all my heart that their deceptions will soon come to an end by the return of the dear Savior. I have no relish for that kind of religion, no not the least. It is heart-sickening and perfectly deleterious to Christian society. So beware of its baneful influence. It has no love for any one who has not been sealed with the Sabbath seal. I have chosen to be sealed with the Holy Spirit after believing in the gospel of God revealed through the Lord Jesus Christ, for when we obtain that seal we are dead, delivered from the law which made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did. There is more to follow and the most interesting part.

The Presbyterian Witness, Halifax, N. S., says: "Of Father Chiniquy's new book we must frankly speak in superlatives. It far surpasses in interest any book hitherto issued by the author, and if we do not misjudge, it is sure to become a standard work relative to the internal economy of the Roman Catholic Church. The great organization of which he formed so brilliant and popular a member is laid bare in its innermost workings. The unveiling is in all cases profoundly interesting; it is not always distressing or mortifying. The book is brilliant on every page with the genius, and the rhetorical skill of the gifted author. The narratives are vivid and fascinating, and many chapters are of tragic interest." "Adherents of the Church of England should read this book in order to realize the meaning of the Confessional. Presbyterians and others should read it to see the unwisdom of sending their daughters to Convent and Nunnery Schools where the training is so superficial as it is showy, and where the chief aim is to win the public over to the Church of Rome." ### WATCH THOU HIM.

As I kneel beside my chair,
Offering up my evening prayer,
Asking God most reverently
My safeguard at night to be,
Voice of some one seemed to speak,
"Oh, how helpless man and weak!
Locked in silent, deathlike sleep,
Who shall watch above him keep?"

Robber foe around his bed
Moves with stealthy, cat-like tread:
Not his goods nor hoarded gold,
His poor helpless hand can hold;
Wife and children, joy and pride,
Sleeping calmly by his side,
He in silent deathless sleep,
Over these no watch may keep.

Yet I lay me down to rest,
Not a fear within my breast;
One there is who guardeth me,
His strong arm my trust shall be.
With his angel sentries round,
Though no lock or key be found,
I am safe in death like sleep,
If these watch above me keep.

Copy of a Letter to the Rev. A. C. Dixon.

March 26, 1888.

Respected Sir and Brother:

I have listened with interest and attention to some of the popular sermons that you are now delivering in opposition to the errors of Romanism, and being a believer in stirring things up, I believe that good may come from a stir on this subject. But sir, the man that attacks thorns and briers must be "fenced with iron" and he that enters the field of controversy must be armed with "the truth" himself.

Unfortunately Romanism is not confined to the Roman Catholic Church, for as she has begged, borrowed and stolen her errors from a heathenism that was anterior to her, so many of the so-called reforms and religions might be better termed rehashes, as they have only altered some of the minutiæ of the old system and called it by "another name" to make it "smell sweet."

I was particularly struck, sir, with your reference to the experience of the young Luther in regard to his conception of Christ as inculcated by the Church of Rome, it reminded me of old times, not so very old either, say twenty-five or thirty years ago. I was brought up piously in the Methodist Church, and I can bear testimony that my impression received there of God was an exact parallel of Luther's impression of Christ. Why, sir, I have "shook and trembled" over the pit of hell. I hated to go to church and hear the dread terrors when I was a boy, and had not youth been on my side and a happy knack of sleeping sound at night afterward, there is no saying what the consequences might have been, for you know in those days boys had to do as their parents wished, and my parents at that time evidently considered that "hanging over the pit" was the right and proper treatment for your humble servant.

And O, the memory of the times we had then every Sunday night! What groans and agony! What shouts of warning from the zealous preachers! What startling delineations! What lurid lights! Flames, horror, despair, deathlessness of all-enduring torture, Dives, Lazaruses and damnations! and the poor minister in the eloquence and sulphurosity of his peroration, sank exhausted on the gold-edged Bible on the pulpit desk and buried his tear-drenched face in his pocket handkerchief in mournful silence.

And again, my dear brother, your description of Luther's conception of the interceding Virgin so exactly corresponds with mine—altering names merely—that I was remarkably struck with it. In place of an angry Christ and an interceding Virgin, we had an angry God whose wrath had to be appeased and whose "justice" had to be satisfied, and we had an interceding Jesus to beg for us and pay our dues, a sort of effeminate divinity in place of the usual heathen feminine one, and thus we had to "shelter beneath the covert of his blood? and cringe like a parcel of ours from the lash of a tyrant who used power because he had it.

Long ago that was though, so far as I am concerned. I thank the God and Father of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ that the gladness of his eternal countenance and the benignity of his character has shined on my spirit and I know that nothing intervenes, no one intervenes between the Omnipotent Father and the meanest of his children, that it was him in his boundless graciousness that sent to us an ambassador of mercy to mediate with us and conciliate and reconcile us, rebels as we were, and when we come back to the paternal home begging and pleading, any one else to beg and plead, is absolutely useless. "I my self," says Jesus, "that I will pray the Father for you, for the Father himself loveth you," and all children in the great family we have direct access by one spirit unto the Father.

But sir, when I go into churches and "gospel meetings" of Protestants, I find them praying to Jesus whether or no he is the "one" that loves them, the distant Father is supremely removed from their theology. "Jesus paid it all, all to him they owe," and as he paid the bill and scored off the consequences, it's most reasonable to suppose they would care most or altogether for him and regard with awe if not suspicion a being too terribly just and bloody in his demands with the terrors of eternal torture and the stifle of attenuated sulphur to enforce his will. Ah, my dear sir, we have not seen the last of Roman Catholic power or Roman Catholic doctrine. The trail of the serpent has been dragged far and wide, and we ought to be careful to rid ourselves of her slime so that we will be better prepared to dust our neighbor off. In Christian love,

J. F. GELLERLY.

A Boy Preacher.

A Williamstown, Ky., correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer says: "Great and unflagging interest has been manifested nightly for the past week in the eloquent and wonderful preaching of the boy preacher Rev. Pascal Porter, who lives near Madison, Ind., and is only eleven years old. Ministers in the prime of their ministry, ministers grown gray in the service of their Master hung with rapture upon the words that fell with burning eloquence from his youthful lips.

"Never in the history of this place have such crowds assembled to hear the preaching of one person. People of every creed and denomination and without a creed, and men who had not entered a church for fifteen years, attended nightly and were thrilled with interest and filled with wonder. He is a handsome boy, with a bright brown eye, and a well shaped head. Out of the pulpit there is nothing in his manner or speech to indicate his wonderful gift, but in the pulpit he is a veritable giant. He possesses a most wonderful memory and great gift of language, and his sermons were logical, doctrinal and deep, and on each night he spoke on an entirely different subject. While all here proclaim that his preaching is wonderful and interesting, the community are about equally divided as to whether his sermons are original or whether he has committed to memory the sermons of another; but all admit, whether they are original or not, that the boy preacher is a wonder and a prodigy.

"He is never at a loss for the right word in the right place, and so thoroughly does he seem to understand and appreciate his subject that if he were not a boy the originality of his discourses would never be questioned. The interest in them is not by any means confined to the fact that they are delivered by a boy. If they were delivered by a minister of mature years and with the same degree of eloquence all would be no less deeply interested.

"He was born near Madison, Ind., November 6, 1876, and is the youngest of a family of seven children—three boys and four girls. As soon as he was old enough to talk he manifested a desire to preach the gospel and make the world better, but was not permitted to enter the ministry until he was nine years of age. His education is limited, only having advanced as far as the fourth grade in the public schools."

Boys and Trades.

A short time since a correspondent of a Southern paper, who evidently knew how to wield something besides his pen, and this he uses to a good purpose, made some observations, from which the Jewelers' Journal quotes as follows:

"I believe," says the writer, "in schools where boys can learn trades. Peter the Great left his throne and went to learn how to build a ship, and he learned from stem to stern, from hull to mast, and that was the beginning of his greatness. I know a young man who was poor and smart. A friend sent him to one of these schools up North, where he stayed two years and came back as a mining engineer and a bridge builder. Last year he planned and built a cotton factory, and is getting a large salary. How many college boys are there in Georgia who can tell what kind of native timber will bear the heaviest burden, or why you take white oak for one part of a wagon and ash for another, and what timber will last longer under water and what out of water? How many know sand stone from limestone, or iron from manganese? How many know how to cut a rafter or brace without a pattern? How many know which turns the faster—the top of a wheel or the bottom—as the wagon moves along the ground? How many know how steel is made, and how a snake can climb a tree?

"How many know that a horse gets up before and a cow behind, and the cow eats grass from her end the horse to him? How many know that a surveyor's mark on a tree never gets any higher from the ground, or what tree bears fruit without bloom?

"There is a power of comfort in knowledge, but a boy is not going to get it unless he wants it bad, and that is the trouble with most college boys, they don't want it. They are too busy, and haven't got time. There is more hope of a dull boy who wants knowledge than of a genius, for a genius generally knows it all without study. The close observers are the world's benefactors."

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Westbee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. Literate with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research concerning a period of more than forty years, favoring careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of Divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides the course of all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $3.50. ### THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

INTRODUCTION.

The work of the ages,—the agencies brought into being and effective force, for the performance of that work, and the conditions pertaining to each in its course—constitute the grandest themes, as connected with man's origin, nature and destiny, which it is possible to contemplate. And when we consider that not only man, the earth-birth man of a period when all the preponderating life types were earth-born and of the earth, earthy—as he now is, imperfect, and impure is one of the chief actors in the drama; —that from him as he now is, will be developed the higher type of existence attainable in the age to come, and that the earth has been in preparation for long ages prior to his existence, as his future home;—that it embodies the master-thought of the Creator of the universe, as well as the fulfilment of the labors and the prophecies and the promises of the olden time, and the fruition of the gospel period and all that pertains thereto, yet reaching beyond even this to the grandeur and glory of the age to come,—each part and parcel of the age-work becomes a living object of interest to the investigator.

How pertinent is the remark of Agassiz, relative to one portion thereof. Says he, "To me it seems that to look on the first land that was ever lifted above the waste of waters; to follow the shore where the earliest animals and plants were created, when the thought of God first expressed itself in organic forms,—to hold in one's hand a bit of stone from an old sea-beach, hardened into rock thousands of centuries ago, and stranded with the beings that once crept upon its surface, or were stranded by some retreating wave, is even of deeper interest to men than the relics of their own race, for these things tell more directly of the thoughts and creative acts of God."

The lamented Hugh Miller, too, says, "We must look upon the schemes of creation, salvation, and providence, not as schemes of mere adaptation to man's nature, but as schemes also specially adapted to the nature of God as the pattern and original nature. Further, it speaks, I must hold, of the harmony and unity of one sublime scheme that after long ages of immaturity,—after the dynasties of the fish, the reptile and the mammal, should in succession have terminated, man should have at length come upon the scene in the image of God; and that, at a still later period, God himself should have come upon the scene in the form of man; and that thus all God's workings in creation should be indissolubly linked to God himself."

David, the sweet singer of Israel was inspired with similar feelings, thus, Psa. viii. 3, 4, "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, and the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" Psa. xix. 1–3, "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech or language where their voice is not heard."

Writers both sacred and profane, ancient and modern, who seek to inform themselves, testify as a unit in relation to the grandeur of the topic.

Geology only investigates the lithological and stratigraphical structure of the earth's crust as taught by its rocks and fossils, and neither reaches the beginning of creation, on the one hand nor the prophetic future on the other. The science of Geology begins with the Laurentian and Huronian deposits peculiar to the Eozoic age. Prior to this the earth's history is enveloped in the mists of hypothesis and obscurity as thick and impenetrable—as far as geological research is concerned—as the dense pall of misty vapor that enshrouded the earth and intercepted the sun's rays, ere the Creator said "Let there be light and there was light."

It is quite doubtful if any of the rocky stratum that formed the earth's primary coating have ever been seen by man. If any of it still exists it is in the form of basic rocks lying deep in the earth, superimposed on the unexplored interior of the earth. Everything pertaining to the earth before this period—to its formation, and to the processes employed in its evolution from chaos is more or less uncertain and hypothetical. Subsequent to this period, however, hypothesis gives place to recorded facts, uncertainty to reality, and the geologist, opening up leaf after leaf of the rock-album, observing stratum after stratum, and classifying the fossiliferous deposits in each, has established a system or order in their arrangement equivalent to scientific certainty as to the relative period of existence as living forms, continuance and finality.

The periods of duration may, therefore, be divided as follows, to-wit:

1. THE PRE-GEOLOGICAL PERIOD, which speculates upon the origin of the earth and its relation to the planetary system from before the time when it is said, that "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and the earth was without form and void, and darkness covered the face of the deep" to that portion of its history when the rocky formation remains in existence with the fauna and flora of the age locked fast in its recesses, subject to exposure and inspection to this day.

2. THE GEOLOGICAL PERIOD extending from the close of the former to the creation of man, near the close of the Tertiary or Cenozoic Age.

3. THE ANTHROPOMORPHIC PERIOD covering the history of the earth under the combined labors of God and man, extending from man's creation to the completion of the earth in the world to come.

These three periods have been divided, by geologists, into separate, successive eras or ages, according to the fossiliferous remains (fauna and flora) found embedded in the different strata. They naturally succeed each other in the following order, to-wit:

The Chaotic or Forming Age.

Strata: 1. Mica-slate, 2. Gneiss.
Fossils: Wanting.
Age peculiarities and labors: 1. Beginning of earth-creations, 2. Dense darkness with intense heat, 3. Diffusion of light. Gen. i. 2, 3.

FIRST DAY.

Time of judgment on the works of the age.

The Archæan or Eozoic (first life) Age.

SALVATION.

"For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men," Titus ii. 11.

"Salvation! O the joyful sound!
What pleasure to our ears;
A sovereign balm for every wound,
A cordial for our fears."

Salvation forms the theme of many a discourse preached by the clergy of the various sects and denominations of modern Christianity. It is presented to their hearers in various ways so as to attract their notice, and many reasons are given and motives presented in order to induce them to accept the proffered gift of God; but I am sorry to say that there is too much vagueness and uncertainty attached to their definitions of the word and methods to obtain the blessing. In a subject of such vast importance everything should be plain, and according to the Word of God.

We read that "now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation." Of course present salvation is indicated and taught by this language. The promise of forgiveness of sins in the name of Jesus implies it. The apostles offered salvation through the gospel to all who heard them preach it, and declared that "there is none other name given under heaven among men whereby we can be saved, than the name of Jesus," Acts iv. 12. "All men have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." "There is none righteous, no, not one." Jews and Gentiles are all under sin. "They are all gone out of the way; they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one." Rom. iii. 9–12. All the world has become guilty before God; consequently all are under condemnation, and in need of salvation. Peace with God, justification, freedom from condemnation, forgiveness of sins, are freely offered to all who "believe on him who raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; who was delivered for our offenses, and was raised again for our justification." Through this man the apostles preached and offered the forgiveness of sins. Acts xiii, 38. This was present salvation, and this salvation gives to the recipient of it, the hope of future salvation. This future deliverance is not what many say it is —a salvation from eternal misery. The Bible does not teach such a doctrine. It gives to the believer the hope of life, through a resurrection from the dead. This will be salvation or deliverance from the condemnation and consequences of sin, giving victory over death and the grave, through our Lord Jesus Christ. God's love for us has provided a Savior, "who is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God through him." "God sent his Son into the world, not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved."

The salvation offered to us in the gospel is an individual or personal matter. The apostles have been appointed as Christ's ambassadors, as Paul writes in 2 Cor. v. 20, "as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." To them was committed the ministry and word of reconciliation, and if we would know the way of salvation, we must learn it of them. They are the only safe guides. Consult them, and follow their guidance and you are safe. Paul tells us that "the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Rom. i. 16. Belief then is necessary. "Without faith it is impossible to please God." Belief of the gospel is required. God sent a message by his Son, and says to us by a voice from heaven, "This is my well-beloved Son; hear ye him." If we believe on the Son, and hear him, we shall respect the message he brings to us from his Father. Jesus said that he was anointed and sent to preach the kingdom of God. Luke iv. 18, 19, 43. This word was sent to the children of Israel. Acts x. 36. Many of them heard and received the word, but they were only wayside hearers; a few received the good seed into honest hearts. These brought forth fruit unto life eternal, but the others when tried and tested were found wanting, and rejected the Messenger whom God had sent. If we would be saved, we must receive both the Messenger and his message. He has the words of eternal life. John vi. 68. The Father has given him power over all flesh, "that he should give eternal life to those who believe on him. John xvii. 2. He has life in himself, and promises to give this eternal life to all who come unto him. He says, "I give unto them (my sheep) eternal life, and they shall never perish," John x. 28. But his sheep hear his voice, and follow him. They know him as the Good Shepherd, and he knows them; "and this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent," John xvii. 3. Then in order to have salvation we must know God and his Son, and this knowledge can only be obtained through the Scriptures of the prophets and apostles. We must hear the voice of the Good Shepherd, and follow him. This implies belief of his message, the glad tidings of the kingdom of God which he preached, and sent his disciples to preach; also, obedience to his authority. He requires nothing of us, but what he himself practised. "Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; and being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him." Heb. v. 8, 9. There is only one one way of salvation open for us. Jesus is "the way, the truth, and the life." There is only "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." Belief of the gospel, repentance or reformation, and baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus for the remission of sins, Acts ii. 38, is the only legitimate course to be followed in order to be on safe ground, or in harmony with the Bible record. Let every reader be careful what he adopts and follows as truth in the important matter of personal salvation, for "many false prophets are gone out into the world," "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men," which are by no means able to save the sinner. Such teachers worship God in vain, and are not safe to follow. They are only "blind guides." "And if the blind lead the blind both will fall into the ditch," Matt. xv. 14. How important it is then for us to be guided by the truth! Jesus is the truth, and the light of men. To be enlightened by him is to pass out of darkness into light, from error into the truth, and "the truth will make us free."

Reader, do you desire salvation? You can have it through Jesus, in the appointed way. He is the Savior of sinners, "neither is there salvation in any other." But he does not save sinners in a direct manner, as some teach. The apostles are his ministers, appointed by him to teach men "the way of salvation." To hear them is to hear Jesus; and to hear him is to hear and obey God. There is no other safe way. God heareth not sinners except in the appointed way. Then seek to know that and follow it, and you will be saved.

THE POWERS OF THE WORLD TO COME.

A much-debated phrase in a much-vexed passage is that which we find in Heb. vi. 5, in the description of a certain class of persons, of whom the writer says, that "if they shall fall away," it is "impossible to renew them again unto repentance." These are described as being persons who, among other experiences of privilege, "have tasted....the powers of the age to come" (loc. cit. R. V.) What is intended by these last words, is the present question. What is meant by "the powers of the age to come?"

Numerous and diverse have been the answers to this question. Thus, e. g., Kuinoel and Bretschneider interpret the phrase to mean, "the riches or consolations of the Gospel dispensation;" Stuart, similarly, "all gracious Gospel influences not included in the foregoing enumeration;" Bloomfield and Scott, "the motives and supports drawn from a future life;" McKnight, "the ordinances of the Church for converting sinners," and so on. But, considering first the first word in the phrase, it is certain that the word δυνάμεις, rendered "powers," never in New Testament Greek has any such meaning as any of these interpretations assign to it. They all disregard the usage of the term. In every place where this plural, δυνάμεις, occurs in the New Testament, with the exception of five—three of which are found in parallel passages in the synoptic Gospels—it denotes work done by superhuman agency. In the excepted Gospel passages, Matt. xxiv. 29, and parallel, in the phrase, "the powers of Heaven shall be shaken," the plural denotes the forces of physical nature. The other two excepted passages are, Romans viii. 38; and 1 Peter iii. 22, in both of which it denotes certain exalted orders of heavenly beings.

In each of the remaining twenty passages in which δυνάμεις occurs it denotes miracles, regarded as manifestations of a supernatural power. As illustrations, may be cited the following texts: "a man approved of God by mighty works," Acts ii. 22; "thirdly, teachers; then miracles," 1 Cor. xii. 28; "He that worketh miracles among you," Gal. iii. 5; and so also in the same Epistle to the Hebrews, ii. 4: "God also bearing witness with them....by manifold powers" (R. V.) We thus are led to conclude that the plural δυνάμεις according to New Testament usage, must denote "miracles" in this passage also. The force of the reference to miraculous endowments in its bearing on the argument of the context, may be well illustrated by Matthew vii. 22, where we read of some rejected persons who will say, at the last day, "Lord, Lord, did we not....by Thy name do many mighty works?" Matt. vii. 22, R. V.

But what, then, is to be understood by the qualifying words "the age to come?" A large part of modern commentators insist that by the phrase thus rendered, μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, is to be understood the present Gospel dispensation. So interpret the expositors above named, and many others. Lindsay inclines to interpret the whole phrase as describing "miracles viewed as manifestations of the invisible state," thereby meaning, as he explains, "the world into which we enter after death." But the question must be settled by reference to established usage. As for αἰών, often rendered in King James' version "world," it denotes, in contrast with κόσμος, the world as existing in time. "Age" if not fully adequate, is a better rendering in this phrase than "world," and it is accordingly given in this passage, in the text of the Revised Version. Miracles are then here described as "powers of the age to come." "The age to come," one would suppose, clearly enough indicated an age to follow the present age. But, strangely enough, the most of commentators tell us, that in this and other similar places where the phrase occurs, it denotes, not an age to come, but the age which is already here, the Christian dispensation. They refer us to the familiar Hebrew phrase, ha' 'olam habba, by which the Jews designated the expected reign of the Messiah; of which words, this ὁ αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων, is the Greek translation. Then it is argued, that as this phrase, "the age to come," denoted the age which should be introduced by the coming of the Messiah, therefore, as this age in which we live was thus introduced, the phrase must in the New Testament, designate this present Gospel dispensation.

But to such an interpretation there are weighty objections.

1. In the first place, granting that the Jew, before the advent of Christ, did describe the dispensation which his advent should introduce as "the age to come," surely it does not follow that, when with the appearing of the Messiah it had now begun to run its course, the Jewish believer would still speak of that coming age as if it had not yet come, and go on calling it, as before, "the age to come." This were in the last degree unnatural and unlikely. Prof. Lindsey, indeed, in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (loc. cit.) adduces the use of this same verb, πέλλειν, in Rom. v. 14, where it is said of Adam, that he was τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος, "a type of him that was to come." Here, we are told, this participle, μέλλοντος, is used of a fact of the past, the first coming of the second Adam. But the supposed analogy is only superficial and apparent. This participle refers to future time, as really in Rom. v. 14, as elsewhere. The first coming of Christ is here conceived of as future, not indeed to the actual present, but to an ideal present mentally assumed in the past—the time of the creation of Adam. But in the present and similar passages, where the phrase "the age to come" is used, there is no evidence that an ideal present is assumed.

2. But if we should assume that "the age to come" designates the present dispensation, why should miracles be described as "powers of the present dispensation?" Certainly not because specially characteristic of the present age, for this they have not been. It is true that they did conspicuously mark its beginning, but this gives no reason for speaking of them as distinctively powers of this age, any more than, for instance, as powers of the Mosaic age, which was also introduced by stupendous displays of miraculous power. These δυνάμεις or "mighty works" have, in fact, been characteristic, thus far, of no dispensation. It is not therefore supposable that the inspired writer should have intended to distinguish miracles as powers specially pertaining to the present dispensation, for that they are not so is a matter of history.

3. But it is a mistake of fact to affirm that the New Testament writers used this phrase "the age to come," to denote the present Gospel age. When they have occasion to speak of this dispensation, they employ words expressing present time, exactly as we should ourselves. Thus we read of ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος, "this age" in "the cares of this world (age)" (Matt. xii. 22); "the children of this age marry and are given in marriage," Luke xx. 34. Or, again, the phrase is, ὁ ἐνεστὼς αἰών "the present age," as in Galatians i. 4, "that he might deliver us from this present evil world (age)." Or it is ὁ νῦν αἰών, "the now-age," as in 2 Tim. iv. 10, "having loved the present world (age, or time-order);" and Titus ii. 11, 12, "we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world (age)." That these various expressions are used to denote the existing order of things in time, no one has ever doubted. So common are these expressions as to justify the statement that the sacred writers habitually denote the present order of things, just as we should do, by various phrases expressing present time.

"Are we then to conclude that in the lips of the Apostles and our Lord, the two phrases, ὁ νῦν αἰών and ὁ αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων, "the present age," and "the future or coming age," meant the same thing? Is it not the reasonable conclusion that since they so commonly use these expressions denoting present time to designate this dispensation, therefore when they depart from this very natural usage, and use instead an expression denoting future time, they do so because they are now referring to a different and future time?

This is the clearer, if possible, when we observe that often the phrase before us, or its equivalent, is used in connection with the others above noted, to mark the contrast of the future with the present. Thus we are told of the sin against the Holy Ghost, that it shall not be forgiven, οὔτε ἐν τῷ νῦν αἰῶνι οὔτε ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι, "neither in the present age, nor in that which is to come," Matt. xii. 32 and parallels). So we read, Eph. i. 21, that God has given to Jesus Christ "a name which is above every name, not only ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ "in this age," but also, ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι "in that which is to come." Again in Mark x. 30, we read, that they who give up all for Christ shall receive abundantly ἐν τῷ καιρῷ τούτῳ, "in this present time," and ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τῷ ἐρχομένῳ, "the age to come, eternal life." No less emphatic is the contrast in Luke xx. 34, 35, where with "the sons of this age," are contrasted those "who shall be accounted worthy to attain to that age," as being "sons of the resurrection."

From this examination of New Testament usage it is plain that the sacred writers distinguish two aeons or "ages," which they very naturally contrast as "the present age," meaning the present dispensation, and "the age to come," which is to succeed to the present, as the last-cited passage shows, by resurrection.

We now return to the question before us, and are in a position to understand why the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews should speak of miracles as "powers of the age to come." Miracles, all will agree, as a matter of history, are not characteristic of the present age. It is not according to the present order of things that even Christian men should be endowed with such power as a few in the primitive age exercised over physical nature. On the contrary, instead of thus dominating nature, man remains, to a great extent, subject to nature. "We see not yet all things put under him." The extraordinary supremacy over nature which miracles exemplify, is not the law of the present age, but the exception. But though powers which, with reference to the existing order, we call miraculous, are not characteristic of this present age, they are "powers of the age to come." That is, these powers over spirit and nature which, in the present order, are foreign and exceptional, shall be characteristic of those who, to use the words of our Lord, "shall attain unto that other age, as sons of the resurrection." They are anticipations of resurrection endowments. The phrase expounded reminds us of the word of Paul touching the resurrection, that "that which is sown in weakness shall be raised in power." We may close with the striking words of Prof. Delitzsch, in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, sub loc. 2, 5 cit., which have come under the writer's eye since the foregoing was written:

"The powers of the world to come"—among which the apostolic signs and wonders must be reckoned—are already felt, and project themselves into the present....They are a prelude and foretaste already of that future redemption which is already in progress. 'The world to come'....the habitable earth to be, of Hebrew ii. 5, has not yet appeared, but is already present as the hidden background of the world that now is, waiting for its manifestation, perpetually breaking through the crust that binds it, in manifold effulgurations.

"Such is the real nature of the miraculous endowment. And yet, the sacred writer asserts us, that even though a man here should have attained here to this endowment and shall fall away, it shall be impossible to renew him again to repentance."

Such, then, we believe to be the true interpretation of the phrase discussed, and such its place in the argument of the context.—S. H. Kellogg, D.D., in Pulpit Treasury.

Dear Friends:

We have just started on the Fifth month of this year. We have carried on our list all the time since Jan. 1, about 200 names of persons who have promised to pay as soon as able. We have exhausted our means, and now ask each one whom we have accommodated so long to remit to us some portion, at least of your dues. If you cannot send all, send a part, and that right away. We ask you to do this because we Need it—queer as it may seem to you, yet we do actually need it—and as we have waited so long on you, we trust you will be very prompt in responding to our call.

Brethren, you who have abundance, remember that we have on our list a number of poor brethren and sisters—actually too poor to pay for THE RESTITUTION. You who have large and well-stocked farms, a superabundance of this world's goods, are at liberty to pay for the paper for them.

FROM a marked number of the Public Ledger, published in Philadelphia, Penn., we learn that Rev. L. C. Baker has withdrawn from the West Jersey Presbytery. He is editor and publisher of Words of Reconciliation. His views regarding human destiny are not at all in harmony with the standard doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, and this difference has resulted in his severance from the Presbytery. His continuance in the Presbytery was considered by an advisory committee, and we give the result. "The discussion was continued at the afternoon and evening sessions on the report of the committee, which recommended that Mr. Baker withdraw from the Presbytery. A vote was taken on the recommendation, which resulted in 55 yeas and 5 nays, and the report of the committee was then adopted as a whole. Mr. Baker then tendered his resignation, and, by motion, was permitted to withdraw."

INDULGENCIES AND ROMISH MORALITY.

Last week we gave our readers some account of the sale of indulgences to commit all kinds of crime, just before, and at the dawn of the great Protestant Reformation, copied from Dr. John Mason Good's Book of Nature. We this week copy some additional account of this abominably nefarious traffic from the same learned author, having a special bearing on the depraved character of the Romish Popes and clergy of that age, and, at the same time, showing how demoralising the licentiousness of the papal hierarchy was, in its effects, upon the nations benefited by its superstitions. Continuing from where we left off last week our author says:—"If we turn immediately to the Vatican itself, and observe the personal conduct of the direct successors to the chair of St. Peter, and of the sacred college by which they were surrounded, what is the picture which is unfolded to us? We behold pope fighting against pope, cardinals, in a multiplicity of instances, against cardinals; the former occasionally deposed, and the latter still more frequently strangled. We behold Leo X., when only an infant of seven years old, made abbot of the rich benefice of Font-dolce; a few years afterward holding not less than twenty benefices equally rich and valuable at the same time; and nominated to the grave and [illegible] dignity of cardinal. We behold Alexander VI., a most profligate pope, living incestuously with his own daughter, the lovely but beautiful and accomplished Lucrezia Borgia, a common prostitute to her father and two brothers; and we behold one of the brothers assassinating the other, and shortly afterward her legitimate husband, in the precincts of the apostolic palace, and upon the threshold of St. Peter's church, from a jealousy of their superior pretensions to her favor. While, to close the whole, for it is disgusting in such a slough of moral filth, we behold the council of Lateran inveighing against the scandalous lives of its own ministers, who, not satisfied with living in a state of concubinage themselves, consented to receive the wages of iniquity, and sell licences to the laity for the grant of a like indulgence. But it may, perhaps, be said, that in these instances the soft and enervating power of an Italian climate and the licentious habits which so peculiarly characterized the decline of the Roman empire, and which to the period before us had never been altogether eradicated, laid a foundation for vices which would not otherwise have been exhibited. Let us then direct our attention to a climate of another kind; let us turn to the hardy and proverbially virtuous inhabitants of Scotland, and proverbially virtuous, too, from the very nature of the climate itself; what was the effect of ignorance and papal superstition amid the corruption of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries upon the physical temperance, and chastity of the Highlands? The following is Dr. M'Crie's account in his life of John Knox, and which he supports by sufficient authorities:—"The corruptions by which the Christian religion was universally depraved, before the Reformation, had grown to a greater height in Scotland than in any other nation within the pale of the western church. Superstitions and religious imposture, in their grossest forms, gained an easy admission among a rude and ignorant people. By means of these the clergy attained to an exorbitant degree of opulence and power; which were accompanied, as they always have been, with the corruption of their order, and of the whole system of religion. The full half of the wealth of the nation belonged to the clergy; and the greater part of this was in the hands of a few of their number, who had command of the whole body.

Avarice, ambition, and the love of secular pomp reigned among the superior ordain. Bishops and abbots rivalled the first nobility in magnificence, and preceded them in honors. They were privy-counsellors and lords of session as well as of parliament, and had long engrossed the principal offices of State. A vacant bishopric or abbacy called forth powerful competitors, who contended for it as for a principality or petty kingdom; it was obtained by similar acts, and not unfrequently taken possession of by the same weapons. Inferior benefices were openly put to sale or bestowed on the illiterate and unworthy ministers of courtiers; on dice-players, strolling bards, and bastards of bishops.—There was not such a thing known as for a bishop to preach:—the practice was ever gone into desuetude among the secular clergy, and wholly devolved on the mendicant monks, who employed it for the most mercenary purposes. The lives of the clergy, exempted from secular jurisdiction, and corrupted by wealth and idleness, were become a scandal to religion, and an outrage on decency. While they professed chastity, and prohibited, under the severest penalties, any of the ecclesiastical order from contracting lawful wedlock, the bishops set the example of the most shameless profligacy before the inferior clergy; avowedly kept their harlots; provided their natural sons with benefices, and give their daughters to the sons of the nobility and principle gentry; many of whom were so mean as to contaminate the blood of their families by such base alliances for the sake of the rich dowries which they brought. Through the blind devotion and munificence of princes and nobles, monasteries, those nurseries of superstition and idleness, had greatly multiplied in the nation; and though they had universally degenerated, and were notoriously become the haunts of lewdness and debauchery, it was deemed impious and sacrilegious to reduce their number, abridge their privileges, or alienate their funds. The ignorance of the clergy respecting religion was so gross as the dissoluteness of their morals. Even bishops were not ashamed to confess that they were unacquainted with the canon of their faith, and had never read any part of the sacred Scriptures except what they met with in their missals.'"

It will be in order to show in a future [illegible] how [illegible] was introduced [illegible] and [illegible] how [illegible] this [illegible] system [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] Christianity with so vile a system as Romanism has ever been. As a system it is nearing its final doom, and its overthrow will be a most frightful exhibition of the wrath of an offended God. Her plagues shall come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire; for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her. Rom. xviii. 8. Keep entirely out of her horrible precincts, and keep your children away from her abominable schools.

"Death is a Friend Carrying Us Home to Heaven."

This headline was used by the Rev. Mr. ——— at a funeral service in the neighborhood in which I live. The sentence is very pretty, and if true, very comforting to the bereaved friends; if not true only false comfort is afforded, because the idea is only supported by fiction and not by fact.

The words, "Death is a friend carrying us home to heaven," were said and repeated as many as ten times during his discourse, and whether true or untrue, they seemed to be well received by the audience.

The prophet Jeremiah once said, "A wonderful and horrible thing is come to pass in the land; the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means, and my people love to have it so." Jer. v. 31. We see by this Scripture, that there are false prophets among the people, as Peter said; then he added, "as among you also there shall be false teachers," 1 Peter ii. 1.

So it is possible that the pet words, "Death is a friend carrying us home to heaven," may be numbered with those "destructive heresies" By which it is said, "denying even the Master that bought them." To deny the Master is to reject his word. If this sentence should prove false, then the preacher is likened unto Job's comforters, to whom he said, "How then comfort ye me in vain, seeing in your answers there remaineth only falsehood." Job xxi. 34.

If death is a friend, why should we mourn when our loved ones die? To meet a friend is a time of rejoicing and not of sorrow. We generally long for the time for a friend to arrive; then why should we dread death? If death will change our condition and elevate us to a glorified position, why should the mourners go about the streets?

Now we ask, What is death? The theologian says, The death (of man) is a separation of the soul from the body; they also say the soul is the man proper, so death is only a change from one condition to another; therefore we get the idea that "death is a friend to carry us home to heaven," from a false source.

The dictionary definition is, "Extinction of life." This is a more common sense view, much more in accordance with the word of God. When God said to our first parents, "Thou shalt surely die." He had given them life, and if their loyalty would stand a fair test, they should still continue to live; if not, they should die: just the opposite. So death stands in opposition to life. Death is for the work of an enemy, God's antagonist. God is the author of life, but the Devil is the author of death. How then can death be a friend carrying us home to heaven? If death is simply a separation of the soul from the body, why did God say to Cain, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground"? Why did he not say to him, the soul of thy brother has left his body, and came and told me of your crime? But nothing of it, Abel had ceased to live, therefore he could not communicate, so God had taken the blood of Abel as evidence of the crime of Cain.

Throughout the Bible we fail to find any evidence in favor of man going to heaven at death. Only three persons are referred to in the whole Bible as leaving this earth and ascending to heaven, they were first Enoch, of whom we read, "And Enoch walked with God, and he was not; for God took him." Gen. v. 24. "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death, and he was not found; because God translated him; for before his translation he hath had witness borne to him that he had been well-pleasing unto God." Heb. xi. 5, R. V. Second, Elijah, "And it came to pass as they (Elisha and Elijah) still went on and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, which parted them asunder; and Elisha went up by a whirlwind into heaven." 2 Kings ii. 11. Third, Jesus, "So the Lord Jesus, after he had spoken unto them, was received up into heaven, and sat down on the right hand of God." Mark xvi, 19. "And when he (Jesus) had said these things, as they were looking, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight." Acts i. 9.

These three are all the persons referred to in all the Bible as going to heaven, and they all bodily, and not as disembodied spirits; two of them never saw death, the third died, was buried and rose again from the dead, before he ascended to heaven.

But the patriarchs, prophets, and all the saints who have died, still remain in darkness, and in silence, waiting for the trumpet to sound when they shall come forth from among the dead and shall be caught up with the living saints to meet the Lord in the air. And the wicked with the beasts of the field; "all go to one place: all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again." So the wise man asked the question, "Who knoweth the spirit of man, whether it goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast whether it goeth downward to the earth?" Eccle. xix. 20. R. V.

When Abraham died, he was buried. See Gen. xxv. 8-10. When Moses died, he too was buried. See Deut. xxxiv. 6. David also slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David, 1 Kings ii. 10.

On the day of Pentecost, Peter said, "David has not ascended into the heavens," Acts ii. 34.

We can enumerate a large catalogue of names, whose house is the grave, and the grave will be their house until "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible. 1 Cor. xv. 52.

So "death is not a friend, carrying us home to heaven," as we are told by the clergy, but it is an enemy according to the divine record, and death will hold all in its embrace until Jesus who "abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" shall come "For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet, the last enemy that shall be abolished is Death." Then at the resurrection the saints will be raised immortal and shall ascend bodily to meet the Lord in the air.

Therefore those teachers who advocate death as a friend, are like Job's "Miserable comforters." Job xvi. 2. To whom he said, "My spirit is consumed, my days are extinct. The grave is ready for me. Job xvii. 1. R V.

Dear Restitution:

The truth seems to move slowly yet it cannot but give back soon. I went afoot across Henderson Co., about twenty-three miles, to the Church of God, called by the name of Gallimore Gap. I tried to prove by written word that we as a called out people must be ready. My text was, "Set thy house in order for thou shalt die and not live." Brother E. M. Anderson preached about the two Covenants in a more interesting way than common. By his able and logical contention for the truth at that place he has attracted many of their orthodox neighbors to attend his preaching of the word. Brethren of the Ore Edith rest assured that Brother Anderson gives no uncertain sound. I feel glad that I can tell all your readers that at that Church, though small, there are some good and faithful ones. I cannot forget the names of Brother Manning Case and his wife Amanda, who are certainly good and faithful workers for the truth. A good proof of their "Faith" is their children who seem to be so intelligent in the Bible faith and have already shown their belief by two of them putting on Christ by baptism. Their oldest Son, Willie Case, not yet eighteen years old, and the second girl, Nina, not sixteen, have been immersed out of old Adam into Christ, the new and living Adam. Their oldest girl will, they think, obey soon. Brethren, these children excel a great many of their neighbors. The truth is mighty and will prevail, error cannot control nor stop the truth. It is my wish for all your readers, to always be ready, so we can meet those at Gallimore Gap, and all the faithful in the kingdom.

Miscellaneous.

The Vatican Palace.

In the first place, the Vatican is the largest palace in the world. It stands at right angles to the basilica of St. Peter, which it joins on the right as one faces the wonderful church. The Vatican in the growth of years and of centuries, having been again and again enlarged, beautified and enriched by successive popes, until it now covers many acres of ground, has twenty courts and more than eleven thousand halls, chapels, saloons and private apartments. In it are gathered many of the most noted works of art known to the world; its immense library is celebrated for the richness of its treasures in literature; its gardens are cultivated in the best style of the art, and its galleries and loggie contain many of the masterpieces of the most renowned painters of all the ages. It is here that the Pope has his apartments; over this immense pile he is supreme. Swiss soldiers, in gaudy attire, guard it by night and by day. How many rooms the Pope himself occupies or uses, it is doubtful if even he himself knows; and moreover it is doubtful if he has ever been in half of those contained within the walls, or has seen all the wonders and curiosities which they contain. From its windows he looks out upon the gardens, the city of Rome, over the Campagna and away to the Alban hills. It can be readily understood that to keep such a building in repair and in order requires the labor of a vast horde of people; but how many of them are women, and in just what relation these stand to the Pope, it is probable that no one outside of the walls knows, or can know. The Pope himself is an old man, and few besides old men have ever been elected to the high office; but many of those serving him there are young men. A small army of men and a great host of women are in and around St. Peter's, and the roof is covered with residences of families to such an extent that it looks like a considerable village. In the immediate vicinity of St. Peter's and the Vatican, there are about 2,600 monks and about 1,100 nuns; and only a few rods away, between the "piazza" of the church and the Tiber, is a noted asylum devoted to the care of infant children whose parents are not known. In the outer wall of this building is a window with a peculiar shutter. It is in the form of a cylinder, and shuts out the gaze of those who would peer within; but by pressing it with the hand and turning the cylinder on its axis, it presents a concave space in which an infant can be laid, and there, by turning the cylinder, the child is turned inside of the building, and no one within can ever know whence the infant came, who was its mother or people must be ready. My text was, "Set thy house in order for thou shalt die and not live." Brother E. M. Anderson preached about the two Covenants in a more interesting way than common. By his able and logical contention for the truth at that place he has attracted many of their orthodox neighbors to attend his preaching of the word. ### Another Blow at Evolution.

Theologians, scientists, and philosophers are greatly excited over a speech recently delivered by that renowned scientist, Prof. Virchow, of Germany, before the congress of scientists at Wiesbaden. The surprise is fully equal to that which would be occasioned by the explosion of a dynamite bomb in a fashionable club-room. Prof. Virchow is, or has been, a member of the legislative bodies of both Germany and Prussia, and his reputation as a pathologist, microscopist and general scientist, is probably second to that of few men now living. He has been referred to as the ultimate authority in the cancerous affection of the throat of the present Crown Prince of Germany. To this congress Prof. Virchow declared that the Darwinian doctrine of the transmutation of species and of mechanical evolution, the theories upon which it is now sought to construct so much science and a great deal of morality, and which has become very unpopular, if not a sign of dense ignorance, to doubt, are fundamentally false, unscientific, and impossible; and that science can no longer afford to move along a line which seeks to construct its phenomena upon imaginary and impossible bases. These unqualified declarations from so eminent a source, one entitled by his unquestionable scientific attainments to speak authoritatively, will probably cause a halt in the march of evolutionism, a discarding of some of its assumptions and speculations, and a reconstruction of many of its teachings upon a sounder basis.—The Interior.

A Letter to Jews.

Dear Brethren:

You have found fault with myself and others for trying to make you see that Christianity is the true Judaism. In this fair, not only do general principles that every man should try to promote his own views if he is honest in them, but also be the more special ground of a sincere love which we bear to our Jewish brethren, actuated by which we address you?

We believe that you are God's chosen people, and we believe that he has a great glory in store for you. We hold dear your own Scriptures, and accept every word of them as heavens' own light. Further than that, the New Testament, which we also accept, was written by Jews, and the Jesus of Nazareth, whom that Testament shows to us as the Son of God and Messiah, was a Jew. Our whole Christianity was born of Judaism, and we hold that it is its legitimate flower and fruit from the Abrahamic root. We see the Old and New Testaments as one revelation of a great substituted sacrifice for sin, the Lamb of God, "by whose stripes we are now healed."

Now, is it fair to find fault with us when we endeavor to show the reasons of our belief to our Jewish brethren, that they may rejoice with us in the fulfilment of Jewish prophecies, in which fulfilment is peace to every sinner's soul? Why should our motives be impunged and our characters slandered? Why should malice and hatred be stirred up in our hearts? Let us leave to low-minded men all this business of prejudice and contumely, and, as humble believers in the God of Abraham, stand on the ground of the brotherly love according to the Scripture which we all revere "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." It is only in that love we long to see you recognising the glorious Messiah who has died for the sin of the world.—Howard Crosby, in Hebrew Christian.

Grove Meeting and Conference.

The Lord willing there will be a Grove Meeting and Conference at the Watkins Flowing Wells 4 miles South of Story City, Story County, Ia., commencing on Friday evening June 8, and continue until Sunday evening June 10, 1888.

This meeting has three purposes in view. (1) A reunion of the brethren of this and adjoining States. (2) To compare views, investigate Bible doctrines, promote personal holiness and strengthen each other in the Christian life, and (3) to preach the gospel to the people.

WHO OUGHT TO COME.

Every preacher of the gospel however poor he may be, every believer in the gospel, every isolated, lonely, tired, discouraged one, every one whose hope is bright, every one to whom the way seems dark, every one who has lost business or property, every one who is struggling to keep the faith, every one who is so crowded with work that he feels he has not the time to spare, you of all others ought to come; every one to whom God has given success in life and good health, every one who has lost health, ought to come, and while you drink the mineral water of these flowing wells you may drink more deeply of the water of life, for some how or other righteousness and good health are harmoniously mingled, you ought all to come.

Don't begin to look for excuses, but overcome every objection and come. We want to meet you all. Let this be the event of the season. Begin to prepare for it now, arrange business, farming, household work so that you can leave them. If we cannot spend a few days now for conference, instruction and spiritual good, how can we ever go up to Jerusalem once every year by and by? Ezek. xiv. 16-18. Remember the time and come.

WHAT TO BRING.

Come with the Spirit of the Master.
Bring the Bible.
Bring the wife and children.

If you come by R. R. bring a tent and bedding. If you have no tent bring a bolt of sheeting, some wool-twine or binding-twine, a needle and thread, and make a temporary tent after you get there. There need none of the sheeting be wasted for it can be used in the family afterward.

If you come with team bring the covered wagon, bedding and provision. Bring a few dishes and other things that you will need. Your wagon will be your home.

REMEMBER

That you are to be self-sustaining if you come to this meeting, you are to camp for a week and take care of yourself. Bread and butter can be had at Story City, and you will be expected to look after yourself. If you are disposed to complain stop and think of those worthies who "wandered about in sheep skins and goat skins being des[illegible] for the form of worship [illegible] to meet together under circumstances as favorable as these. May it is a duty not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together. Again we say come.

For any further information about the meeting address A. J. Eychaner, Marshalltown, Ia.

Last year our June meeting was held at the above named place, and brother Watkins sustained the burden but he cannot afford to, and this year we ought not to let him do it.

Come, enjoy with us the camp, the mineral water, the boat ride, the preaching and the social meeting for one week.

A. J. EYCHANER.

Dear Restitution:

As a reader of THE RESTITUTION allow me to say just a few words. Having read several articles in THE RESTITUTION on the time of The Man of Sin, allow me to suggest, that there will soon be a marriage between the Greek (Russian) church, and the Roman. Then she will say "I sit a queen and am no widow." About the time the Czar is taking Constantinople. Then look for the two horned beast, Rev. xiii. 11, "and he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him." The Roman Church received her power from Constantinople. Then comes the slaughter of Jews and Mohammedans.

They will do their miracles, their union being the image, Rev. xviii. 8. Therefore shall her plagues come in one day.

GEO. S. BRIGGS.

[We give our brother's suggestion a place, but have our doubts about the Greek ever marrying the old harlot. While the Greek has no virtue to boast of he will hardly get down low enough to form a union so scandalously disreputable.—ED. RES.]

Dear Restitution:

Perhaps it may be interesting to some to know that we are still trying here in Kansas, to do something for the Master. After several years of patient waiting we have succeeded in forming a little class of eleven members, four of them young and new beginners, baptised by Bro. Chapman. We should be exceedingly glad if it could be arranged so that we could be united with a Conference within a reasonable distance, and have a meeting with us soon. We have a good school house to hold meetings in. Perhaps we could unite with the Conference of S. W. Nebraska. We will be glad to confer with some of those brethren by letter. Please address me at Roscoe, Kansas.

Yours waiting for the Master.

Announcements.

The Third Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana, will convene at the Antioch Meeting-house, five miles south of Plymouth, and three miles north of Argos, on Friday, June 8, 1888, and continue over Sunday following. Organized Churches throughout the State are requested to be represented by delegates; but all who can, whether appointed delegates or not, and all isolated ones, are cordially invited to this meeting at Old Antioch. The best meeting of the whole year is held at this place—time is on the wing, brethren, and this may be the last meeting at Antioch. So let every one who can possibly do so come to this gathering. Come to transact business connected with the cause of the Master. Come, and receive the blessings that are always in store for those who do their duty.

DIED.

BARNES.—At his residence near Black's Station, Yolo Co., Cal., April 11, 1888, Silas P. Barnes, aged 83 years, 1 month and 4 days.

Mr. Barnes was born in Dearing, New Hampshire, March 7, 1805. At the early age of 17 he began life's battle for himself. He made his way to Boston, where he began with the lowly, but being active and energetic, in a few years he found himself one of the prominent business men of that city. He was married in 1832 to Miss Olive Chapman by whom nine children were born, three daughters and six sons, of whom only four survive him. He came to California in 1854 where he has since resided, and successfully followed farming until the time of his death. About sixteen years ago he was led to embrace the Abrahamic faith in the kingdom of God and conditional immortality through Christ the seed royal of the covenant. He came to his grave in full age like a shock of corn in its season fully prepared for the life of the "Age to Come," thankful for the length of days God had given him. A large concourse of friends and relatives, who gave evidence by their tears of sorrow how highly he was esteemed, was in attendance. He maintained a good Christian character to the last. We laid him to rest, awaiting the resurrection of the just.

Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep.

CHRISTIAN GRACES.

There is a faith some hearts may know,
Built not on shifting sand,
That 'mid the storms of earthly woe
Can grasp a helping hand:
The rock of faith's foundation stone,
Is Christ the Lord, and he alone.

All hope for an eternity,
Who draw this fleeting breath,
That robs the grave of victory,
And takes the sting from death;
The purest hope to mortals given
Is that which anchors us to heaven.

Sweet charity, though deemed so rare,
With those who walk alone,
Her bounteous cloak will ever share,
Nor give for bread a stone.
Truly of heaven-born graces, three,
The best is perfect charity.

THE HUGUENOTS.

BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY AND THE EDICT OF NANTES.

Charles IX., that crowned enigma, another son and dupe of Catharine de Medici, came to the throne in 1560, aged ten years. The Venetian Ambassador, coming to court, cried in the language of the Bible, "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child!" Prophetic words; for the throne of Charles IX. cast the most woful shadows that ever fell upon France.

There soon occurred the wholesale butchery of the Protestants of Vassy by the Duke of Guise in person. The terrible example was followed elsewhere, until the land was in flames of internecine war. Condé and Coligny threw down the gauntlet; the King of Navarre, however, deserted to the Romish side. Thousands fell at the battles of Rosen and Dreux. A peace was patched up, only to break out again in 1567. Then Spain came to the help of the Catholic party in France; but at St. Denis the Huguenots were victors, and exacted some liberties by threatening to take Paris itself. But the hands of the Court party were too deep in blood to lift them out. Ten thousand were massacred during the six months of pretended peace. Conspiracy was weaving about Condé and Coligny. They left their estates and fled with their families. One night they crossed the Loire with their households, singing the 114th Psalm, "When Israel went out of Egypt," and shut themselves up in Rochelle, which became the refuge of the Protestant nobles, the secular bulwark of French Protestantism as Geneva was its intellectual and spiritual defence. At Rochelle it sharpened its sword; at Geneva its pen. From Rochelle Condé and Coligny sallied forth. Their following was 20,000. The Catholics matched them at Jarnac. Condé with a few horsemen cut his way deep into the enemy's crowded ranks. With one arm crushed, and one leg broken in the melee, he pointed to his wounds, then to his banner, on which was the device, "Sweet is danger for Christ and fatherland!" then shouting, "Nobles of France; this is the desired moment! Remember how Louis de Bourbon enters battle for Christ and fatherland!" he lowered his head and led the charge of three hundred upon thrice the number of the enemy's lances. He swept everything before him. His horse killed, he was too weak to mount a fresh one. The enemy, reinforced, returned the charge. Alone, with his back against a tree, his broken leg bent upon the ground, he fought with such valor that his foes refused longer to contend with him; but a wretched coward shot him from behind. The battle was lost. The Catholic joy over Condé's death was celebrated with a Te Deum at Court and in all the churches. The Pope himself carried the captured banners to St. Peter's church in Rome.

When Jeanne D'Albert, the Queen of Navarre, heard of Condé's death, she took her son Henry, fifteen years old, afterward Henry IV., and Condé's son, seventeen years old, and brought them to the army. The young Henrys made a vow like Jonathan and David, saying to each other, "Your cause is mine, your interests are mine. I swear on my soul, honor and life to be wholly yours." Henceforth their double signature was affixed to the official documents of the reformed party. The medals of the patriots bore the image of the Queen of Navarre with the legend, "Alone, and with the rest, for God, the king, the laws, and peace." Bravely did Coligny and his two Henrys press the war. With shattered forces he forged his way through fresh armies of foes until he threatened Paris. Then came peace with allowance of Protestant liberties. But it was only the velvet on the paw of the lion, Catharine de Medici. She was scheming the most infernal plot that ever rose so high above the soldiers of hell as to be executed on earth. Coligny was invited to Court. The king called him "my father." Perhaps Charles IX. was honest in wishing reconciliation. Coligny was certainly frank, and begged the king to forsake the Spanish league and ally himself with the great Protestant countries, England and the Netherlands. It was the counsel of a far-seeing statesman, and would have made France the dominant nation of Europe. The king, no doubt, felt the touch of the sublime spirit of his great-hearted counsellor. Catharine and the Guises felt it too, but could not endure it. "How can the land be rid of him and his followings? War has failed. What if all the heads of French Protestantism could be got together and taken off at one blow!" The Huguenot chiefs were invited to Paris to be present at a marriage arranged between young Henry of Navarre and Margaret of Valois. A wretch was hired to assassinate Coligny. The ball, not well aimed, only wounded him. The king, Catharine de Medici and her two other sons, visited the Admiral in his sick chamber; an act of hypocrisy, which is perhaps unparalleled in the annals of deceit, unless we take into said annals those of the jungle, where the boa licks the victim he is about to swallow. The honest old Admiral drew the king's head close to his and warned him of his mother's craft, and the woe it was preparing for France. The next day there was a conference of the royal family, which was so interesting that it was continued until midnight. The king was entreated to do something; he hesitated, until in impatience he rose and said, "By God's death, since you think proper to kill the Admiral, I consent; but all of the Huguenots in Paris as well, in order that there remain not one to reproach me afterwards! Give the orders at once!" And the bell of St. Germain-l'Auxerrois struck. Coligny's door was burst open, and the wounded man impaled upon a huge hunting spear. "Behmet have you done it?" cried the impatient Duke of Guise, from the courtyard below. They threw the body from the window. "Faith, 'tis he, sure enough," said Guise, and hasted away. They cut off Coligny's head and brought it to the queen mother, as John the Baptist's head was brought to Herodias. St. Bartholomew massacre was well inaugurated, nor did it cease until the Seine floated thousands of dead bodies on its crimsoned tide to the sea. Other cities followed the example of Paris, and at least twenty thousand Protestant victims fell throughout France. When the news reached Rome, the Pope ordered a Te Deum, and a medal to be struck, having his own head on the one side, and on the other an image of the destroying angel with the words, "Hugonotorum Strages." He ordered also a historical painting of the slaughter to be executed by Vasari, for the walls of the Vatican, with the inscription, "Pontifex Colignii necem probat." But elsewhere the slaughter awakened horror, and a cry of shame went up over the world.

King Charles besieged Rochelle with an army of forty thousand, but the brave defenders held out, and the Protestant cause was stronger than ever before. Two years after the massacre, in 1574, Charles IX. died, a crazy bigot or a mere imbecile—which? History cannot decide.

The Duke of Anjou, another son of Catherine de Medici, came to the throne as Henry III. During his reign of fifteen years France may be said to have been "sobering off" after having been drunk with blood. One of the chief results of the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day was the rise of a liberal party among the Catholics, whose motto might have been "Live and let live!" But against this came the League, a combination of ultra-Catholics, under patronage of the Pope, and with the help of Phillip II. of Spain, to stamp out Protestantism and prevent the crown of France going to the King of Navarre, who since the tigress Catherine had no more whelps, was next heir. The new king sided rather with the liberal Catholics, and entered into friendly relations with Henry of Navarre. Together they fought in the field as good friends as was possible for the most contemptible man and the most magnanimous man of France to be. On the death of Henry III. Navarre determined to fight his way to the throne. The schoolboys know the story, especially of the battle of Ivry, before which he gave orders, "My children, if you lose sight of your colors rally to my white plume. You will always find it in the path to honor and glory." Nothing could withstand him. He could ride up the steps of the throne. But should he?

Here was a problem. Less than a quarter of the people of France were Protestant. He could not maintain his power except by force, and he was only one to four. If he admitted kingship the League would triumph and Protestantism be exterminated. Henry has been blamed for his decision, but there was shrewd policy in it, if not such straightforward honesty as we could wish. He decided to formally enter the Catholic communion. He took the Romish creed, cut from it whatever conflicted with the Biblical belief, and subscribed to so much as remained. He assumed the name of Catholic, but pledged the protection and liberty of Protestantism. The liberal Catholics and the bulk of the Huguenots were satisfied. Extremists of both parties were gradually won by the personal nobility of the king; and, though eighteen attempts were made assassinate him, he for twenty-one years was one of the best loved kings that ever sat upon a throne. He was devout. In the heat of battle he paused, threw the reins upon his horse's neck, clasped his hands and prayed, "O God, thou knowest my thoughts, and thou seest to the very bottom of my heart; if it be for my people's good that I keep the crown favor my cause. Otherwise, O God, let me die in the midst of these brave soldiers who give their lives for me." The grand act of his reign was the giving of the Edict of Nantes, the Magna Charta of Protestant liberty in France, which lasted for nearly one hundred years; repealed in 1685, when the Huguenots were driven from France, to enrich other countries with their arts, their industries and faith.—James M. Ludlow, in New York Observer.

"Prayer is Appointed to Convey the Blessings God Designs to Give."

"No time to pray!
What fear! so pure, so clean within,
That needeth not some check from sin,
Needs not to pray?"

When one considers the estimate put on the act of prayer, is it not strange that our Lord did not say more about it? Indeed it would appear that he had well nigh omitted any allusion to it until his attention is called to it by his disciples, "Lord teach us how to pray as John taught his disciples."

In my church (the M. E.) the act of prayer rates in importance with "the collection." Cut either of these and you cut a main artery. It has been said Methodists excel in prayer, that is, can do more of it, can utilize it better, than other church people. I do not think Methodist prayer is any better to the square inch than any other prayer.

One of the many things I have learned since I have been reading THE RESTITUTION is the importance of faith in securing, making our own, the blessings God designs for the race.

A few nights ago at the "Class Meeting" a new member; after speaking of certain difficulties in the way, etc., the leader advised him "take it to the Lord in prayer." (This is the one-all in my church.)

Quick as a flash my thoughts flew to Ireland, and I asked myself, What has prayer done for Ireland? Don't papists pray enough? Why they are at it from Monday morning until Sunday night, without any visible improvement to mind, body or estate. The same is true of my own church. Those members who have not missed a meeting for prayer, well, say for ten years, are just as ignorant of God's word today as they were ten years ago.

They have become familiar with the Hymnal, they know a number of verses by heart in the Hymn Book, but not one verse in the Book for which they profess so much reverence, the book which contains God's word. If they would carefully study that book of wisdom they would learn that much of the doggerel we sing in our meetings is not only silly, but worse. They cover up, mislead, hide the truth, so plainly to be seen on every page of God's book.

"Prayer appointed to convey" indeed. The unspeakable gift of eternal life, the best in all the catalogue, is the work of Jesus, is his gift to the race. We are, I know, required to pray for it in my church; but in all the gospels we are assured that it is ours by the exercise of faith, not prayer. Not that prayer has no place in the Christian life, I just mean it has no place here. "By grace are ye saved, through faith," etc., not through prayer. Not the slightest hint in our Lord's prayer about praying for salvation.

Paul "what must I do to be saved?" Pray? No, "believe on the Lord Jesus," etc. This is what Paul told his jailor. My class leader would have told him, "take it to the Lord in prayer." How very few even in our Protestant churches, understand the law of grace, or justification by faith. Justification by prayer, by fasting, by visitation, by gifts of money, food or clothing to the poor, by hearing sermons, by reading the Bible as an act of mortification! By something I can do myself is what would please many. There is nothing which so completely takes the self-consequence out of us, as God's method of justifying us by faith. How the king and the beggar have to meet. God asks none of us any personal assistance. If prayer was appointed to convey this greatest of God's gifts, my church would not be satisfied with an equitable portion of it. By virtue of their long prayers, they would want to make "a corner" in God's free grace. (Have a preferred claim somehow.) When the day of reckoning comes, my church will have much to answer. Professedly they believe in being saved by grace through faith, but they do not practice what they preach. Bookbinders and others are exhorted to kneel an hour or so in public at a "front bench," praying for salvation instead of taking God at his word and believing for it. If I intended to make a friend a valuable gift, and notified him of my purpose, if he were then to attack me every day, and several times each day about it, it is very likely, with my present mind, I would change my purpose and bestow my gift on some one with better manners.

No wonder so many Methodists have such a hard time in "getting religion." They want their prayer answered, while God wants to answer their faith. "Believest thou that I can do this?" "Be it unto thee according to thy faith." "I have not seen such faith, not even in Israel." "O ye of little faith." "All things are possible unto him that believeth." "When the Son of Man cometh will he find faith on the earth?" "Abraham believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness."

Paul asked his fellow Christians to unite with him in prayer for success in preaching; we may also pray for recovery from sickness, for pardon, for protection from contagious disease, from evil men, etc., etc. Prayer, though, without faith, is worthless. Prayer cannot stand alone, but faith can. Faith in God's promises is the equipment by means of which we overcome the world and all other opposition that may dispute our progress.

At the meeting I have already alluded to our leader spoke of the beautiful work of "helping others on their way to heaven." I told him I thought a much better work would be to instruct those who needed instruction, and so improve their usefulness to others here and now. Developing character, teaching, is the work God wants the church to engage in. Helping poor sinners on their way to heaven is not mentioned in any part of the Bible.

Methodists are very hard to please in the matter of awards. They are not satisfied with the earth, nor with a life of service. As soon as they enlist they begin to whine about getting home—want to be mustered out right away. They want to get home to heaven right away off, and let the heathen continue bowing to stocks and stones. But I must stop to keep from getting away from my topic, viz., faith in God, rather than in prayer. The prayer of faith invoking the divine presence and things in harmony with the divine will, must be ever pleasing to our Father in heaven, but too much mediation is a big trance rather than a help in obtaining divine favor.

Every little evangelist now on the road wants the people to hold up their hands pleadingly for his prayers. Like Rome's Peter, he too has a key which opens or closes the door to heaven. All this to me is but pious nonsense. A Methodist prayer as an article of merchandise is as impotent as a Popish prayer. Jesus is the World's Advocate and he is sufficient.

The Golden Rule, Boston, says: Protestants will do well to bear in mind the warning of Father Chiniquy, who tells us that "the priests of Rome themselves boast that more than half of the pupils of the nuns are the children of Protestants, and that seventenths of those Protestant children, sooner or later, become the firmest disciples and the true pillars of popery in the United States." See notice elsewhere of tracts by Bro. McLauchlan. You will find these tracts excellent, and the price is so low as to be but cost of postage. Every brother or sister in the land should at once secure a supply of these works, and hand one every friend who will read them. Our preaching brethren should each one have them to hand to interested inquirers in their audiences. Send for them brethren, and get them out into the field to work.

I WONDER WHY.

I wonder why this world's good things
Should fall in such unequal shares;
Why some should taste of all the joys,
And others only feel the cares!
I wonder why the sunshine bright
Should fall in paths some people tread,
While others shiver in the shade
Of clouds that gather overhead!

"I wonder why the trees that hang
So full of luscious fruit should grow
Only where some may reach and eat,
While others faint and thirsty go?
Why should sweet flowers bloom for some,
For others only thorns be found?
And some grow rich on fruitful earth,
While others till but barren ground?

"I wonder why the hearts of some
O'erflow with joy and happiness,
While others go their lonely way
Unblest with aught of tenderness?
I wonder why the eyes of some
Should ne'er be moistened with a tear,
While others weep from morn till night,
Their hearts so crushed with sorrow here?

"Ah well! we may not know indeed
The ways, the wherefores of each one;
But this we know—there's One who sees
And watches us through joy or strife.
Each life its mission here fulfils,
And only he may know the end,
And loving him we may be strong,
Though storm or sunshine he may send."

BAILEYVILLE, Ill.

Dear Little Workers:

Your earnest industry to understand the precious things in the Scriptures reminds me of a bee-hive, each gathering and some living from the flowers of immortal bloom hid in God's word. It is written, "The bee is little among that which flies, but her fruit is the sweetest of all things." Go on my dear little workers, and if God should spare you to become old, you will always be so thankful that you remembered your Creator in the days of your youth.

Would that I could nourish you as your worthy teacher, Auntie Wince, does; she seems to know just how to talk to you. Since I wrote my last letter for the Youth's Column, I have been bereaved of my husband. His long sickness previous to his death hindered my pen. This circumstance has caused me to remove to the home of my son, whose three dear little ones I want to tell you about. They are exceedingly delighted to hear me read of the Little Workers, in THE RESTITUTION, and often wish they could come to your pleasant meetings. Nearly every morning the oldest girl of eight years writes a verse from God's blessed word on the blackboard, which is in the dining room. This they learn, and it is astonishing how much they have stored up in their tender minds. They have also learnt a sweet prayer David used to say, and every morning and evening they all bend the knee together, Grandma kneeling with them, and in solemn earnestness they lift their infant voices to him who once took the little ones in his arms and blessed them. The youngest, five years old, often says, Grandma, you talk to God first, and ask him to hear us. Perhaps some of my dear little workers would like to hear their prayer:

"O Lord, teach us to pray. Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me. Behold thou desirest truth in the inward parts. Search me, O God, and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. Let thy blessing rest on my father and mother. For the Redeemer's sake. Amen."

Before they fall asleep I tell them some sweet story in the Bible which they love to hear, and in the morning I refresh their memory by asking them questions. It is pleasant to hear them contrast the things of the present time with the glorious things to be revealed in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Affectionately yours,

E. COFFMAN.

THE STORY OF ISAAC LEVINSOHN.

One day, during the factory dinner hour, I passed by a Protestant Church, the door of which was open, and, tempted by curiosity, I entered. There were no pictures, no graven images there, as I had been accustomed to see in the Christian Churches in my native land; and, though I did not understand the service, yet its simplicity struck me so much that I almost began to think I was in some kind of a Jewish synagogue, and not in a Christian Church at all.

On returning to my work, I could not forget what I had seen, and at length asked one of my friends if he had ever been in such a building.

"What! in a Christian Church!" said he. "I have never been into one, and never mean to do so. I hope you have not been into such a place; now have you?"

I was afraid to confess, yet dared not deny, and was therefore silent in answer. My friend's suspicions were aroused, and I was obliged to tell the truth, adding that I would not see what harm I had done. Upon this my friend began to curse me for saying a word in favor of a Christian Church, and made me promise I would not enter one again.

A few days passed by, and once more, in my dinner hour, I passed by the church, the door of which was again open, but I dared not break my promise, though I felt a great desire to enter the building. I stood in the street, watching the door, for the hour, and then returned dumbfounded to my work.

For the rest of that day I regretted not having gone in, and for some time after I remained in a low and melancholy state. At last I made up my mind that go to the church I would, and see for myself what it was like, but determined to keep my movements secret. Many times did I attend the service, and was much impressed by the solemnity and earnestness of the preacher, and the manner in which the service was conducted, and how I wished I could understand the words which fell from the lips of him who spoke so fervently!

One day there sat not far from me in the church a gentleman, whom I took to be a Jew. I was afraid he was an agent sent by my friends to spy me out, and I trembled lest I should be discovered, and that my father should hear I had been into a church of the Christians, whom he detested and hated with all his heart, even as I did. However, observing the gentleman reading the prayers, I was relieved, and judged he was one of the worshipers.

When the service was over, I remained a few moments in the pew. When this gentleman caught sight of me, he at once made his way to me, and addressed me in Hebrew, saying, "Atta Jehudah achi?" ("Are you a Jew, my brother?")

I was startled, and, seeing he was indeed a Jew, thought, after all, this is not a Christian Church, but the place of worship of some new sect of Jews—perhaps the reformed Jews.

I answered him, "Ani Jehudah" ("I am a Jew"), whereon he shook hands with me, and commenced speaking in German. He gave me his address on bidding me farewell, but I destroyed it, lest my Jewish friends should see it.

Several days passed by, and, hoping to see the gentleman again, I made my way once more to the church, and there found him, as before.

On the service being ended, he again spoke to me, asking what my circumstances were, whence I came, and who were my parents. He was so kind and generous in speaking with me that I opened my heart to him, and told him exactly why I had left my native land, and how that I sought to be saved, and to know the God of Israel. I explained to him how that since I had left home my soul had been cast down—that ever since I began to seek the truth I had but felt I was lost—adding, "I know I want something, but do not know what it is."

"Are you going mad?" said he.

"If the truth be told, I am mad," was my reply.

Then he smiled, and said, "I hope you will get much worse."

Surprised and pained at the unkind answer, I asked him what he meant, upon which he said that a few years ago he had been in the same state of mind, that he had left his native land, Austria, and his father, mother, relatives and friends, and that he did really nearly go mad for misery of soul, but that he now thanked God for that madness, for God had given him wisdom and everlasting satisfaction.

Now for some years I had been seeking for rest of soul, and here stood before my eyes, for the first time, a man who could say he himself had everlasting satisfaction. My whole soul was filled with intense desire to know what he meant—what it was that he had, which neither my parents nor my Rabbi in Kovno, nor my friends in Germany or in England possessed. "Tell me all about it," I cried.

He then propounded several questions concerning the Messiah, which I had often wished to understand. He also quoted several portions of the Holy Writ, which had ever seemed to me hard to explain. In fact nearly all his questions were the very same as those I had put to my Rabbi in Kovno and to my beloved father, and which neither of them could satisfactorily answer. All this filled me with astonishment, for I was in the presence of a man who had evidently had the same difficulties as myself, and I was very pleased in thinking I should now have these difficulties cleared up.

This gentleman then bade me explain the saying in the Talmud, "They of the school of Elijah have taught that the world exists for six thousand years, then shall it fall into ruin, and only the Lord will be exalted in that day."

HE MADE THE STARS ALSO.—Gen. 1, 16.

So crowded is yon boundless space
The stars seem pressed for room,
Yet each with its peculiar grace
Drops thro' this nether gloom
A beam from else an empty place.

What glorious streams of stellar light
Rush where I walk alone!
How studded are those arches bright,
Where sits upon her throne
The radiant Queen of Night!

There's not a star-flake in the drifts
Which bank the milky way,
But thro' yon silvery net-work sifts,
And on the feet that stray
Its far-off trembling lifts.

Nor stays one star its trembling ray
Because 'tis weak and small,
But gladly lights my lonely way
And fain its beam lets fall,
And simply shines because it may.

The lamp I hold is weak and small
Amid earth's moral night,
Sometimes I feel it it should fall.
No one would miss my light,
Or ever know it shined at all.

And yet should none my taper mark,
Or know that it is mine,
I still must let my slender spark
Upon the dark world shine;
And shine because it is so dark.

My Seventh Day Sabbath Experience. No. 2.

Some years ago Eld. Ephriam Miller and myself held a council together and agreed to meet each other on Climax Prairie or near by and so on the Jewish Sabbath go down to Battle Creek, 14 miles distant, and keep the Sabbath with the Sabbatarians. So we met on Friday night at the place appointed, and on Saturday morning went down to Battle Creek, called on Bro. Abraham Dodge, a man with whom we had formed a very intimate acquaintance, put out our horses, got a lunch and then repaired to church, where an appointment had been made at 12 o'clock which was in their church. Some forty or fifty Sabbath people were present with two local preachers, and Uriah Smith the resident Editor of the Review and Herald. Eld. Kellogg the local preacher took the stand and tried to preach, and took for his text 1 Cor. ii. 1, 2; and after making some few remarks became wonderfully embarrassed, turned pale and stopped, and after standing silent a moment, he cried out to his congregation, brethren there are some dark spirits present. Bro. Miller and myself sat in the second seat from the pulpit and we realized that he considered that we were the dark spirits which stood in his way, and after a moment of silence he said, brethren we must pray. Then after another silence he spoke out and said, the Lord will give us the victory, the Lord will give us the victory. Then another silence, the he quoted his text, again but he could not preach from his text, for the dark spirits stood right in his way when he so signally failed on his text. He tried to tell us how he was initiated into the Sabbath question, but he was so wonderfully shut up and after standing in the pulpit some 10 or 15 minutes he sat down by giving liberty to the brethren to speak. Four of the members arose and spoke quite readily and when they were through a man gets up in the back part of the church, a large portly man with long heavy whiskers and says "Brethren this is the first time I ever met with you, but I have read about you through the Review and Herald." Said he "I have just sold out my possessions in Illinois and moved into this place. I have come here to worship with you, to make a sacrifice. I have come here to put all onto the altar, then addressing himself to the church exhorted them to do the same thing, put all onto the altar, and while talking he continued to raise his voice higher and higher till he was troubled to convey his thoughts, froth flowed out onto his long beard, and when on his highest key or strain the man that had tried to preach but could not on account of the dark spirits present, cried out to the Illinois man that was delivering his message on such a high key "That Spirit is not of the Lord and I rebuke it in the name of the Lord." The man dropped upon his seat muttering out some words like following as near as we could understand, I did not know that I was saying any thing wrong; upon this sharp rebuke they quickly dismissed the meeting. Bro. Ephraim Miller, my co-laborer arose, called the attention of the congregation and said, Brethren, Bro. Seymour and I have come to see and make you a visit and preach to you on the Sabbath question. Now as we have your pulpit and your ears to most part of the church brethren and sisters, will you not open your doors to us and allow us to preach to you on the Sabbath question. We have been reading your books and listening to your preachers and we conclude you have not got the truth on the question, so we would like to preach to you on that question for we have some new arguments that you probably have never thought of. Can we occupy your pulpit and have your attention? No, no was the decided reply, and Cyrenus Smith arose and said no, I object to giving them a hearing, and finally said as for my part I do not want to hear anybody preach in opposition to the law of God. I arose and said, we are not here to preach in opposition to the law of God, we are here to sustain it, but said I what Bro. Smith means by the Law of God is the ten commandments. Said I, I have yet to learn that the ten commandments are ever called a law at all in the whole range of God's revelation to man, and now if any one knows of any such evidence I would like to have them tell me where the chapter and verse is that says so. I waited for an answer although a large congregation of Sabbath keepers were present, two local preachers and the Editor Uriah Smith. No one attempted to produce any evidence. I arose again and said, Brethren do not be backward in presenting this testimony If you have any such. You say it is so, your books publish it and your paper, you sing it, pray it and teach it, now if you have any such testimony present it, for when you find it, it will have a tremendous influence over my mind, but none was presented, every mouth was silent as death. At this juncture of the meeting they closed and Bro. Dodge where we put up went to Daniel Hewit, one of their local preachers and asked him to invite us home with him to dinner. So we were invited and as we left the church Bro. Miller said to Brother Hewit, I have seen a great many bigoted Methodists but I never saw such a bigoted set as you are here in my life. As soon as we got to Bro. Hewit's dinner was rushed on to the table speedily, and when we had partaken of the hasty dinner, Bro. Hewit said to me, Alva is there any body in this place that believes as you do? Said I, I do not know of any. Well, said Bro. Hewit, we thought we would get dinner early so that you could be going. Said I, Bro. Hewit, We are not in a hurry, we are going to stay till we get ready to go. Bro. H. had been traveling over the country as a kind of colporter circulating his Sabbath Literature, visiting our brethren, getting his meals and lodgings free of expense, and I knew it. Hence the answer I gave him, but we had no desire to stay with him. So we donned our wraps and returned to Bro. Dodge's and tarried with him over night. After we retired we made up our minds as they had refused us their house and a hearing that we would visit all the Sabbath keepers at their houses and so shed what light we could among them. So after a refreshing sleep and rest, we arose in the morning for work, and when we had partaken of our breakfast, Bro. Dodge handed the Bible to Bro. Miller with the request for him to read and pray. Bro. Miller said, Bro. Dodge, I do not want you to ask me to read and pray in your family, you refused to call me Brother, you do not acknowledge me as a Christian, so I choose to pray under different circumstances, and while they were talking I got the impression that Bro. Dodge did not want that I should pray in his family. So I said Bro. Dodge do you refuse to let me pray in your family. No I will not refuse, but his answer came out in such a way I took it for granted he did not want I should, but Bro. Miller finally concluded to read and pray, and I followed and we had a good time praying with them. After prayer we called for our overcoats, hats, and mufflers, and enquired for Henry Lyon (M. E. Cornell's father-in-law) a man that both of us were well acquainted with, and had been for years, but he had been induced to sell his fine farm and home in or near Plymouth, Wayne Co., Michigan, and move to Battle Creek where the Sabbath fraternity could prey on his means, leaving his children without what really belonged to them.

The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional.
—BY—
FATHER CHINIQUY.

ITS REVELATIONS ARE APPALLING.

Painful and horrible are words too weak to express the things which he relates — things enough to rouse the stones to cry out against a system which brings forth such copies of Sodom and deadly poison to the Church, the family and society.

Cloth, 12mo, 296 pages, with Portrait and Biographical Notice of the Author; Price $1.00.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.
—BY—
A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is in the future as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth 12mo, 198 pages, paper, with portrait of the author. Price, 75 cents.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Westbee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprise, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar terms, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that its supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will find it solid with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $4.00. ### THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE CHAOTIC AGE.

Of the first, or Chaotic, age of creative work on the heavens and the earth little record remains for observation and study by the geologist and scientist, since its rock formations have undergone metamorphisms that have destroyed their original texture, during the long ages which have subsequently elapsed; those first deposits being uniformly gneiss rock and mica slate, which become disintegrated by attrition, moisture, heat, electricity, etc; then suspended as sediment in the waters covering the face of the earth, and finally deposited together with the organic remains of succeeding eras, as sedimentary strata such as remain now, peculiar to each particular era. One author (Hugh Miller) says of the rocks now under consideration "it is indeed doubtful if the human eye has ever beheld any part of the rocks that formed the original crust of the earth;"—and yet, the peculiar conditions pertaining to it, and the God-directed forces employed, may be traced almost as readily, theoretically, as can be those of the later ages, when subjected to direct examination.

That years developed into centuries and were extended into eras, and the eras into periods of vast duration; and that those periods were repeated to the accomplishment of the summary of the age and age-work till their extension was commensurate with the grand work to be accomplished, is scarcely doubtful, while the actual work wrought by creative energy is equally certain. That the earth in the beginning of creative labor upon it, was devoid of life, animal and vegetable, the lack of such remains in the Huronian and Laurentian strata of Upper Canada, transformed to stone in succeeding aions, clearly prove, while its present form and the clearly established fact that the great mass of the earth's substance remains, to the present time, in a molten condition, with only a comparatively thin covering of rocks and alluvium, as an external shell or crust, attest to its beginning and of the forces which were correlated to effect these grand results, and to the progress of the earth under creative guidance through the age, to a degree scarcely less concise and plain than the positive statements of the inspired penman as recorded in the first chapter of Genesis.

The Bible and scientific analogy agree that "in the beginning," (of creative work on earth), "the earth was without form and void, and darkness covered the face of the deep;"—that it was an unshaped, shapeless bulk of material probably larger, somewhat, than at present; destitute of vegetation, devoid of animal life, and powerless to effect any change in or of itself, since matter can only act as it is acted upon.

Scientific research has reached back to a period of the infinite past even far more remote than that with which the Mosaic record introduces the history of God-creative work on the earth, and referred to therein as the "In the beginning." The Nebular Hypothesis, which is almost universally accepted as true, teaches that the entire planetary system,—embracing the central sun of our solar system, the earth and all the other satellites, as well as the other planetary systems, each with its own central luminary, constituting the grand universe of worlds,—originally existed in a minutely subdivided gaseous condition, comprising in that form all the proximate and ultimate elements that now enter into the formation of the various planets (suns) and their satellites; yet occupying a much larger portion of unbounded space than at present; that the entirety of this space was fully occupied by these gaseous materials, the particles of which were mutually repellent,—resisting chemical union and consolidation. It teaches, also, that by a gradual condensation an agglomeration of nebulous matter was formed; that subsequently a central consolidation around separate centres gave a nucleus for each of the planetary bodies which was completed by further condensation, cohesive attraction and the force of gravitation;—each separate centre approximating to itself all the condensations within its sphere of individual attraction. In consequence of molecular and gravitating forces, each acquired axial motion, which when once induced would ever continue the same unless prevented by extraneous force. With a certain degree of condensation, molecular combination would be attained, and heat would result, which in turn would be overcome or restrained by radiation and intensity; bringing along with them further consolidation of the now separate masses, till instead of gasses, the elements would be resolved into central bulks of molten constituents of great density surrounded with those uncondensed gasses universally evolved by heat and retained in a gaseous form from masses of inorganic matter subjected to high temperatures.

Rotation, and the slight cohesion of the fluid matter, detaching portions from the central planetary bodies from time to time, strictly in obedience to the established principles of compound motion, would become satellites of the body from which they were projected,—each molten, and subject to the laws and mutations by which the parent-planet was affected.

That the earth had such an origin is evidenced by the following facts, to-wit:

1. By its annual motion, by which it passes entirely around the sun once every year.

2. By its diurnal motion, which is in the same direction with the sun's motion on its axis,—from west to east.

3. From the demonstrated fact that the vast bulk of the earth's interior is yet in a molten state.

4. The relative size, distance, and relation between the earth and sun proclaim its sun parentage.

5. The spectroscope indicates a striking uniformity in composition and elementary principles.

What then would have been the earth's status at the beginning of the first age, or period of creative work by the Almighty?

The plastic, molten material, entering into the earth's composition, hurled from its parental planet,—the sun,—just far enough for an exact equipoise between the tangential force of projection and the sun's attraction, in obedience to these two forces, became a perpetual satellite of the paternal orb, containing within itself and accompanied by, all the elements now entering into its composition, or in any wise connected with it.

It was a burning, seething, molten mass of matter, whirling through space in its orbit at the rate of more than 3000 miles per hour; as yet shapeless because cohesive attraction, rotation and gravitation had not yet given it its later spheroidal form. It is the nucleus of a world yet uncreated.

God's creative power exerts itself,—his Word goes forth,—conserved forces become correlated to accomplish his will, and the work of molding the molten mass begins. Creation begins. Revolving upon its center of gravity, performing a revolution once every 24 hours; with all preponderating elements tending to a common focus, the liquid mass becomes a sphere. One step has been taken for the production of a new world.

That which was without form and void assumes a form. The diurnal revolution of the plastic mass from west to east upon its pivotal center forces a larger portion of the material towards the equatorial circumference, with a corresponding subsidence or flattening at the poles, making of it an oblate spheroid.

The atomic elements (ultimate elements between 60 and 70 of which are now known in the laboratory of the chemist), including oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, nitrogen, sulphur, chlorine, etc., each rested in its own stratum determined by its specific gravity, temperature, etc., above the molten earth, till, becoming commingled, intermixed and combined by the earth's motions,—by the violent upheavals of earthquakes and earth convulsions,—by their change of position incident to variations of temperature,—and, by the peculiar magnetic and electric conditions of the age, various combinations were effected all tending towards the increased solidity of the earth in its selected form, and to the accomplishment of the Divine purpose of earth-creation. The separate atomic elements each having its own density, gravity, cohesion and elasticity,—its individual rotations to heat, to electricity and to magnetism, besides its chemical affinities, which form an endless maze of laws of combination, through which elements differing from every other are connected with each other in creation, awaited the constructive direction of Omnipotence to accomplish his design. Suppose the present aerial superstratum to have been filled with these substances resting conformably on the heated surface of the earth, with their constitution perfect, and their properties suitable to combination,—the earth still remains a chaos. They must be put in their places, and not where their properties would leave them. They must be commingled, finished, arranged and fitted into their places with the exactness and nicety of the most delicate mechanism, and in accordance with the will and purpose of the Supreme Architect of the ages.

Herein is the work of creative energy manifest.

Oxygen diluted with nitrogen then as now formed air,—an atmosphere heavily charged with noxious vapors. Oxygen chemically combined with hydrogen, atom to atom, yielded water, a new compound essentially different from either of its factors;—and so on through the interminable labyrinth of chemical and cosmical compounds, of which the earth and its inhabitants are now composed and which enters into the formation of all known substances.

The chaotic mass which commenced its separate career as a molten bulk of unorganized earth-materials, at once, by surface cooling began its process of rock-deposit. A larger of gneiss and mica slate rock soon formed over its surface, cooled to hardness by radiation into space, and latent absorption. Earthquakes rent the thin earth-crust, upheaving, submerging, dissolving the fragments of vast areas thus rent and torn, only to have the chasms refilled and the rocks replaced by thicker and firmer layers of the same material. Rocking and fissured the crust gradually thickened with the advance of unnoted years, centuries and eras of the chaotic periods to the termination of the age. Air and water in contact with its heated surface cooled the exterior of the earth only to afford, as steam, a dense, vaporous covering for it, miles in thickness; yet each atom of water converted to steam, and each particle of rarefied air that rose from the heated rocks to the upper strata, bore aloft in its ascent, a mite of latent and sensible heat with which it parted ere it returned to kiss the heated rocks that overspread the level surface of a new born earth. Thus through the earlier eras of the age, did the rocks thicken and the surface heat lessen; thus was the level face of the rock-covered earth eventually flooded with water, no more to subside till long ages of successive creations should culminate in the separation of waters by the upheaval of permanent land areas.

Undulations, exposing half-molten island tracts, and anon submerging them, kept the hot-waved ocean in a constant tempest. Fiery jets spurted forth from yawning rents in the corrugated crust of semi-fluid rock, and bore aloft stifling gases and volcanic debris with clouds of watery vapor. Geysers, too, emitted their fountain streams of heated steam and water, while the lurid glare of lightning, evolved by the mighty agencies chemically and physically engaged, flashed with fitful gleam through the misty shroud. The thunder rolled unechoed over the watery waste, and the groan of the earth as the earthquake convulsed it from pole to pole, and vast water-filling chasms in its thin rocky crust, gave little evidence of future stability, or hope of habitableness.

Each of these agencies, and probably more also, were, however, potent means in the control of an Omnipotent God, to carry on the work of creation; and right well did they effect the end designed. The cloud-vail, which had been impenetrable to the rays of light during the early and middle periods of the Chaotic age, near its close, by the cooling of the earth's outer coating, diminished the density of the aerial envelop so as to allow light from the sun's rays to penetrate through it to the earth. Dim, obscure and often shut out at first, it gradually brightened with the advance of the age and at its close was an established fact; marking each returning day and night with the regularity and certainty of distinct separation. Working through the correlations of matter and force, God said, Let there be light: and there was light. And God saw the light that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light, Day, and the darkness he called Night, Gen. i. 3–5.

"Ethereal first, of things, quintessence pure
Sprung from the deep, and from her native east
To journey through the airy gloom began,
Sphered in a radiant cloud, for yet the sun
Was not; she in a cloudy tabernacle
Sojourned with the while. God saw the light
And saw it was good
And light from darkness by the hemisphere
Divided: light the day and darkness night
He named." (Milton)

And here ends the age-work for the Chaotic Age in succession. A bright, new star has been added to the innumerable thousands of brilliant orbs that deck the evening sky. Its silvic cadence becomes the evening close, preparatory to the morning dawn of another age of creative work,—a day of which, as a judgment era, little record remains except in the book of God.

Note.—Professor Milton. It is an accepted aphorism of general physics that a body moved by two forces at right angles to each other will pass in a line corresponding to the diagonal of a parallelogram, the sides of which are formed by the two forces. Thus, if a boat is running in a stream at equal rate of speed. An object thrown from the stern of one boat to the stern of the other passes in the diagonal of a parallelogram in obedience to both forces. Again, a globular body revolving rapidly on its axis parts with a particle from its surface by reason of the centrifugal force. If it is not carry the particle forever away from the globe in a tangent, if it was unopposed: but if the particle be restrained by a string attached to the equator of the globe and to the particle cast off, (representing the force of gravitation) the tangential, rectilinear motion is changed to circular motion, and the particle becomes the satellite of the globular body as long as the two forces continue to act.

LEAVES FROM THE LIFE OF A HEBREW CHRISTIAN.

Personally, as a Christian, I am very proud I came from the Jewish race. And, as a race, are they not worthy of every consideration, remembering their past history? Are they not worthy of a supreme effort being made to remove the veil of unbelief from their eyes? I am addressing myself to all sincere followers of our Lord Jesus Christ. They are good citizens, and, if accorded fair treatment, a credit to the country in which they live. They are sober and industrious, and always willing, in case of need, to make sacrifices for the benefit of the nation among whom they dwell. But, on the other hand, they have bare justice done them, even in free America. Witness the expulsion of them from some of the hotels. The whole race is condemned because of the indiscretion of a few. I will here say, I believe the Jews, man for man, are the best behaved citizens of all nations. It is most unfair to compare the uncivilized Christian. There is not the slightest shadow of doubt that their lower classes are far better behaved than the lower classes of their fellow-countrymen of other beliefs. I will illustrate this by relating an experience that befell a cousin of mine, who occupies a prominent position among the London Jews. He was visiting a sea-side resort, where a number of Jews congregate every summer. One day, he was resting on a seat bordering the promenade. Two other gentlemen occupied the same seat. One of these turned to his friend, and, pointing toward the sands, observed, "How conspicuous those Jews make themselves!" My cousin, overhearing this remark, turned to the speaker and said, "You will excuse me, but I am a Jew." The gentleman at once apologized for having said anything that could be construed into an insult, and asked pardon. My cousin gladly granted this, and requested permission to make an explanation. He said, "You see those people," pointing toward the group that had drawn forth the remark: "they are the lowest class of Jewish people; they are kind husbands and fathers. They are industrious and sober, and have saved their hard-earned money for the purpose of giving their wives and families an outing. It is true, they make themselves conspicuous by their loud talking and tawdry finery. But, after all, this is harmless. Now, compare them with their fellow-countrymen of other beliefs, occupying a similar position, and I ask you, Are they worthy of condemnation?"

I would observe, I believe the educated Jews also compare favorably with their fellow-countrymen of the other beliefs, because, knowing the criticism they are exposed to, they are extra careful in the efforts they make to avoid attracting attention. I will illustrate another phase of their lives. They stand pre-eminent as loving husbands and fathers. While I was residing in Sydney, Australia, a new divorce law was being argued before the legislature. The Bishop of Sydney, in the course of one of his sermons, made reference to the old Mosaic law concerning divorce. The chief rabbi residing there took exception to his interpretation of the law and in the course of his remarks said: I would not have referred to this bill in my public capacity, as I do not consider as a Jew I have any occasion to interest myself in the divorce laws of our country. I have had charge of this [illegible] for a period of more than twenty-five years, and during that time, out of all the couples I have united in marriage, only two divorces have occurred, and one of these couples were reunited. I am quoting from memory, but this was the substance of his remarks. I believe a like state of affairs will be found to exist among the Jews in every part of the globe. And, again, what lessons in love might the Christians not learn, if they mingled more with the Jewish race! When I remember the loving kindness experienced on all hands from Jewish brethren during my wanderings around the world, and contrast it with the reception I met with from the Christian people among whom I was thrown during the early months of my conversion, when the want of sympathy and the cold blast of doubt through which I passed nearly withered my sweet blossom of faith,—when I consider all this, I think what vast possibilities in Christ's kingdom might not be the outcome, if this intercommunication could only be brought about! What a coldness, what a deplorable want of loving kindness and sympathy, seem to exist in the Christian Churches! And so it will remain, I believe, until they realize and do their duty toward the Jewish race.

Out of regard for the kindness I have received from individual Christians, I would willingly have left these facts unrecorded; but a higher duty demands I should not. All individual feeling must be sacrificed at the altar of Christ's cause. I need only mention that I had to offer up at the same altar a mother's loving heart and darling sister's affections, although fully conscious that the act would be as a death stroke to them; and, although I loved them as dearly as mothers and sisters were ever loved, I did not hesitate to sacrifice them when the final struggle came. No sacrifice is too great in Christ's cause, and I could only commend them to God's unbounded love and care.

Alas! the facts I mention are only too true, and call for the strongest protest from all sincere followers of Christ.

I believe the Jews, by the grace of God, would be easy of conversion, if you only succeeded in awakening their slumbering consciences, because they are naturally reverential. I would here remark—and I am pleased to be able to record it—that I do not remember having heard a Jew (even if not religious) blaspheme the name of God or Jesus Christ. Very few of the Jews read the New Testament, and I believe a large proportion of those who do accept Christ as their Redeemer and Savior.

Professor Drummond, author of Spiritual Life in the Natural World, during one of his addresses at the recent Northfield Conference, related the experience of a young converted Jew, who is a student at the university of which he is a professor. This Jew was a member of an atheist society. One evening, during the discussion, a speaker blasphemed the name of Christ. The Jew, who had never read of Jesus, took exception to the speaker's remarks, and defended him as having been a good man. The discussion was running high, when a friend advised the Jew to give up the discussion until he had read the life of Jesus as recorded in the New Testament. He did this, and, on the following meeting of the society, came forward, and not only defended Jesus as a good man, but also announced that he believed him to be the Son of God, the Redeemer and Savior of the world, and accepted him as such. Professor Drummond also said the same Jew had since informed him that, had he mingled with Christian people before he read of Jesus, he did not believe he would ever have become a Christian their lives being so inconsistent with the teachings of Christ. The Jews see, nothing of professing Christians, and naturally judge the religion of Christ from the so-called Christians. The fault with the really pious Christians is, they keep themselves too secluded. They do not let their "light shine," as is commanded. There is truly a deplorable state of affairs existing in the Churches, and will remain so until [illegible] Christian ministry [illegible] Jews [illegible] breaking entirely away from their religious observances. Now is the opportunity of the Christian Churches to commence their education, and so fit them for the glorious future that awaits them.

Out of regard for that one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin, by the love I bear my sweet mother and sisters, whom I offered up an innocent sacrifice at the altar of my faith and to whom I prophesied good would come of the act, although I did not then see how,—in their name I ask you, ministers of the Gospel, to preach to your congregations loving-kindness toward the Jewish race, God's ancient chosen people, to whom you owe by his grace so deep a debt of gratitude, and toward whom in the past the Christian Churches have so deplorably failed in duty.—Jewish Herald.

PRAYER.

"And this is the boldness we have toward him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us." John v. 14.

Let us consider what prayer is, as thus viewed in all the fulness of its confident assurance. It is not simply petitioning; it is not monotonous reiteration; the incessant sending up to heaven again and again the same appeal, the same demand for some specific deliverance, some promise and definite benefit that may seem to us indispensable, that we feel as if we could not do without. It is a far more confidential dealing with God than that. It is our becoming "the men of his secrets." It is our getting into the inmost chamber of his house, and consulting with him there; seeking to know his mind; ready to make his mind ours. I say it is consulting with God. And the consultation may and must be full and free. Hence everywhere and always, and with reference to everything, we must be thus consulting with God; not only upon cases of difficulty or distress, but upon all sorts of cases; little cases, as well as cases of rare and grave emergency. Prayer of this kind may be short, like the Lord's strong cry of agony in the garden; it may be silent like his groaning and weeping at Bethany. But it may be long, ever so long, without falling under the Lord's censure of the long prayers of the Pharisees. In such prayer he himself often spent the whole long night. He was at home then and there with his Father; consulting with him about many things, about all things bearing on his Father's glory and his own work; laying his own views and feelings and wishes unreservedly before his Father; and reverently learning his. Brethren, pray thus without ceasing. "In everything by such prayer and supplication make your requests known to God." Carry everything, literally everything, everything that befalls you, or seems likely to befall you; every choice you have to make; whatever you have to say or do; carry everything to God. Converse with God about it. Turn it over as between God and you. And the issue will be the clear, calm "peace of God keeping your hearts and minds through Jesus Christ your Lord." Then let us consider how close and intimate is the connection between life and prayer; between God's giving us eternal life in his Son, and our asking thus confidently and confidentially. The two are really one; the eternal life is realized and acted out in thus asking. It is as partakers of the life which the Father has in himself, and which, by his gift, the Son has also in himself that we ask and pray. The essential characteristic of that life is its self-communicativeness. If I may repeat a phrase, its independence of things without; its drawing from within its [illegible] the motives of all its [illegible] actions. So the Son also lived, the "man Christ Jesus" [illegible] mate points only with the Father in purpose and desire, in will [illegible] You; one in thus we have the [illegible] secure we, having the [illegible] life in each from [illegible] in the family afterwards [illegible] If you come with [illegible] bargain-trading [illegible] Jesus will deed. You [illegible] terms, and all the small [illegible] alities by which, for a [illegible] aims and hopes may be [illegible] beset. Such communing [illegible] ality, and about time as [illegible] eternity, is prayer; the prayer [illegible] acts out "the eternal life which [illegible] have as God's gift in his Son." [illegible] the charm of this life of prayer [illegible] peace; the peace of God; the [illegible] conscious sympathy with the God [illegible] peace. But all worldliness and selfishness, all diversity of judgment or feeling on any point between us and him whose eternal life we share—in a word, all unholiness disturbs that peace. Therefore, as he who has called us is holy, let us also be holy.—Lectures on John's First Epistle, by the late Dr. Candlish.

WILL 1888 BE A YEAR OF WAR.

The present year is the fifth year of modern times in which the aggregate of the figures is twenty-five, and there will be but five more years in which such a combination is possible prior to the year 2693. Probably but few have ever heard of the old prophecy, which runs as follows:

In every future year of our Lord,
When the sum of the figures is twenty-five,
Some warlike kingdom will draw the sword,
But peaceful nations in peace shall thrive.

Students of modern history will readily recall how faithfully this prophecy has been fulfilled in the four previous years to which it applied.

In 1809 Russia, Denmark and Poland formed the coalition against Sweden, which inaugurated the great war that ended in the disastrous defeat of Charles XII. at Pultowa. The year 1789 will ever be memorable on account of the breaking out of the French Revolution.

The year 1792 witnessed the [illegible] reign of Bonaparte in Egypt, the formation of the second [illegible] alition against France, [illegible] broke out between [illegible] ghanistan, followed by [illegible] the latter country. ## YOUR ATTENTION, PLEASE.

Dear Friends:

We have just started on the Fifth month of this year. We have carried on our list all the time since Jan. 1, about 200 names of persons who have promised to pay as soon as able. We have exhausted our means, and now ask each one whom we have accommodated so long to remit to us some portion, at least of your dues. If you cannot send all, send a part, and that right away. We ask you to do this because we need it—queer as it may seem to you, yet we do actually need it—and as we have waited so long on you, we trust you will be very prompt in responding to our call.

Brethren, you who have abundance, remember that we have on our list a number of poor brethren and sisters—actually too poor to pay for THE RESTITUTION. You who have large and well-stocked farms, a superabundance of this world's goods, are at liberty to pay for the paper for them.

SISTER H. V. REED sends another good and pointed article in answer to certain objections urged by infidels against some Bible statements with all [illegible] usual overweening confidence. [illegible] faith in unbelief is by no [illegible] founded on a rock.

[illegible] there will be [illegible] of the not far distant [illegible] a foregone conclusion. It is [illegible] conceded that it will be one of [illegible] dimensions and consequences.

[illegible] Bible warrants that the students of prophecy should observe natural phenomena among the events of these last days. It is reported that "during a terrible hail-storm in India recently, chunks of ice fell weighing two pounds, crushing many houses, and killing and injuring many people." Another item announces that "During last December, January, and February there were ten shocks of earthquake in various towns in China, which killed thousands of people."

THE world manifests much interest in the continued life of the German Emperor. It is the general impression that his death might precipitate the so much dreaded war that seemingly must come sooner or later. But the probabilities are most decidedly against his living very much longer. There is an occasional change apparently for the better, but these flattering mitigations of his sufferings are soon followed by dangerous relapses. The very last news is that his condition is extremely critical. It is also stated among the latest news items, that the Emperor of Brasil is alarmingly ill at Milan, Italy. Crowned heads are not exempt from death.

ROMISH INDULGENCES.

We do not wonder that the Romish hierarchy are averse to having the books opened on this detestable subject, but, like the mark on Cain, it is an ineffaceable mark on Romanism, and let history unveil it for the benefit of all lovers of true Christianity and political and religious freedom. There is no temptation to exaggerate, as the plain simple facts of indisputable history are too awfully criminating to [illegible] any desire to heighten the horrible [illegible] colors. We shall continue to [illegible] from authors whose testimony [illegible] not set aside or impeached. We [illegible] leisure to arrange our [illegible] history in the most systematic manner, neither shall we try [illegible] some repetition in [illegible] as from different authors [illegible] is a case of this [illegible] that more than a [illegible] necessity.

We will in the present paper commence with extracts from Kohlrausch's History of Germany and learn what was the state of morals in the Romish community just before the great Protestant Reformation, and knowing this we can easily apprehend that the sale of indulgences to commit every sin in the whole catalogue of crime would and did follow as a matter of course. We give a few prefatory extracts from Chapter XVI, as our historian alludes to this in the next chapter when treating on the subject of "indulgences." He says:—"The church had for centuries been subject to violent agitation and disorder in every shape, and the reckless abandonment of all external discipline had operated materially to shake the faith of numerous Christians, as well as to corrupt the morals of the people generally. Complaints of the decline of the church, and the desire of its general reform, had long been growing loud and urgent in expression. There were none, but those belong to whatever doctrine or sect they may, who, knowing the history of those times, will not admit that these complaints were at that period too well founded. They were raised in the name of entire nations, and proceeded more especially from the mouths of the faithful adherents of the ancient church as well as the venerable bishops themselves, together with the most learned and profoundly minded men of the church and state. At the time of the great schism, from the year 1378 to 1414, when several popes disputed the possession of the holy chair of St. Peter, each rival claimant excommunicated the other in turn, together with all his partisans; so that all the countries of Christendom found themselves subject to the ban of the church, either by the one pope or the other, and all religious and pacific minds were at a loss to know where in reality they should seek and find the true peace of God. At such a period and under the influence of such violent and furious passions, it was to be expected that that veneration hitherto felt for the name of the pope would sensibly weakened, and the invisible and sacred bonds gradually loosened. To this was added a state of ignorance which prevailed throughout the spiritual body, or at least among the majority of its members; for it was not possible for a few men [illegible] succeed in dissipating [illegible] the mass. [illegible] always [illegible] there at [illegible] commission [illegible] good, and a scandal to [illegible] generally. In the year 1503, accordingly, some time before the appearance of Luther in the field, one of the first theologians of Germany represented this degenerated, fallen state of the church in strong terms: 'The study of theology,' he says, 'is despised among us, and the gospel of Christ, as well as the writings of the holy fathers, are completely neglected; faith, piety, moderation, and all the other virtues so much praised and valued even by the pagan themselves, the wonders of God's grace and the merits of Jesus, all these are doctrines upon which the most profound silence is maintained by them. And such people too, who understand nothing of either theology or philosophy, are elevated to the highest dignities of the church, and become the guardians of our souls! Thence the melancholy decline of the christian church, the hatred to art in the clergy, and the total absence of all good and salutary instruction! The profligate life led by the ecclesiastics, shocks the feelings of well-minded parents, and prevents them from allowing their sons to devote their lives to that once holy service. They omit entirely all research into the Holy Scriptures, and they corrupt their taste to such an extent, that they no longer feel their beauty and force; they become lazy and lukewarm in their duty, and are only too glad when the service is speedily at an end, the chant and sermon hurriedly concluded, and their presence no longer required. They discourse more gravely and impressively with the mortal upon whom they may have a claim for money, than with their divine Master and Creator. Instead of devoting their leisure time to study, they pass it in gambling, debauchery, and licentiousness, without caring in the least, or having any consideration for the disgust their conduct everywhere produces. How then is it possible that in this shameful state of things, the laity can feel respect for them or religion itself? The gospel tells us that the path to Heaven is narrow and difficult, but they only strive to make it broad and easy.'

That this description is not too strongly colored, is proved by a hundred other undoubted witnesses; and although the monks scanned the learned professor, who, as we have just seen, reprimanded them so severely before the pope, Julius II., still he had truth so much on his side, that the papal commissioners themselves pronounced in his favor. The pious bishop of Augsburg, Christopher of Stadion, in a synodal charge to his clergy, coincides exactly in all these complaints, reproaches them bitterly for their vices, which, he says, could not fail to produce the most corrupt and destructive effects upon the church and the public; and Hugo, bishop of Constance, although inimical to the doctrine of Martin Luther, complains equally in the same strain together with many others of the chief members of the Catholic church of that time.

But how could it be otherwise when the interdictions of the spiritual rulers was regulated by the amount of [illegible] they might without any regard to the qualifications or moral character of the individual chosen, and which [illegible] has already been shown, only the smallest portion of the clergy in reality possessed any knowledge of the word of God? To such a degraded state it declined that the church became reduced, that according to well-attested evidence, it was assumed that out of all the principal leading members of the electoral body throughout the Swiss confederation at the commencement of the sixteenth century, there were not three who had ever read the Bible; and when the people of Valais received about this time a letter from Zurich, in which was quoted a sentence from the sacred volume, only one man was to be found who knew the book, and even what he knew was by hearsay! How deplorably great and universal must have been the ignorance existing at this period through the negligence of the clergy, when we find not only that men were unacquainted with the source itself of religious devotion and Christian virtue, but that its very name was scarcely known to them."

So far we have quoted from this learned Secular Historian. He shows what the masses became without the Bible and education. The clergy clothed in sin, an abomination in the eyes of the good, and a scandal to the public generally, "as his words. Such a "wine of Sodom" will bear its fruits, and the fruits are "indulgences" to sin, as we will show from this same historian in our next.

Something.

Report from Pastor Hirsch, Paris.

I gave a lecture on "The Centenary of the Emancipation of the Jews." This is the title of a book which appeared lately. Thus I took advantage of the publication of this volume in order to present and discuss it at a public meeting. Bad weather had very much reduced my audience. There were at the most 60 persons present, the greater part of whom were Jewesses of the more cultivated classes. I was listened to in perfect silence and without much apparent sympathy; nevertheless, of all my lectures, this is the one which has received the most abundant blessing. I will only relate one instance. I had a visit from a young man of marked Jewish type; he was, he told me, the president of a club of young Jews, students for the most part, and they wished him, after my lecture of the preceding week, to ask me to bring before them the same subject on a similar one. Their society is called 'The Emancipation,' and their aim is to emancipate themselves socially and morally and to recover their Jewish nationality in Palestine. They separate themselves entirely from the old Jewish orthodoxy, while holding themselves at an equal distance from rationalism. While my interlocutor laid all this before me with incomparable warmth of expression, I asked myself if it were not a beautiful dream, if it were really true that such a wonderful door was on the point of opening before me. I expressed my doubts aloud, and said to the young Jew, a true son of Israel, "Do you know to whom you are speaking? I am a Meshumad; do you really wish me to come to you?" He answered, "No know who you are, come as you are, you will do us equal honor and pleasure." I went but Thursday. Snow was falling and the wind raging, so that only 7 members out of 21 were present. Three medical students, a professor of chemistry, a bank clerk, a bookseller and a workman, the last a wonderfully intelligent man. I spoke for an hour, then we exchanged our respective ideas and only separated about midnight and not without promising to see each other again often. One of those present returned, to tell me that he was the president of a society of Jewish workmen to which he would soon invite me.

Is not all this very extraordinary? Certainly they are not yet conversions, it is not yet the harvest, but what glorious seed time! Shall we not thank God for it from the bottom of our hearts?—Hebrew Christian.

THE PROPHECY FULFILLED.

The prophecies that prognosticated the destruction of the various empires—the desolation of Babylon, Tyre, Nineveh, are met with the objection of the modern liver, that it is the fate of all governments to have their rise and fall. I reply it was only after sin, on the part of the Hebrew people. But what can be said in Moses' prophecy of the utter dispersion of the Jews among all the people of the earth. There was no destruction, but a [illegible] perpetual preservation; particularly is this wonderful from the fact that other people can exist under every climatic change or condition.

Jewish Inquirers in Palestine.

A missionary lecturing in the Holy Land, chiefly among the dead Jews and visitors, states that recently he met a Jew from Hamadan, whom he noticed listening intently while he spoke on man's sinfulness, and most great need of a Saviour. Tracing the sacrificial system under the Old Covenant, and showing that the appointed way of approaching God has always been by a sacrifice, since without the shedding of blood there could be no remission, he showed that since the destruction of the second Temple up to the present time Judaism lacked this principal thing, while Christianity had in Jesus of Nazareth a Temple, a Priest, and a Victim. Seeing him attentively listening, the Jew was asked whether he had ever read the book called the 'Old Paths.' "No, but I should like to see one," and so he was given a Hebrew copy. After a few days he returned to the Missionary with a friend, also a Jew of Hamadan, expressing his gratitude for the very interesting book, which he had read. He asked to take it to Hamadan. His friend having also read it with much interest, eagerly begged for a copy. He returned another day to receive it, and at the same time took tracts and portions of Scriptures, which were thankfully received, with the promise they should be read.

A Christian lady who has devoted her life to this work, is receiving much encouragement. She visits the Christian Hospital on Sunday and Thursday in each week, the Enquirers' Home Tuesdays and Fridays, and reads in the workroom each day but Wednesday, and holds a Mothers' Meeting. Friday is set apart for visiting converts, and Saturdays exclusively to going among the Jews in their houses. Having the Jewish Sabbath, both men and women are found at home, and a greater welcome given than on other days. Her Jewish acquaintance has now become so large that it is impossible to keep pace with the visiting. The Mothers' Meeting now numbers forty-five Jewesses, and has been divided, one half being taken in each alternate week, from the difficulty in finding work for them. The meetings last two hours, the second hour being devoted to reading the Old Testament, explanation and prayer. All the women display eager interest.

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

Wake, O wake, the world from sleeping,
Watchman, watchman, what's the hour?
Harkt ye only hear him saying,
"'Tis the last, the eleventh hour."

Lo, the iron has left His tiderct,
Up ye watchmen, be in haste;
The destroyer of the Gentiles
Comes to lay their dwellings waste.

Bring the remnant from their exile,
For the promise is to them:
Japhet has ruled the world his time out,
He must leave the tents of Shem.

Comfort ye the house of Israel,
They are part'ners, gather them.
Hear the watchman's proclamation,
"Jews rebuild Jerusalem."

Sound the trumpet with the tidings,
Call in all of Abraham's seed;—
Those in the Gentiles may reject it
Christ will come in very deed.

Chorus:
We are the true born sons of Zion,
Who with us shall ran compare?
We are the royal branch of Joseph—
The bright and glorious morning star.

DIVINE TRUTHS.

The following statements are believed to be words of truth revealed from heaven for man's instruction, and future welfare. As such they are commended to the careful perusal of the reader.

1. That man is a sinner. The Psalmist wrote—"Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me," Psa. li. 5. Again he says—"The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. They are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God. They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no, not one," Psa. xiv. 1–3. The apostle Paul endorses the same in Rom. iii. 9–18. "The Scripture hath concluded all under sin," Gal iii 22. "for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," Rom. iii. 23

2. Man is therefore subject to death. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death, Jas. i. 15. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v. 12. "To be carnally-minded is death," Rom. viii. 6. "The end of those (deeply) things is death," Rom. vi. 21. "He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption," Gal. vi. 8. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," Ezek. xviii 4, 20. These texts prove that man is mortal, or subject to death. It is an error to say that man is immortal, for if that were true he could not die, but would live on in sin forever. When Adam and Eve sinned, they were sentenced to death. The sentence was executed by casting them off or preventing them from partaking of the tree of life, lest they should eat, and live forever, Gen. iii. 22–24. This act prevented them from perpetualing their existence. In consequence all their posterity partake of their sinful nature, and are subject to death.

3. The favor of God has opened a way of escape from sin and death. The apostle Paul wrote of it in this manner. "When we were yet without strength, in due time, Christ died for the ungodly.....God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us," Rom. v. 6–8. "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many," Heb. ix. 28. Peter wrote, "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body to the tree;" "Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God," 1 Pet. ii. 24; iii. 18. The prophet Isaiah also spoke of the sufferings of the Messiah, and of his death. "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." "He was cut off out of the land of the living; for the transgression of my people was he stricken." "He hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors," Isa. liii. 6–12. The Savior himself said, that the Son of Man "gave his life a ransom for many," Matt. xx. 28. Many more texts might be quoted to show how through the mercy of God a means of escape for sinners has been provided, but these are sufficient to put the point. Man could not save himself from the condemnation of sin, nor give to God a ransom for another, consequently all hope of escape from death, which is the wages of sin, was cut off. "The grace of God bringeth salvation," Titus ii. 11.

4. Freedom from sin and its consequences is offered through Christ. Jesus invited the heavy-laden sinner to come to him for rest. See Matt. xi. 28–30. He came to rescue the perishing, by giving them life. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life," John iii. 16. To perish is to die without the hope of living again. The promise of the Good Shepherd to his sheep is that they shall never perish, John x. 28, 29. "He that believeth in him is not condemned," John iii. 18. "and shall not come into condemnation but is passed from death unto life," John v. 24. The apostle Paul says, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," Rom. viii. 1. Those who are in Christ Jesus are justified, reconciled, at peace with God, made free from sin, and are no longer under its power and dominion. Therefore,

5. Those who are thus delivered from sin have the hope of life everlasting. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him," John iii. 36. This everlasting life is not in actual possession. It is a promised gift. "The gift of God is eternal life," Rom vi. 23. "In hope of eternal life, which God that cannot lie, promised before the world (ages) began," Titus i. 2. Hence this becomes to the believer "the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus," 2 Tim. i. 1. The apostle John tells us that we have this life eternal only in promise yet—"and this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life," John ii. 25. And he further informs us where it is on deposit. "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son," 1 John v. 11. Thus it is, that though now the believer is subject to death, yet having the promise of life, it is sure to him; for the apostle Paul says, "Your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory," Col. iii 3, 4

6. This future life comes only through Christ, and is conditional. Jesus said to the Jews, "I am the way, the truth and the life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me," John xiv. 6. "I give unto my sheep eternal life," John x. 28. Christ is the appointed medium through which eternal life may be obtained; but only to such as believe on him. To the Jews he said—"If ye believe not that I am he, (the Messiah), ye shall die in your sins," John viii. 21. To believe on the Son is to have eternal life, John iii. 36; but no one can believe on him without believing his words or message, for he has "the words of eternal life," John vi. 68. The words of life are contained in the gospel—called by the angel who opposed the persecutions to the apostles—"the words of this life," Acts v. 20. And Paul gives forth the same idea when we read in Col. i. 5, that "the word of the truth of the gospel," which was then preached, contained the hope laid up in heaven, and hid in Christ. When those who heard the gospel preached, but rejected it, they refused the offer of eternal life, Acts xiii. 46; but those who believed are said to be ordained to eternal life, ver. 48.

7. This eternal life given to believers at the coming of Christ. It will be given to those who sleep in Jesus by a resurrection. See 1 Thess. iv. 13–18. "I will raise him up at the last day," John vi. 40. "Though he was dead, yet shall he live". "The dead (believer) shall be raised incorruptible," 1 Cor. xv. 52. And if we who believe are waiting for the Lord from heaven, though we shall not anticipate, or go before the dead in Christ, we shall be changed from mortality to immortality, in a moment, and be joined in company to the quickened dead ones, to meet the Lord. See 1 Cor. xv. 52–55; 1 Thess. iv. 15–17; John xi. 26.

Reader, search the Divine record and see whether the truth is not to be found in the above statements. If so, receive them as such; and may the truth make you free.

To the Faithful in Christ, Greeting.

"And he said unto them, go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to the whole creation; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: but he that disbelieveth shall be condemned," Mark xvi. 15, 16.

Under this commission our beloved Master sent forth his disciples to proclaim world-wide the gospel of the great salvation that, by his life, death, and resurrection he had wrought out for our race. Christ our Lord came as the King of the Jews, "He came to his own (people) and his own received him not" but they crucified him and denied that he was their king. When he went forth and preached the kingdom of God it was to his own nation, and when he sent out the seventy—two and two, he told them to "go not into the way of the Gentiles." Neither were they permitted to go into the cities of the Samaritans, who were a mongrel seed whose nationality some disputed. They were sent directly, and only, to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel." But now the commission is changed, because Israel denied her rightful king; and so lost her birthright and the gospel of salvation is offered to all the world. The glad tidings, the good news of a coming Deliverer.

This promised deliverance is unconditional, and hence becomes a matter of individual interest, and individual action is necessary to make it available. The first action is that of the mind, in the exercise of faith; the second is the action of the body in putting on Christ by being immersed into his name for the remission of sins. In order to rightly apprehend what the salvation here referred to embraces, we must study the word in its teachings and its promises, of the unfolding of that salvation. We there learn that it is a bringing out of the death state, by means of resurrection into the life immortal which ends not; and too, that that life is full of bliss, of happiness, of glory that fades not; and joys that turn not to sorrow. It is all real. There is no vague fancy, no mansion "beyond the bounds of time and space" in the ethereal regions of sectarian imaginings. No, no, it will all be known and felt, and appreciated in the fullest depths of the exalted immortal nature.

Much has been written on the first clause of this last commission of our Lord, and very many seem to think that only the first clause should be proclaimed. But this surely is a mistake, for it is revealed to us in the Book what that condemnation referred to is. Does it not appear that failing to discern aright the assurance of reward and the declaration of punishment as its opposite has led, and even now is leading many into the untaught theories of "fair chance and universalism?"

Paul in his ministry did not fail to declare "all the counsel of God." Acts xx. 27. Yet there is no record that he ever preached a discourse on the resurrection of the wicked. He believed and taught all things that were written in the law, and the prophets. The Sadducees did not believe in any life after death. The Pharisees believed in the resurrection of all the seed of Abraham, while Paul believed and taught a resurrection through the Christ. This was the point of difference between the three disputing parties, as seen in Acts xxiv.

The text of the commission is antithetical in its outcome. The believer shall be saved,—The unbeliever shall be condemned. The question arises, Saved from what? The Master tells us, John xi. 25, "I am the resurrection and the life." Here we learn that he is he who saves from out the death state and brings into the new—the higher life. Again he says in John iii. 17, 18, For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved. The condemnation of the world came through disobedience, the disobedience of one. The salvation of the world came through the righteousness of one—even through the Christ. Now we ask, how does this salvation come, and to whom does it come? and we find that the Master always taught the same great truth. In verse 18 he tells us the same truth he gave to his disciples just before he went up. "He that believeth on him (the Son) is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God." This surely is very plain. They are condemned as soon as they believe not. When a spirit is condemned by the court and judge his case is settled. He is not brought back again for a repetition of the trial. The evidence in the first place was sufficient to condemn him. This is all that is necessary to satisfy justice.

Again in John v. 24 we see how this salvation is made available—that it is by the exercise of faith in the means God has provided whereby we may enter into life. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me hath everlasting life (assured to him) and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death into life." Here we see that faith spans the chasm of death and takes hold of the life that lies beyond, which life is "hid with Christ in God." This is the only life that lies beyond the dark prison house; and the only means of attaining to that life is by faith in Christ, and then "when he who is our life shall appear we also shall appear with him in glory." But for those who believe not there is no release from the condemnation of death. Like the mighty princes of Babylon who caused Israel to mourn and repented not, "They shall sleep a perpetual sleep and shall not awake, saith the king whose name is the Lord of hosts." Jer. li. 57.

THE BIBLE AND ITS FOES.

A friend has sent us an infidel paper with the request that we review an article containing a series of objections to the truth of certain historical statements.

The first is a quotation from Gen. xiv. 14, "And when Abraham heard that his brother was taken captive he armed his trained servants, born in his house (three hundred and eighteen), and pursued them unto Dan."

Then follows a criticism in which the author claims that there was no such place as Dan until the tribe of Dan built the city of Dan, about 400 years afterwards.

If our sceptical friend will take the trouble to investigate ancient geography a little, he will ascertain the following facts. In the midst of a rich plain between the southern part of Mount Hermon and the mountains of Naphtali, is a low cup shaped hill, called Tell el Kadi, and from its western base gushes forth a great spring which is the principal source of the river Jordan. Both the fountain and the stream were called Dan. (Please see Jerome, Adamnanus, Burchardus, William of Tyre and also Burchart and Robinson.) It was doubtless to this river that Abraham pursued his foes. If the infidel claims that this fountain and stream did not exist until after the time of Abraham, he must assign a much greater antiquity to Abraham than Christianity claims.

This objection is very similar to the claim that the Bible contradicts itself by saying in one place that Christ ascended from the Mount of Olives and in another that he ascended from the village of Bethany. And yet this statement is gravely passed around by a certain class of sceptics. In sublime unconsciousness of the fact that the village of Bethany is located on the Mount of Olives!

AHAZIAH.

The next in the series is a quotation from Kings and another from Chronicles, the one text saying that king Ahaziah began to reign when he was twenty-two years old, and the other that he began to reign when he was forty-two years old.

Gesenius, the great Hebrew scholar and critic, whose Lexicon and other text-books are authority the world over, and whose scholarship no one will dare to dispute, claims in relation to this matter that twenty-two is the correct number, while the statement of forty-two years as made in Chronicles was the mistake of the copyist of the Hebrew numerals, as the two characters look very much alike.

THE QUAIL STORY.

The next "problem" found in this interesting chapter is the old quail story, which was told by Moses so long ago, and which seems to have worried infidels ever since they heard of it. "And there went forth a wind from the Lord (not from the land as the sceptic quotes it) and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp as it were a day's journey on this side and as it were a day's journey on the other side of the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth." Num. xi. 31.

The sceptic claims that according to the Bible story, the quails came from the sea and wisely (?) suggests that if they were called whales it would be more reasonable, etc. The quails were probably on their spring journey of migration northward, and were beaten down from over the sea by a heavy wind. Sykes says they arrive in spring on the shores of Provence so exhausted by their long flight as to be taken by hand. It must be observed that the quails are spoken of as being two cubits high and not two cubits deep. If our sceptical friend should say he saw a flock of birds fifty feet high, he would not like to be accused of saying that birds were packed all over the earth fifty feet deep. And still Moses has repeatedly been misrepresented in this way.

Enormous flocks of these birds are seen in the spring and fall, after they have crossed an immense surface of sea, resting upon the islands of Malta, Sicily and Crete.

Pliny states that they sometimes light on vessels in the Mediterranean Sea and sink them! See Hist. Nat. 10, 23. Still we have never heard an infidel question the veracity of Pliny.

Audubon describes a flock of pigeons covering at least one hundred and eighty square miles of surface, and so deep as to obscure the light of the sun "as if by an eclipse," and even impregnating the great ocean of air around him with their peculiar odor. The noise of their wings was so great that the reports of guns could not be heard, and when they alighted, trees six feet in circumference were broken off near the ground!" See "Birds and Bird Life," pp. 113 and 153.

This is quite a "bird story" but infidels seem to have no difficulty in believing it. If it had been in the Bible instead of a scientific work, there would have been a general outcry of unbelief and ridicule.

SAMSON.

The story of the Hebrew athlete is also pronounced "a little too large." "And it came to pass.....that he cast away the jaw bone out of his hand and called the name of that place Ramath-lehi; he was sore athirst, etc.....But God clave an hollow place that was in the jaw (margin Lehi) and there came water thereout, etc." Judges xv. 17–19. Lehi is supposed by Stuhlr to be the wall of rock, an opening in which was called Mahtesh, and from this the fountain sprang or was discovered, after the place had been named by Samson.

FOXES.

One more incident in the life of Samson has always troubled sceptics. His original method of burning a field of dry grain they have never been able to understand. There is a practice still in vogue in the far East of tying the tails of two foxes together and attaching a lighted torch to them to heighten the interest in a circus performance. Burchart claims that the custom was derived from the Phœnicians—that it is done in memory of the damage once done to a harvest in that way and that it is to be clearly traced to the history of Samson. See Hitrez, Part 1, Book 3, Chap. 18.

A custom perpetrated is as strong a proof of the historical fact as the perpetual celebration of our national anniversary is of our Declaration of Independence.

How strange it is that men who sneer at historical statements as being entirely "too thin" for their capacious intellects, have no difficulty whatever in swallowing all sorts of ghost stories. Ghosts are very thin articles when compared to a fact, nevertheless they are taken as a steady article of intellectual diet by a certain class of credulous infidels.

How foolish they must be to spend their money on spiritualistic or any other newspapers when they have direct telegraphic communication with the spirit world, getting their news fresh every morning or evening, and that too on a "dead head" line, entirely free from expense.

A MUCH MISUNDERSTOOD PASSAGE.

2 COR. CHAP. iii.

11. For if that which is being abrogated was through glory how much more is that which abideth in glory?

12. Having therefore such a hope we use much boldness:

13. And not (do) as did Moses who put a vail upon his face that the sons of Israel might not see clearly unto the completion of that which was being abrogated (namely the law):

14. Moreover their perceptive faculties were blunted. Yea, unto this day the same vail remaineth over the reading of the Old Covenant, not unveiled because it is being abrogated in Christ:

15. Moreover whilst there is a to-day whenever Moses is being read a vail lieth over their heart:

16. Whenever though one shall have turned unto the Lord the vail is taken away.

17. The Lord moreover is the Spirit and where the Spirit of the Lord is there is there liberty.

18. And we all looking at the same image, the glory of the Lord namely mirrored in an unveiled face (the face of Christ as mirrored in God's Word which is the mirror, see 1 Cor. viii.) are being metamorphosed as it were from glory to glory from the Lord's Spirit.

Note. The figure used here is this: Moses as a mediator of the Old Covenant of the law of works veils his face to conceal the full glory of the Lord as manifested in this law and to him as the mediator of it. Why? That the sons of Israel might not see and apprehend its full end and object as a temporary expedient to lead men to Christ.

In other words it was not expedient in the wisdom of God that they should understand that this law was to be merely a "child leader" to lead the docile child heart to Christ the Great Teacher.

The law having subserved this purpose though it abrogated, because the object has been attained, and Christ is the Mediator of the New Covenant of the law of love and grace, having done his work and fulfilled the law at works and been glorified through death and the resurrection in the unveiling of his flesh is here spoken of as reflecting God's glory with "an unveiled face." But we have to look through God's Word as it were to see Christ "as the true image and likeness" of God. So the Word of God is the mirror.

It was the glory of God in Moses' face that was veiled and it is the same glory of God in Christ's unveiled face that is spoken of and contrasted here and called "the same image."

It is God's word as an instrumentality that reflects the glory and we see the glory on the unveiled face of Christ through the word as an instrumentality, a mirror as it were, and seeing we become metamorphosed as it were from glory to glory through God's spiritual agencies, spoken of here as "The Lord's Spirit."

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 33.

DUTY OF GIVING.

Give: To bestow, to make an offering.

Lesson Chapter, 2 Cor. 8.

Golden Text: Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom." Luke 6: 38.

The duty of giving was of early origin, and at a very early period in the world's history good old Abraham, the father of the faithful, believed a certain part of his increase belonged to the Lord, and left all future believers an example of systematic benevolence which was practiced throughout the patriarchal and Mosaic ages. Gen. 14: 20; Heb. 7: 2. Hence we see Abraham gave a tenth of all.

Q. How much was given for God's house?

A. Jacob, following the example of his grandfather, Abraham, gave a tenth. Gen. 28: 22. And this stone which I have set for a pillar shall be God's house; and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee.

And again in [illegible] said [illegible] Zion, Le[illegible] the [illegible] Lord[illegible] 2 Chron[illegible] 9; Neh. 13: 12; 10: 38.

Q. What was Israel's great sin?

A. Covetousness. Mal. 3: 8. Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings.

Q. Was God pleased with them?

A. No. Mal. 3: 9, Ye are cursed with a curse, for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation.

Q. What did God command them to do that a blessing might follow?

A. Mal. 3: 10.

But the duty of giving was not confined to former dispensations, but is just as obligatory in the gospel age. See 1 Cor. 16: 1, 2; Acts 11: 20; Rom. 15: 26.

Q. Is it right that a few carry the heavy burden of church finances?

A. Paul thought not. Read 2 Cor. 8: 7, and notice that giving to the Lord is called a "Christian grace." Read carefully verses 7–14 of this chapter.

Q. What makes a lean, poor, starved believer?

A. 2 Cor. 9: 6, "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly."

Q. What brings a bountiful harvest to the Christian?

A. 2 Cor. 9: 6–8.

Q. Will a congregation receive a blessing in the act of giving?

A. Yes. Phil. 4: 15–17.

Q. Is giving to a minister or a church all that is required of a Christian in the act of giving?

Not by any means. 1 John 3: 17; Rom. 12: 13; Eph. 4: 28. Not to cut farm to farm, but to give to him that asketh.

Q. Is covetousness a sin?

A. Yes, it is the crying sin of the last days. Eph. 5: 5; 1 Tim. 6: 8–11.

In the Mosaic dispensation those unable to bring a costly sacrifice, brought only what they were able to give. The poor widow put into the treasury her meagre offering of two mites, but God accepted it as the most precious gift of all, for it was "all that she had." Just such gifts as the Lord hath prospered him or her, and the Lord will accept the gift if it is the best that they can do.

and good health, every one who has lost health, ought to come, and while you drink the mineral water of these flowing wells you may drink more deeply of the water of life, for some how or other righteousness and good health are harmoniously mingled, you ought all to come.

Don't begin to look for excuses, but overcome every objection and come. We want to meet you all. Let this be the event of the season. Begin to prepare for it now, arrange business, farming, household work so that you can leave them. If we cannot spend a few days now for confetence, instruction and spiritual good, how can we ever go up to Jerusalem once every year by and by? Ezek. xiv. 16–18. Remember the time and come.

WHAT TO BRING.

Come with the Spirit of the Master.
Bring the Bible.
Bring the wife and children.
If you come by R. R. bring a tent and bedding. If you have no tent bring a bolt of sheeting, some [illegible] twine or binding-twine, a needle [illegible] thread, and make a temporary [illegible] tar you get there. There [illegible] of the sheeting be wasted, [illegible] used it partially afterwards.
If you come with [illegible] wagon, bedding [illegible] dishes [illegible] will need. [illegible] your home.

REMEMBER.

That you are to be self-sustaining. If you come to this meeting, you will camp for a week and take care of yourself. Bread and butter can be had in Story City, and you will be expected to look after yourself. If you are disposed to complain stop and think of those worthies who "wandered about in sheep skins and goat skins being destitute," and of "others who were tortured" for the faith of the gospel, rather brethren esteem it a privilege to meet together under circumstances as favorably as these. Nay, it is a duty not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together. Again we say come.

For any further information about the meeting address A. J. Eychaner, Marshalltown, Ia.

Last year our June meeting was held at the above named place, and brother Watkins sustained the burden but he cannot afford to, and this year we ought not to let him do it.

Come, enjoy with us the camp, the mineral water, the boat ride, the preaching and the social meeting for one week.

MARRIED.

Nurse-Stetson.—At the residence of the groom's parents in Bremen, Ind., April 30, 1888, by N. H. Geissinger, Edward Nurse and Miss Ida Stetson.

Annual Meeting of Dunkards, North via Elkhart Plate.

And one did lead with trusted staff
And comfort's rod, to restful vale,
And tables set that none assail.
At end of way was quiet place,
Where they might wait the crown's grace.
And sleep in peace, till golden dawn
Should give reward for race well run.

And of the rest, the treacherous crew
Did make excuses old and new;
Complained, the way was hard to find,
So dim to eyes of aged and blind!
So rough and long for youthful feet,
Deserts to pass, and foes to meet;
And one to go, must cross beside
Such chilly river's bridgeless tide!

Some started out but hurried back
Discouraged by the narrow track,
And some the message half-believed,
Yet dallied on by far deceived.
Of better way and surer pay,
And reaching home by smoother way,
While some denied that any where
Were lovely land or mansion fair.

And some did say, that hand of chance,
And dark, untoward circumstance
Environed round and held them still,
From narrow path against their will.
They'd like to start,—would like to see,
The lovely land so fair and free;
But weak, irresistible now vain
For them to hope to break the chain!

bird may choose the pathway home, straight to warmth and summer come,
heavily soars on the bye,
to master's crib, to fly free!
the riddle. Farther man, o wills, is no
ight, and reach but Dodge
ver, you and Ephraim can go over to my house and go upstairs where you will find a warm room and prepare to preach the two discourses; and Alva says that he has some new arguments that we have never thought of, and he can tell them to you and you can tell them to us.

So we retired to the upper room and Brother Miller said, Brother Seymour
what course shall I pursue? Well, I said, I will tell you what I think, then you must do as you see fit. So I told him to get one discourse in opposition to Mrs. White's visions, and another in opposition to the seventh day sabbath. Well, said Brother Miller, that is my mind exactly.

So when the time came Brother
Miller took the pulpit before a congregation of some fifty or sixty Sabbath keepers. When he was preaching he came to a very strong point that they could not meet, and I, sitting in the congregation, spoke out and said, Amen,
quite emphatically, and as I said that the seventh day people looked to one another and scowled. Then when he presented another strong point that they could not get away with, I spoke out again, Amen, that is the truth. They scowled then worse than ever; they looked and acted as though they could crush Mr. Alva when the meetings were through.

We took breakfast the next morning
with Brother Smith's family. Brother
Miller got to talking with Brother
Smith, and I with Sister Smith and her two daughters, who were as well posted as any of their church members.
Brother Smith quoted Rev. xxii. 14 to Brother Miller. Brother Miller said, what commandments. Smith said the ten commandments. Said Brother
Miller, Can I be saved if I keep the ten commandments: Yes, you can.
What, said Brother M., independent of faith in Jesus Christ. This silenced
Brother Smith completely. While I was talking with the women, one of the girls kept saying "moral law" and
"ceremonial." I finally said, Sister
Smith, I want you to stop saying moral law; the Bible never uses such an expression. She declared it did.
No, said I, never. You said, I profess to be a Bible student. So I demand that you shall confine yourself to the Bible. She finally stopped saying moral law but kept on saying ceremonial. I finally demanded her to stop saying ceremonial law, for the Bible never uses such language. She pulled them off. Then Brother Miller took his chair and set it back by the side of the room, sat down and then said, Brother Lyon now I want to know why it is that you treat me so; I met you at the church yesterday and you could hardly speak, and now this morning I came to your house and you don't treat me with common civility, or as you would a stranger. I never knew that I ever had done anything to offend you, and if I have you have never been the man to tell me of it, so I must know why you treat me as you do. Lyon speaks out and says, We are commanded not to receive such folks into our houses, no not to eat with them. Brother Miller pulled his Bible out of his pocket and read the text he referred to; then he read it over again, referring to different specifications contained in the text, asking Lyons if he was guilty of such and such deeds, but found nothing till he came to idolatry, he thought he was guilty of idolatry. No, said Brother
M., I do not make images nor fall down to worship them, I am not an idolator.
Just at this juncture of the conversation some one rapped at the door, and when the door was opened, two men came in, Brother Dodge and his father-in-law Cyrenus Smith, the Elder of the church. They spoke out and said, Brother Lyon we want to see you privately.

So they all retired to a private room and held their counsel. They then came out and Brother Dodge delivered the secret of their private counsel. Said he, We have concluded to let Ephraim go into our church and preach two discourses in opposition to our views, but there is Alva, we do not want him to take any part in the meetings. When either of us was referred to, it was Ephraim and Alva, and Alva and Ephraim. Well, said I, to Brother Dodge, I met M. E. Cornell, Lyon's son-in-law, some time ago, and invited him home with me, and got out an appointment for him in my congregation. He stayed with me eight days and preached eight discourses. I raised for him in the meeting $8.00, and then took him to Hillsdale where he took the train for home. This is what I get in return for such kindness;
but, I said, never mind, if Brother
Miller can preach to you I'll be satisfied, for he is as well posted as I am, he posts more than two discourses before your week.
but Dodge
you and Ephraim can go over to my house and go upstairs where you will find a warm room and prepare to preach the two discourses; and Alva says that he has some new arguments that we have never thought of, and he can tell them
to you and you can tell them to us.

So we retired to the upper room and Brother Miller said, Brother Seymour
what course shall I pursue? Well, I said, I will tell you what I think, then you must do as you see fit. So I told him to get one discourse in opposition to Mrs. White's visions, and another in opposition to the seventh day sabbath. Well, said Brother Miller, that is my mind exactly.

So when the time came Brother
Miller took the pulpit before a congregation of some fifty or sixty Sabbath keepers. When he was preaching he came to a very strong point that they could not meet, and I, sitting in the congregation, spoke out and said, Amen,
quite emphatically, and as I said that the seventh day people looked to one another and scowled. Then when he presented another strong point that they could not get away with, I spoke out again, Amen, that is the truth. They scowled then worse than ever; they looked and acted as though they could crush Mr. Alva when the meetings were through.

We took breakfast the next morning
with Brother Smith's family. Brother
Miller got to talking with Brother
Smith, and I with Sister Smith and her two daughters, who were as well posted as any of their church members.
Brother Smith quoted Rev. xxii. 14 to Brother Miller. Brother Miller said, what commandments. Smith said the ten commandments. Said Brother
Miller, Can I be saved if I keep the ten commandments: Yes, you can.
What, said Brother M., independent of faith in Jesus Christ. This silenced
Brother Smith completely. While I was talking with the women, one of the girls kept saying "moral law" and
"ceremonial." I finally said, Sister
Smith, I want you to stop saying moral law; the Bible never uses such an expression. She declared it did.
No, said I, never. You said, I profess to be a Bible student. So I demand that you shall confine yourself to the Bible. She finally stopped saying moral law but kept on saying ceremonial. I finally demanded her to stop saying ceremonial law, for the Bible never uses such language. She positively said it did. I handed her my Bible and told her if what she had said was true to find the place where it was recorded, but she made no effort to find the text.

So after we had eaten our breakfast we harnessed our team and started for home communing with each other about the deeply interesting scenes we had passed through. Never have I seen a people so thoroughly exalted over our advent among them. They seemed to tremble from head to foot, fearful that we should break them up.
If two lions or hyenas had broken into their church while at worship they could not have felt worse or more fearful. But I thank the Lord that my faith stands on a more reliable basis, not so shaky. But I suppose they rejoiced exceedingly when they saw us get into our cutter and start for home.
The seventh day people have anchored on the most shaky, flimsy and sandy foundation of any people I have ever met.

In conclusion let me say that, neither God who is infinite in wisdom, or Christ in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwells, or the twelve apostles who were endued on the day of Pentecost with power to preach the gospel or the law of God after the inward man or the good and acceptable and perfect will of God. Rom. ii. 2, or the Holy Ghost who searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God, never require the church of God in this age to keep the seventh day Sabbath. Christ is our teacher, our High Priest, hear ye him. Now if any one desires to know what will be the final outcome of preaching another gospel, turn to Deut. xviii. 20; Gal. i. 8; Rev.
xxii. 18, and they will learn it.

The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional.
--BY--
FATHER CHINIQUY.

ITS REVELATIONS ARE AP-PALLING.

Pointed and horrible are words too weak to express the things which he relates — things enough to rouse the stones to cry out against a system which brings forth such ungodliness and deadly poison to the Church, the family and society.

Cloth, 12mo, 336 pages, with Portrait and Biographical Notice of the Author; Price $1.00.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROM-AN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS RE-PUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging.
"Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit.
These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success;
whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party cater to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic.
There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, as there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth bound, 192 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

The perfect unchangeable moral law is con-

The law of Moses and law of Christ are comparlength. The Sabbath question is carefully and ed in a somewhat new light.

Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity.
By J. P. Weethee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting to the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring:
"What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these, and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we are living in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason, touching the events of unfulfilled prophecy,
and shows that they are those of to-day.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the inspired
Word, supported by the drift of current events.
It discloses to the number waiting hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows what has superseded and is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the all-pervading yet to be.
Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the counsels of the unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth.
Price $1.50. Send to this office for this work.

The Eastern Question
In its various phases,—Egyptian, British, Russian, Ottoman, Hebrew, American and Messianic, by J. P. Weethee. The title of this book gives a good idea of its contents, and the reputation of the author is a guarantee of its worth.
The subject as a whole, and in its different divisions is handled in a masterly manner, and the reader is convinced at once that the author has spared no labor in the study of his topics.
The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 650 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $1.50. Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled, as we have received no invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. The two books,
"Coming Age" and "Eastern Question" if ordered together, $2.00.

My Seventh Day Sabbath Experience. No. 4.

When we arrived at Henry Lyon's he was carrying an armful of wood into the house. Brother Miller said, Good morning, Brother Lyon. Good morning, very coolly. I said, Good morning, Brother Lyon. Good morning, in a very low and cool manner. We followed him into the house. Neither of us was asked to take a chair. As there was one that stood near the stove, Brother M. took that and I went back to the side of the room and brought one up near the stove and sat down. Brother Miller said to Brother Lyon, we have come to see you and ask you why you keep the Sabbath? Said H. Ly, I have a good many reasons why I keep the seventh day Sabbath. Brother Miller said, Well I want to know what they are; if it is your duty to keep the Sabbath, it is mine, so give us your reasons. But he could not be persuaded to give even one. So after failing to draw anything out of his good many reasons, I spoke out and said, "Brother Lyon, the good book says, Sanctify the Lord God in your heart and be ready to give every man a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear. But neither of us could draw anything out

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 3.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE KOZOIC AGE.

Again creative energy asserted itself and age-labors were resumed. The vast depth of Laurentian and Huronian rock deposits, 40,000 feet in thickness, of Canada, attest the duration and power of this æon. Year after year passed by till they became centuries; century was added to century, eras passed into periods and they in their turn lapsed into the age ere the completion of the work designed to be accomplished in it. Yet immense in duration as it (the Eozoic Age) was, it lasted only long enough for the consummation of the work assigned to it. Its phenomena as shown by the sacred writings as well as by geologists, were principally confined to the gaseous and vaporous superstratum by which the earth was surrounded. It is true the rocky layer was greatly thickened under the seas of this the second age of the world; that metamorphic disintegration and redeposit had, doubtless, been begun; that its surface was more firm, giving greater promise of future stability in its assumed form; and that a low form of life (Protozoan,) appeared in its oceanic waters, but these as secondary works remain unnoticed in the divine record, while the separation of the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament; of the watery envelop resting on and covering the face of the earth from the dense, misty vapor resting on those waters by a clear interspace of atmospheric air, affording a horizon, on all sides shut in by the water above apparently meeting with the waters below, became the notable object of observation, and the matter of record.

A canopy was established.

In the preceding æon the dense mist-veil rested like a thick cloud, or fog, conformably upon the vast waste of water covering the earth; in this, the cloud had been raised into the air, where it was unbrokenly suspended in the canopy or firmament, over a still heated earth.

So thick and dark was this covering of cloud that the rays of the sun failed to penetrate through it to the surface of the ground beneath; the moon and the stars remained invisible, also, for they had not been "set in the heavens to give light upon the earth." That they existed from before the period when the earth became a satellite of the sun, cannot be doubted, but the cloud-veil was interposed between them and the earth, so that, although "set in the heavens" from a period long antedating the earth's existence and onward, they had not been set to give light to the earth.

Soundings of the oceanic waters covering the earth would have shown excursions in depth of its waters; elevations and depressions existed dependent on the corrugation of the granitic rock, induced by contraction of the interior, where consolidation was still constantly going on, and, doubtless, the shrinkage's terrific rockings and liftings not unfrequently dislocated vast areas of the granitic crust, producing immense rents and chasms, which, filling with the warm, acuous, (first-life) waters, boiled and steamed in violent fury until the rocks became cooled to the temperature of the enveloping flood.

The cloud-lift, however, yielding an interstratum of clear air, was the notable event of the age and as such finds a record in the Book of God. "And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament heaven." Gen. i. 6, 7.

Age-work was at last completed and its evening close again ushered in a second day for the exercise of judicial decision upon the age and its works. Had its accomplished creations been commensurate with the period employed in their consummation? Were they in accordance with the general plan of Jehovah, for the final completion of the earth, as formulated in his mind ere the beginning of creation? Did the results attained fill the thought of the Creator, or did they fail to be as he had desired?

God named the firmament Heaven, and thus evinced his satisfaction with the works wrought. The evening cadence of this and the morning dawn of the next, like its predecessor and all its successors were not abrupt endings, or breaks in the age, but rather, the gradual decline of the age with a cessation of creative energy in the line in which it had been acting, for a period known as "the evening and the morning," which was attested by terrific earth-convulsions, cataclysms and holocausts, often destroying entirely, or almost entirely, the prevailing forms of life that had characterized the age, as Prof. J. D. Steele very justly remarks in his "Fourteen Weeks in Popular Geology," "There are no sharply-drawn lines between the different ages. They fade into each other as insensibly as the mountain blends with the plain. Yet each has a prominent idea, and chronicles a grand transition in the world's history. Lesser changes are denoted by Periods, Epochs and Groups. Some, at least, of the revolutions were nearly if not quite universal. Those describe the other divisions were more local in their character. The periods and epochs are therefore not the same in Europe as in America." "Consequent upon each change was a new set of climatic influences, winds, ocean currents, etc., each necessarily producing its impress on the vegetable and animal life of the period. Thus there were pauses, as it were, in the deposition of sediment, each pause making a break in the strata."

Again, he says speaking directly of the Eozoic Age, the one under present consideration, "The metamorphism of the Eozoic rocks was closely attended by extensive upheavals, which twisted and folded them, throughout vast areas, into every conceivable form. They commonly remain, however, in regular layers, which can be traced. This would indicate a uniform force acting at right angles to the dip of the beds. These movements must have taken place prior to the Silurian Age, (the next in succession) since the Silurian rocks rest unconformably upon the Eozoic." The Bible records of the same period and events that "the evening and the morning were the second day."

In relation to the low form of life (Protozoa) mentioned above, we further find, Protozoa,—Rhizopoda,—"An important class of the lowest of the animal sub-kingdom, the Protozoa. In all the organisms of this class the body is composed of a simple gelatinous substance in which the name 'sarcode' is applied; locomotion is performed by the protrusion of processes which from their function are termed 'pseudopoda' or false feet. As in the case of all protozoa, except the infusoria, there is no mouth or intestinal tube." (Library of Universal Knowledge.) "Naturalists are in doubt, in many cases, whether to call them Plants or Animals. In most cases they have neither mouth nor stomach; and with comparatively few exceptions they are exceedingly minute, and almost wholly microscopic. Many of them are so small that they can be studied only by the most skillful observers aided by the most powerful microscopes." "The Protozoans are probably more numerous than all other animals of the globe. They abound in every ditch and pond, every pool and stream, and lake, and in almost every part of the ocean, and there in hardly a drop of water that is not inhabited by some of them. They were also abundant in the past geologic ages. Their skeletons or hard parts abound in the rocks in many places; and in some countries rocky strata hundreds of feet in thickness give abundant evidence of their profusion." (Prof. Tenney's Zoology.) Removing the white marble from the Laurentian rocks of Canada by macerating it in acid, the dark serpentine formations remaining in granules in fossiliferous beds of rhizopods, known as Eozoon Canadense.

Reflections. With what heart-risings of admiration and adoration do we watch the progress of creation as wrought upon by our Father which is in the heavens, first casting the earth materials from the central luminary, formless and void; shapeless and devoid of living organisms, through vast periods of duration, giving it a comely form, clothing its ever-increasing rock coating with water; separating the waters from the waters by a clear interstratum of air, and introducing living organisms into its waters, showing that the waves of the ocean would not always wash an empty, uninhabited shore. Truly God's ways are deeply grand, and the study of his methods most ennobling.

NATURAL IMMORTALITY THE BASIS OF THE DOGMA OF ENDLESS SUFFERING.—No. 3.

Again; among the numerous errors that have been handed down to us by false teachers, and preached as a part of Christianity, none perhaps is chargeable with doing so much mischief as the dogma of eternal torments. This is the source of much of the unbelief and scepticism and atheism that now so widely prevails. By the majority of what are called orthodox preachers men have been taught that the wicked go to a place of unutterable and unending misery; and tens of thousands of thinking men, in their whole intellectual and moral nature have risen up against the doctrine as unjust and inhuman; and when they have been told that Christianity taught the doctrine, they have concluded that Christianity, if it taught such an incredible and infamous doctrine, must be false; and so without examination they have rejected it. In this they have done a great wrong to Christ and his teachings, for an impartial examination for themselves of the Christian religion was their imperative duty. But taking the representation of Christian teachers to be correct,—that endless suffering was a doctrine of Christianity, they have too hastily rejected Christianity. Many Christian writers and preachers now deplore the spread of infidelity, agnosticism, and atheism; but they are themselves responsible, in part, for the spread of what they deplore; for it is their unscriptural teaching on future punishment and other topics that has produced a great deal of the present unbelief. Edward White, than whom few are better qualified to form an opinion on this point, says, "I steadfastly maintain, after forty years of study of the matter, that it is the notion of the infliction of a torment in body and soul that shall be absolutely endless, which alone gives a foot of standing ground to Ingersoll in America, or Bradlaugh in England." The truth is, this doctrine is inhuman, fiendish; man's intellectual nature is staggered at it; his moral nature is shocked, his heart is sickened; his understanding and conscience, yea, his whole being pronounces it unjust. It should not, therefore, excite much wonder if some men, while they are under the delusion that this is a Christian doctrine, reject the religion which they regard as responsible for it.

Let men be taught that the eternal torment theory is no part of Christianity, and Christianity will appear truer, and fairer, and more divine, and more beautiful in their eyes. Freed from this terrible incubus, the preaching of the gospel would have greater influence. The gospel would commend itself more fully to the minds and consciences of men. A formidable barrier would be taken out of its way. The righteousness of God's moral government would be more apparent. The character of God would appear in a different light. One of the great supports of infidelity, one of the strong weapons of rebellion would be removed. Many saints, brought up in the belief of the dogma, and held in fear and bondage by it, would experience a wonderful relief. Hard and unhappy thoughts of the Divine Being, which have often forced themselves into the mind, would give place to loving, peaceful, contented, and reverent thoughts.

This doctrine is one of the greatest obstacles to the spread of Christianity among the heathen. Enlightened heathen refuse to accept a religion which dooms all their departed kindred and friends who have passed away without a knowledge of the gospel, to eternal woe. Missionaries who have made this prominent in their teaching, have thereby placed a great barrier in the way of their success. They have closed the door of the hearts of numbers against them. Many instances have occurred in which when missionaries have taught this dogma, their message has been at once rejected; and when any, having been brought to see the truth on immortality and future punishment, have presented these doctrines in a Scriptural form, their message has been treated with respect and consideration. In illustration of this statement the following words of a missionary in India are to the point: "A native deputy magistrate," says he, "after a long conversation with me upon Christian doctrine, said, with joy beaming in his face: 'Sir, until today, I have never before conversed with any religious European who did not at the outset indispose me to listen to Christianity by his arrogant assumption of the soul's immortality, and the improbable doctrine of eternal torment, which he professedly erects upon it. I have always rejected Christianity at the outset on this ground. Now I find that there are Christians who disbelieve these two things, I shall be more inclined to think of Christianity with respect.'" It would be well for the cause of truth if all who are engaged in foreign mission work, would ponder the significance of this statement.

Some preachers imagine that to preach eternal misery as the punishment of sin, is the most successful means of deterring men from sin. Men of judgment and common sense regard such punishment as out of all proportion to human guilt and demerit, great as these sometimes are. The greatness of a man's sin, the greatness of his demerit, must be measured by his capacity; but the greatest human capacity is only finite, and therefore, no sinner can deserve never-ending suffering. Tell the sinner that he deserves to be kept alive to suffer the agonies of hell-fire to all eternity, and his whole nature boils over with opposition and indignation against the doctrine, because of its manifest injustice, inhumanity, and cruelty. He cannot believe it, and so is not influenced by it. But preach to him the Scripture doctrine of death as the wages of sin; tell him that the being which God has given him, if he abuses and perverts it, and refuses to repent, will be taken from him in the second death; and while this will appear dreadful, as, indeed, it is, and to be deprecated and shunned, there is nothing in it to strike him as inhuman and cruel, and he will be far more likely to be influenced by this teaching, and turn from sin. For it must be admitted by reasonable men that God, who gives man life, and sustains that life, has a right to take it away, if the end for which he gave it is not only not answered but abused. Some men, however, are so much in love with the gratifications of a sinful course, that no motives,—not even the love of God manifested through Jesus the Christ,—influence them to renounce sin and obey God. But we are not on this account to present motives to obedience which Scripture never presents, or use threatenings which God never uses.

We believe that on the multitude even of those who hear the doctrine of endless suffering preached, it has no influence for good. They listen to it comparatively unmoved. Tell them of some terrible earthly calamity that is likely to come upon them, unless a certain thing be done to avert it, and men of reason and common sense will be influenced by your statement, and endeavor to prevent the calamity. Why will they do this? Because there is credibility in your statement, and they believe it, and their belief moves them to action. But tell men that unless they repent, they shall be tortured in body and soul by the devil in fire and brimstone throughout endless ages; that the fire shall give them exquisite pain and unremitting pain in every part of their being without consuming them, and they are unmoved. But why are they unmoved? Because the thing seems incredible, impossible. They cannot think that a punishment so immeasurably greater than their sins, will ever be inflicted. They cannot believe it possible for a just and holy and merciful God thus to deal even with creatures who have rebelled against him. They listen to the appalling doctrine, but lacking faith in it, it fails to influence them; at least, for good.

Doubtless the preaching of eternal torments with a view to warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, defeats itself by its unreasonableness. Men who have reason and common sense, and who are not kept from seeing Scriptural truth by the blinding influence of being wedded to a creed, cannot believe this dogma. The mind must be in an unnatural, unhealthy, and a morbid state in order to believe it.

Truth must always have a greater and better influence than falsehood in turning men from sin. Teach men that death—eternal death, or extinction of being—is the wages of sin; and being Scriptural teaching, and therefore, true teaching, its power for good must necessarily be much greater than to teach them that sinners shall live eternally in excruciating torment.

BE WATCHFUL.

In reading the message of the Spirit to the church in Sardis, our attention is at once arrested by the words "Be watchful and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die," Rev. iii. 2; Matt. xiii. 34.

God has placed us in his house and we are not to forsake our post and run away, when things are ready to die, but we—You my brother, you my sister,—are "to strengthen the things that remain."

"You are to repent," "you are to stand fast," you are to "remember," you are to "be vigilant."

You are not to seek some other place where you imagine more good can be done, and where you can serve God more acceptably. He does not tell you to leave them. He tells you, "to strengthen them." If they are "ready to die" all the more need of your "standing fast," all the more need that you remain at your post. To abandon the ship in a storm is to seal its destruction; to forsake the sick, is to let them die, self seeks its own gratification, it would like to leave the hard place, it hates to battle with the few, and with go help but omniscience; but Jesus says, if a man will not deny himself, he cannot be his disciple. Self, must be put out of sight, we must do the appointed work.

If we are not watchful, the Lord will come on us as a thief, and we shall not know what hour he will come.

Watch ye therefore, lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping.

BABYLON OF THE APOCALYPSE.

As the supply of saints is "not sufficient for the market," the Pope has started his machine again. Twice I have been to see it run.

The Hall of Canonization is over the vestibule as you enter St. Peter's. It is about 300 feet long, 90 feet in width and 75 feet to the ceiling, in the centre of which is a golden halo with a dove descending through atmosphere such as veils Mount Blanc on a clear summer day. It was spanned by luminous arches of marvelous beauty and the place was flooded by the soft light of thousands of wax candles. At the far end where the Pope was enthroned, stood his altar. Behind and above this was an indescribable "Glory," the bright soft golden rays of which melted away in a pure atmosphere. In the midst of this halo was a silver ground, with nothing upon it, so far as we could see, but at the appointed moment figures began to develop until we had the Trinity in this "Glory," surrounded by cherubim. The Father appeared like a monk; the Son as a little baby in his mother's arms, smiling as if pleased to see so many pretty things; the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove, but the Virgin Mary was the great object of adoration. As represented there and accepted by the Pope, the Trinity was merely to "fill up the picture."

Separated from the people were the reserved seats on either side, raised one above the other, covered with costly damask with golden cord and fringe. These were occupied by the various orders, viz: Cardinals, archbishops, bishops, diplomatic corps, Roman nobility, the Pope's relatives, the representatives of various ecclesiastical orders, the cardinal secretary of state, with his officers, the majordomo of the apostolic palace, the pope's singers, etc. The Swiss and Palatine Guards, in their fantastic costumes, were the guards of honor. The galleries were occupied by distinguished visitors from all parts of the world.

As early as 5 o'clock the people began to assemble in the square in front of St. Peter's, though the ceremonies were not to begin until 9 o'clock and they knew they could see nothing until that hour. At least 50,000 people stood from three to six hours and looked at the building in which such mysterious work was being performed. This was the order within. First, congregation of the orders, procurators of the college of cardinals, lawyers of the consistory, private chaplains, cross-bearers, priests in chasubles (long gowns), two hundred bishops with white mitres and capes of silver cloth, embroidered with gold, archbishops, among whom were many Americans, Syrians and Greeks, dressed with a richness and magnificence beyond description. After these came forty cardinals in their official robes, preceded by vergers, followed by their "tail bearers" and "gentlemen in waiting."

When all were seated, there was for a few moments the silence of the tomb. Then the Pope in his sacerdotal chair, under a golden canopy and tabelli, of immense fans, of ostrich and peacock feathers, surrounded by the pontifical court, was carried into the hall and seated upon the "throne of God!" Extending his foot from under his royal robe, cardinals, archbishops and the others, in their order, came and kissed his hand, knee or toe, according to their rank. When this disgusting performance was ended the lawyers read the petitions for the canonization of these people, to which the Pope replied. Then he sang "Veni Creator," placed the miter upon his head, and pronounced them saints! At this moment the great bell of St. Peter's was rung and in a moment the thousands of bells in the city were rung wildly. The telegraph, by arrangement, told the news in other cities, and thus, all over the land, bells were rung to tell the people that now there were others in heaven to plead for them.

The Pope then signed the papers testifying that they were real saints and could be prayed to. Then he said mass and received the offerings for the occasion, consisting of a large historical candle, on which were painted historical scenes in the life of the saint, a silver cage with turtle doves, wild pigeons, canaries, and a box of bread and wine. He then bestowed the papal benediction and was borne out, and all retired in the order of their entrance. Thus ended this blasphemous demonstration of paganized Christianity. It is in the midst of such idolatry we are working. By the assistance of 202 ministers, teachers and other Christian workers, we carefully placed in the hands of these people during the year, 23,403 Bibles, Testaments and books of the Bible, besides our Sunday-school and other work. In addition, we have paid this winter the salaries of 57 teachers in 47 evangelical night schools for young people in various parts of Italy and the number is increasing.—W. O. VanMeter.

CHICAGOANS IN JERUSALEM.

The following letter was received by Mrs E. J. Bishop, of Chicago, from a lady friend who left Chicago some years since with several others, and went to Jerusalem, in Palestine, to await the second coming of Christ:

"JERUSALEM, Nov. 26, 1887.—My Dear Friend: Your letter, which was duly received a week or two ago, brought your face very clearly before me, and I remembered how you used to come to see Mother Gould from time to time, and how you always spoke to me of my mother. It is a long time since I met you there, and many things have taken place since then. I was glad to hear you were well, and interested in this land and this city. And I am very glad to tell you a few of the glorious things that we have been witnessed of during the six years we have lived here. When we arrived here six years ago the 20th of September, we numbered fourteen adults and five children. As we drove up from Jaffa we were deeply impressed with the desolation of the land. Not a spear of green could be seen anywhere; the olive trees and vines were so covered with the gray dust of a hot dry summer, that you never could imagine there could be any green underneath, and the whole earth seemed dried to its foundations. We realized to the full that it was a land under the curse of God still, for sin. But we have never seen it look like that since that time. Every year it looks greener and greener, and now, so many of those barren hill-sides are covered with vineyards, and olive yards, quite changing the appearance of everything.

You will ask what is the cause of this great change? God has promised that like as he brought all his evil upon this land, so he will bring great blessings unto it, and it has evidently begun by God sending more rain than for many thousand years. He sends beautiful showers and heavy dews where there used not to be any, and he sends clouds in summer, which were never known even twenty years ago. This tempers the heat so that it does not dry up the ground so. Five years ago he sent, in July and August (months in which it never used to rain), three hours of rain in Jaffa, and sixteen hours in Damascus, and much all around us that the American papers remarked upon it as a proof that the climate of Palestine was changing. Also, when we came here there were very few Jews coming back to this land, but the persecutions in Russia and Germany and other places began to drive them out, and, in spite of the edicts of the Sultan, they began returning to this land, buying land, planting and building, and getting possession of the trade of the city; and so today there are many thousands more than when we came.

Jerusalem is in reality now in the hands of the Jews, so far as trade is concerned, and the Jew is no longer under the heel of the Mohammedan as he once was. They are also rapidly building up a new city, exactly on the line of the description in Jeremiah xxxi. 38-40 and Jeremiah xxxii, 43-44, so that even the Turks who are in power, are taking notice of it, and are saying one to the other, "It is God, and what can we do?" And dear friend, what can we say to all this, but that God is rapidly fulfilling his word and the covenant he made with Abraham? In our day, we are witnesses of these things. God told us to come to Jerusalem and sit down and be instructed by him, and also witness what he is about to do in the earth that we might tell it to the generation following. Had we listened to our friends and not obeyed God we could not have seen the land just as it was, with the curse on it, and so been able to contrast it with what it would be when God began to restore. For no one has eyes for these things in Jerusalem but ourselves; nevertheless they are facts.

There is no mission work in this land that is doing any real good. The lives of the Christians are so contrary to the word of God that they are only false witnesses for him, and we are not looking for any good results to come from that part of work for Christ. But we are looking for John xvii. to be fulfilled—where Christ says that "when he had a body made perfect in one even as he and the Father are one," then the world will believe that he was sent of the Father. For this we are pressing as a great prize set before us, and we are looking for such mighty things as the world never saw before. These are glorious days, and our hearts are full of joy at what is coming upon the earth.

With kind regards to your family, I am your loving friend.—Amelia Gould, in Our Rest.

THE Daily Sun, a paper started about one week ago at Indianapolis, Ind., has been sent to our office since its commencement. It is offered at the low price of one cent a number or three dollars a year. It is very well managed and bids fair to win success as one of the journals of the times.

WHETHER the war cloud, that has been long gathering in the East, bursts forth soon in all the fury of a tempest or not, one thing is quite certain—its dark hues are constantly becoming more gloomy and portentious. The feeling of Russia toward England is anything but pacific at the present time.

Two or three months ago we made a request to friends living in our great cities to make inquiry at the large book stores for Alexander Hislop's work entitled "The Two Babylons." The search was unsuccessful. We then requested Bro. G. W. Young to have it ordered from London, Eng., which he kindly did, and the work has come to hand. It is a work of profound research, as several hundred authors have been critically consulted by the learned author, who has also been aided in an extraordinary manner by the assistance of literary gentlemen of eminent attainments. It demonstrates the close relationship of the two Babylons, the one, the Old Pagan Community, and the other, the Papal Romish System of more modern times. We intend to give our readers something hereafter from this elaborate work.

ROMISH MORALS AND INDULGENCES.

We now proceed to unfold some additional account of the morals of the Romish hierarchy during the period A. D. 1409—1517, being the period of darkness and scandalous criminality immediately preceding the Protestant Reformation. We quote from Gieseler's Church History a section of one of his Chapters which relates to the

"MORAL CONDITION OF THE CLERGY.

The reformation of the deeply degraded clergy was the principal part of that reformation of the church in head and members, the call for which was resounding through this entire period. But in this respect also all efforts for reform seemed generally fruitless, and the lamentations over the coarseness and ignorance, over the unspiritual and immoral conduct of the clergy, remain down to the end of this period unsheltered and the same. The foulest stain of the clergy, their unchastity, seemed only to increase in proportion as it was assailed with greater zeal. As the sternest denunciations of the reforming councils of Constance and Basle could not even produce external decorum in a large part of the ecclesiastics there present, so the decrees of these councils upon this subject continued to have no visible effect upon the church. No century can produce so many decrees of synods and bishops against the concubinarii as the fifteenth. And yet in no century are the complaints, as well as the scandal, caused by the licentiousness of the clergy, which in Italy not unfrequently amounted to unnatural crimes, (See note 1) said by the truthfulness of all chronicles, so numerous as in this. The severer sentences could not, for the most part, be carried into execution, because of the numbers of the guilty; thus the avarice of the bishops could more easily lead to the substitution of pecuniary fines, which were soon computed for a standing annual tax paid by the concubinarii. As licentiousness became more customary among the clergy, a frivolous estimate of such transgressions began to prevail among them. The laity naturally shared in this opinion, and so the sin of licentiousness increased in a fearful manner, and introduced at the end of the fifteenth century new and loathsome [illegible] ... ## MISSIONS.

Go ye forth to every nation,
'Tis the Master bids you roam,
Open too, fonnts of salvation
For the thirsty ones at home.

From the distant isles in ocean,
Hearken to the plaintive call;
or the instinct of devotion
Is within the hearts of all.

Carry them the bread of heaven,
In the far-off Eastern lands.
Tell of waters, freely given,
Temples, fashioned not with hands.

Heard again through struggling years
Is the Macedonian cry.
Heaping still of sin the ways—
We must "help" them or they die.

But while some with zeal undaunted,
Bear abroad salvation's plan,
Let not our fair homes be haunted
By so great a pagan band.

Thus the country spread your mission,
From your town or city's sin;
Ignorance and superstition
Here walk hand in hand with sin.

Preach till every rural fireside
Once for knowledge a-glow fire,
Till not country's every milestone
Is a heaven-ward pointing spire.

A HEBREW'S CONVERSION.

The author of the following confession is well known to us. He is a young Jew of culture and high social position, and the story of whose conversion is most highly interesting. From an intimate acquaintance with him, we can truly speak of him as an "Israelite indeed in whom is no guile." At our invitation, he told the story of his conversion before our congregation. The following, since published, is a good report of his address.—Editor of Watchword.

In rising to address you, I am filled with a supreme joy and an unbounded thankfulness to Almighty God that he has spared me until this time, thus enabling me to proclaim my belief in the Godhead of his only-begotten Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, and to testify to my faith in the infinite power and glory of his holy name. In one respect, I believe my position differs from that of any present, inasmuch as I was born in the Jewish faith. Now, no one realizes more fully than I do, the odium that usually attaches to any who is an apostate from the faith of his fathers. I remember, it is not many years since, I would have stigmatized such a deed as an act of the greatest cowardice, and one having its inception in motives the reverse of pure and holy. I have now altered this opinion, and what I say today I wish to be accepted as a justification of my conscientiousness.

Suppose a young man is living in a country where generation after generation of his fore-fathers have lived and died. This country is far away from the large centres of population; but the gradual spread of education and culture has at last reached this far-off region, and has awakened in his mind a restless, indescribable craving that nothing in his surroundings can satisfy. He does not know exactly what he requires. All he can define is, that he is thoroughly unsettled, and that there has been engendered an all-powerful desire to see for himself those great countries and wonders of the world of which he has heard and read so much. He has sufficient ambition and courage to go on a journey of exploration, and after encountering much hardship and danger, at last arrives in a country which more than realizes his most sanguine expectations. He settles down, becomes very successful, and is soon enabled to gratify every desire, and is, moreover, enabled to bring his relatives, his old friends and companions, into the same glorious land, which is abundant enough to support millions of people. I ask you, one and all, Would you call that man a traitor to his country, or a deserter of his friends, because he had sufficient courage to brave danger and undergo hardship in the hope of gaining a bright and happy future he knew could never be realized by remaining in the land of his forefathers?

And is it not the same with the soul's longings? Have we not this same restless, indescribable, spiritual craving? Have we not, nearly every one of us, an ever-abiding conscious sense of sin? Does this not produce first sorrow, then despondency, then despair? And, if we have no religion to sustain us, do we not run into all manner of dissipations, in the hope of gaining relief or forgetfulness? This was somewhat of my position. At last, I fly to religion for a solace; and I find religion, as taught by the Jews, neither confers consolation in sorrow, nor does it give one strength to resist temptation. I read the Bible, and first mean to born in sin; but I find no justification. You must understand, I had not read the gospel; and, in the present day, the Jews have no temple wherein they can make sin-offerings to God as a probation for their transgressions. Time after time, I asked, Why should man be held responsible? I received no satisfactory answer, and was filled with a great sorrow, knowing my own weakness.

I had heard of a religion beyond—the religion of the Christian. Here, I was told, those who were sorrowful or distressful found consolation; those who were burdened with sin found a justification; and those who were weak found a great strength to resist temptation, by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. In my despair, I resolved to explore this new spiritual country. I commenced attending church and reading the gospel, and, after a prolonged struggle, the light of the glorious truth was made evident; and, in accepting this great truth of God, in full, abiding faith, I gained as I was promised, a consolation for my sorrow, a justification from my sins, and a greater strength to resist temptation.

I ask you, one and all, would it not have been worse than madness for me to have refused this great salvation?

I am thankful, having found grace in God's sight, that he has made the truth evident to me; and it is clear and bright to my soul's sight as the noonday sun of a fine summer's day is clear and bright to all who will not refuse to look. I thank God he thought it best to take me by the by-path of sorrow, through the valleys of despond and despair, into that glorious country where you can feel, as it were, the near presence of the Savior, standing with outstretched hands and a glorious smile on his face, ready to welcome repentant sinners. No one who has not experienced this feeling can realize the supreme rapture of the moment when the heart bounds with joy at feeling the nearness of this glorious Presence, and when the rarefied atmosphere surrounding the inner life caused thereby, makes the soul expand in bliss in an anticipation of joys to come. It would take the combined eloquence of every preacher in Christendom, and then they would fail to portray the blissful, serene contentment that falls into one's life when he first realizes the full meaning of these words, "My Redeemer and my Savior;" when, in every fibre, heart, soul, mind, and spirit combine, and go forth in glad accord to meet and accept in faith that gracious invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." No pulpit oratory can possibly convey the faintest idea of the restful happiness that remains with you, if you accept the promise, in full, abiding faith. The greater the soul's sin, the greater the joy. The greater the sinner, the kinder and more generous the welcome.

Understand, I did not arrive at this conclusion until after a prolonged struggle. My unhappiness was not occasioned by the want of good and kind relatives and friends, nor for lack of resource of amusement without myself. It was occasioned by the ever-abiding, conscious sense of sin within, and the knowledge of my weakness and inability to overcome this. In accepting the Lord Jesus Christ as my Redeemer and Savior, I gained that peace that passeth all understanding; and now, after years of sorrow, I am looking forward to a bright and happy future and a life of usefulness to my fellowmen.

In embracing the Christian religion, I do not renounce the faith of my fathers. I retain this, and accept the Lord Jesus as the promised Redeemer and Savior. I accept the Bible and the gospel as the inspired word of God, without the slightest reservation and in the fullest possible faith.

There is one circumstance I cannot allow to pass unmentioned. I had to struggle between separating myself from my Savior, or from my beloved mother and sisters—a mother and sisters of whom any son or brother might well feel proud, and who love me fondly and dearly as son and brother were ever loved; a mother whose image is entwined around my heart's core by the remembrance of a thousand kindnesses; a mother who lives entirely for her children, and whom this deed of mine will grieve long and deeply. I separate myself from my darling sisters, who, in a time of great sorrow, displayed in a hundred different ways the most considerate loving kindness, and who are at this moment anxiously awaiting my arrival in England. But this does not depress me. I can only hope, by the grace of God and by the power of this love, that they will eventually be brought into the only true faith.

In conclusion, I would say, as a Christian, I hold out the hand of good fellowship to all men, Jew and Christian; to the Jews especially; in consideration of the kindness and hospitality I have received wherever I have been, in England, Australia, and America.

And, finally, in this my public proclamation of Christianity, I ask forgiveness and pardon of any I have injured or offended. Those who have injured or offended me, I freely forgive. If, through any example, deed, or influence of mine, any one has been brought within the circle of sin, I pray earnestly to God he will no longer let the effect of this example have dominion over him, and that one and all may be brought to his service through our Lord Jesus Christ.—Watchword.

Unforgiven.

"Charlie?"

"Well."

"Forgive me, dear?"

No answer. I just go on packing my valise.

"Charlie?"

"Well."

"Will you forgive me, dear?"

The sweet voice vibrates through my heart in tender evidence, but she is always doing something and then asking to be forgiven, and I am tired of it. I will teach her a lesson, and also that forbearance sometimes ceases to be a virtue.

"Charlie?"

"Well."

"Please forgive me, dear."

I have finished my packing and am ready for my journey. As I take my grip to my hand I turn half towards the spot where sits a slender figure in the shadow of the heavy portiere, but I think better or worse—of it, and stride across the room to the outer door; then I turn and say: "Good bye, Nell; I'll be home Wednesday."

"Charlie?" reproachfully.

But I do not turn, and the door closes behind me.

But all day long I hear a sweet voice saying, "Charlie, will you forgive me, dear?" The wheels, as they turn swiftly upon the steel rails, cry out. "Will you forgive me, dear?" The whistle screeches it; the rhythm of the cars in their ceaseless motion says, "Forgive me, dear; forgive me, dear; forgive me, dear."

My journey is ended, and now surely that sweet voice will cease its musical horrors in my ears.

But no. In the footsteps of men upon the streets of a strange city; in the outcry of the crickets out in the fields; in the quiet of my room, and the hum of the busy voices below, I hear only the words, "Will you forgive me, dear?"

I must go home; I will seek my young wife, and I will forgive her.

But the train appears to move so slowly; the stations seem to be far apart; the fields crawl by.

Ah! my journey is ended. I will be at home. But I must hasten. Somehow I feel that I've not a moment to lose. I must be home.

Ah! here it is. There's a light in the chamber, our chamber. My request she is waiting for me. She knows I could not stay away. Ah! let me once more get hold of her, how I will forgive her, my poor patient little wife. How often she has forgiven me!

But she does not open the door as is her wont at sound of footsteps she knows so well. Her sweet face welcomes me not, but another as white as marble.

I followed, dazed, into my wife's room. She is there yet, and upon her arms lies my little new born daughter. But never will her little arms be raised to my embrace, and never again will she say to me, "Forgive me, dear!"

I could not sleep that night; I could not sleep the night before; I shall not sleep tonight, for all through the silent watches I shall hear one sound—the cry of a sweet voice calling out in never ceasing pleadings, "Please forgive me, dear!"

Faith and Experience.

Ezra had a four months' journey in coming from Babylon to Jerusalem. From Ezra viii. 22 we learn that he had been telling the king of his confidence in God. But God often makes us prove our public utterances. And, so, when the time comes to start for Jerusalem, Ezra is ashamed to ask the king for an escort, because he had formerly told the king: "The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him." So they fasted and besought God and knew the word of the Lord to be true in two ways. He had it, not only as a matter of faith, but as a matter of experience. He proved, by experience, that the "good hand of God was upon him," Chap. viii. 0. The Bible is the Word of God. But God himself is behind the Book, to carry it into effect. Hence the force of the rebuke of the Lord Jesus to the Sadducees, "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God."

HOW DEAR TO ME

My childhood home—how dear to me
Each flower and shrub and leafy tree
That grew around the dear old place,
Where first I saw my mother's face!

The memory of that fireside's dear,
Where oft I dropped a truant tear,
Or built at eventide's sweet hour
To infinite castles many a tower.

My mother's voice! I hear it now,
And feel her hand pressed on my brow,
As I in childhood lisped my prayer
With angels bending, listening there.

Those silver threads in shining fold
On mother's brow, once waves of gold.
How carried they like tales there
Of love unconquerable, earthliest will, care!

Her hands that oft caressed my head
Are stilly folded with the dead;
Her lips that taught my heart to pray
Shall wake the song in endless day.

My childhood home—how dear to me
Each spot where fancy takes me free,
Around that dear familiar place
Where last I saw my mother's face!

A TOUCHING INSTANCE.

If there is anything more beautiful than a frank confession, it is a full and ready forgiveness. "To err is human, to forgive divine,"—and we may add—"to withhold forgiveness is devilish." Lovely is it, when the sorrowful heart, pouring out its liquid grief over a wrong done, which can never be recalled, is met by an eager pardon—a forgiveness which even takes blame to itself in order to shield the offender. Here is a melting scene from lowly life:—

One day three or four weeks ago, a gamin, who seemed to have no friends in the world, was run over by a vehicle on Gratiot avenue, and fatally injured. After he had been in the hospital for a week, a boy about his own age and size, and looking as friendless and forlorn, called to ask about him and to leave an orange. He seemed much embarrassed, and would answer no questions. After that he came daily, always bringing something, if no more than an apple. Last week the nurse told him that Billy had no chance to get well. The strange boy waited around longer than usual, and finally asked if he could go in. He had been invited to many times before, but had always refused. Billy, pale and weak and emaciated, opened his eyes in wonder at sight of the boy, and before he realized who it was, the stranger bent close to his face and sobbed:

"Billy, can you forgive a feller? We was allus fighting, and I was allus too much for ye; but I am sorry! 'For ye die, wont ye tell me ye have't any grudge agin me?"

The young lad, then almost in the shadow of death, reached up his thin white arms, clasped them around the other's neck, and replied:

"Don't cry, Bob—don't feel bad! I was ugly and mean, and I was heaving a stone at ye when the wagon hit me. If ye'll forgive me, I'll forgive you, and I'll pray for both o' us."

Bob was half an hour late the morning Billy died; and when the nurse took him to the shrouded corpse, he kissed the pale face tenderly, and gasped:

"D—did he say anything about me—about me?"

"He spoke of you just before he died—asked if you were here," replied the nurse.

"And may I go—go to the funeral?"

"You may."

And he did. He was the only mourner. His heart was the only one that ached. No tears were shed by others, and they left him sitting by the new-made grave with heart so big that he could not speak.

If under the crust of vice and ignorance there are such springs of pure nobility, who shall grow weary of doing good?

Dear Youthful Workers:

I want you to take your maps and find Holland and then look for a place called Leyden, because 314 years ago, the people of Leyden were in great trouble. They had been reading the Bible and had learned to think for themselves. That you know, the great man of the Catholic Church thought was wrong.

But it made no difference what he thought they kept on reading, and all the people of Holland kept reading until a great many of them became heroics.

You remember the Emperor Charles before whom Luther stood at Worms, do you not? Well, he was Emperor of Germany and King of Spain, Naples and the Netherlands, and he did not like it to think his subjects should read the Bible and believe what the Catholics did not believe, so he took a great deal of money away from the people of Holland, took their farms away, and had a great many burned to death.

But he had got tired of ruling, and had resigned his crown to Philip of Spain. Philip put a great many more of them to death. Then, they said, he should not be their ruler. They chose a man, who was called William the Silent for their leader. He had been a Catholic too, but he had found out better and "was ready to give up his life for liberty." He made up his mind to drive Philip's soldiers out of Spain. They are trying to take Leyden, the city I wanted you to find on your maps.

Philip sent the citizens word that he would forgive them, if they would give up the town. But they could not think they had done anything wrong in reading the Bible, and in believing what it taught, so they sent back word, that "they would fight for their religion, as long as there was a man left."

Holland is a level country, and part of the land used to be under the sea. The people built dikes of bundles of brush, and trees and mud, to shut out the ocean, and then they pumped out the water.

They dug great canals, these were their roads, the land, they made into fields and gardens.

There were several canals near Leyden. Inside of these were Philip's soldiers. They kept the poor people of Leyden shut in, until there was hardly anything left to eat. They expected to starve them until they would give up.

They could only send word to their friends by tying letters to the necks of pigeons.

The Silent man had not enough soldiers to fight Philip's men, but he thought how he could fight them. he could cut the dikes and let the sea come in. The people were very glad to hear this. They said they could pump the water out again, as the people in the country took what they could with them and went to a great city, called Amsterdam, and the Silent man sent men to work to break down the dikes.

Then two hundred vessels were filled with things to eat, ready to sail to Leyden. A letter was sent to them by a pigeon telling them about it.

They were so glad that they fired off cannon, and sang songs and rang bells, over the news.

Philip's men wondered what was the matter, but they found out when the water began to rise around them. But for awhile it did not rise high enough; then the Spaniards laughed.

But twenty-five hundred sailors were coming to the aid of their brethren, they have come fifteen miles over the fields and gardens, that are now under water, there are only five more miles to come.

God send a great northwest wind, it makes the waves roll in, and the vessels float to within a half mile of the city. Thousands of poor creatures have already starved to death. They have eaten rats and cats and dogs, roots of grass and the leaves of trees, but they wont give up.

The burgomaster of the city said they might cut him to pieces and eat him up, but God helping him he would never surrender.

How brave he was! His name was Van der Werff.

The soldiers of Philip kept on laughing, they said the sea hadn't come to Leyden yet; they called the people rat-eaters and wanted to know "how they got on?"

They answered, "as long as you can hear a dog bark inside the walls, you may know that the city holds out. We will eat our left arms and fight with our right. When we can stand no longer, we will set fire to the city and perish in the flames, rather than give up our liberties."

Again the wind whirls southwest and the water rises. In the morning the ships are close to the forts, and Philip's soldiers are frightened almost to death.

They rushed along the dike and the Hollanders chased them and struck them down with harpoons.

In the night, part of the wall of the city fell down. It made Philip's soldiers so afraid, that they all hurried away.

In the morning not one of them was left.

The ships sailed up to the town and the poor starving people now had plenty to eat. When they were satisfied, they went into a great church and, knelt down and with tears thanked God for saving them from such cruel foes.

God never permitted the Spaniards to go back to Holland.

That is the way the Bible has come down to us. It has been by men being brave and willing to die for the truth.

You see nothing can drive men away from God, when they really and truly love him. Your loving friend.

The Reason for Hope.

No man has a right to live a life without being able to give a reason for his cause, and the more extraordinary the manner of life, the more need is there that he explain it.

The Christian life is a strange life in the eyes of the unbelieving world, and it has been so ever since those few men in Galilee left their old course of life for the service of their Master. Probably no sincere disciple of Christ ever yet lived, without being called upon to suffer for "righteousness sake." Whether the persecution has been physical or moral, it has been real. The Christian needs an apology for his mode of life. Peter proved this when he urged upon the churches the necessity of "being ready always to give answer to every man that asketh you a reason concerning the hope that is in you."

This suggests the secret of a useful and joyful Christian life. What is your hope of salvation, Christian reader? Can you tell the unbeliever with assurance and without hesitation? Of course you can, for your hope rests, first of all, upon knowledge, the knowledge of Christ's word to you.

We find some very unhappy Christians, who are always examining their lives or their feelings to find what their hope of salvation is. Your Christian life will be far from satisfactory, if you look for your hope of salvation, anywhere but to the Lord. It is not possible to live a day without sin, for which you must ask God's forgiveness. What hope does your life give you then? It is not possible to feel as you wish to always, for the feelings are not directly controlled by the will. What hope can your feelings give you, then? It is possible, though, to know that you are saved; you know what the conditions of salvation are, and if you have accepted these conditions, you have a hope which is "an anchor to the soul." No imperfect life, no fickle feelings can give the assurance that the words of Christ always do. It is a revealed fact that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." There is your apology, struggling Christian. You need not formulate an elaborate confession of faith, but you need never hesitate to answer when asked for your hope of salvation.—Dr. R. Hatch.

Report of Meeting.

On Saturday evening, May 5, 1888, Elder L. E. Conner commenced meetings at Poplar Grove, Marshall Co., Ind., and continued over Sunday. Four were added to the church, three by immersion and one who had been baptized before. This is a new neighborhood, where Brother Conner labored some last winter. They organized and elected Brother Geo. W. Smith their elder. They have also started a Sunday School, with sixty-eight enrolled, to meet at 2:30 p. m. each Sunday. Brother Smith was at the office and gave us this report of the work at Poplar Grove. The Lord is certainly blessing Brother Conner's efforts, and our prayer is that he may have strength to continue his labors, and that the little band gathered at Poplar Grove may continue waiting and watching for the coming of the Lord.

...sun of summer
...liquid gold
...asy ocean,
...flowery wold
...ss round the blossoms,
...sings by its nest,
...joyous throbbing
...gathered tone of sobbing—
This order of "Throbbing after rest.
Weeeeeeeeee"

...or these sunny skies shall darken,
And the sea's wild billows flow,
And the leaves shall fall and moulder
In a shroud of winter's snow:
And the voice of song shall falter;
So there's sighing in the breast
Of a world in blindness praying
For a beauty undecaying,
And a true, abiding rest.

And, however well we love them,
Those dear faces young and hale
In the breath of time must wither,
And the touch of death must pale;
Soon we leave them, or they leave us—
These, our beautiful and best!
For the doom of death has bound us:
There are tombstones all around us,
And this world is not our rest.

Hark! responsive to this wailing
Comes a tender voice from One:
"I can meet this world-wide longing,
Change life's bitter undertone."
It is Christ, the nation's Healer,
And the balm for souls distressed:
For the craving heart, perfection,
For the dead, a resurrection,
For the weary spirit, rest.

And his witnesses are crying:
"Now the blood of Christ can save,
And communion with his Spirit
Is the bliss you blindly crave!
On his breast, for sinners bleeding,
When your bleeding soul is pressed,
You re-enter Eden's portal
And regain the tree immortal
And the rapture and the rest."

Here our skies may change and darken,
But there's cloudless light before;
Here our friends and we must sever,
But we'll meet on yonder shore.
There foundations never totter,
And no partings wring the breast:
And the beauty fadeth never,
And the song is sung forever
In the home of endless rest.

"Mister, Is You Got a Garden?"

A few days ago the writer heard a rap at the back gate where he was at work, and upon opening the gate, a good-natured looking colored man was there with a small basket of what seemed to be onion buttons for planting. With a smile of real benevolence he asked the above question, "Mister, is you got a garden?" "Yes," said I, "a very small one." "Well, mister, dese yere is sweet flower seeds, smells jes like 'fum'ry. I's been plantin' some in our garden, an' dese yere is left. It looks like a pity to waste 'em. No sir, I isn't sellin' 'em, no indeed, I jes thought it a pity to see 'em wasted." "You are a grand man," said I.

Already the reader can see a beautiful suggestion in this artless black boy's great ambition to see those seeds planted. How I wished that I had the same anxiety to assist my neighbors in planting some of the beautiful flowers of Christian truth in their heart-gardens. What a contrast between a garden unkept, neglected, and one smiling with beautiful blossoms and emitting sweet fragrance, making glad all who come near it.

"You'll be surprised sir," said the black boy, to see what a nice big sweet flower will come from dese yere seed." Though black he seemed an angel. O, why cannot I go and do likewise, talk likewise about the precious seed of Bible truth? Is it not a shame to keep the beautiful flower seed locked up, rolled up in a napkin, or hid in the earth when so many desolate hearts are all around us? Can't we go up to these lonely ones and ask them if they will accept a few beautiful seeds, seeds that can be planted in the heart, and that will live through the winter? One can talk so about the truth seeds. Here is one and it looks very old like true, but it is full of sap, will grow anywhere. It is not only fragrant, but it serves as a shade in summer, and is strong enough to break, lessen the force of the winter winds. Its full name is, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Yes, that is also old-looking, but it is also full of vitality; it should be planted near the first. "Grow fast!" That depends on how you water and attend to it; all those seeds, like other seeds, need nutrition. Its full name is, "By his stripes we are healed." Plant this flower in a conspicuous place where it can be always seen. It is also a hardy flower, will live in all climes and seasons. It is an evergreen, and better than any medicine for the sick room.

My time is limited; I have time just to show one more. The one by all means should be not put in vase. This is named, "Because I live ye shall live also." True, life is not to some how so very desirable. Some are tired of it and end it by their own hand, that is, I mean, mortal life, the life we have in common with our dumb fellow mortals. The life I refer to is the immortal life. When we get that there will be no need to suicide. Immortal souls don't suicide. Want of time compels me to stop right here. "In the morning sow thy seed," seeds of truth, of course. I. McGUARY.

"Fair is the field now waiting the sowers;
Barren the ground till the seed shall be cast;
Warmed by the sunshine and moistened by showers:
Hasten, oh, sower, ere seed time be past.

What is the seed ye will plant in the furrow?
What do ye think at the reaping to glean?
Harvest can bring to your sickle but sorrow,
If at the sowing the seed be not clean.

Whimwed of chaff and of grains that are withered;
Sifted of tares that would choke out the wheat;
Sow but the best if the best would be gathered,
For as ye sow, of its yield must ye eat.

Corn can come only from good seed provided;
Weeds can produce but of that which is sown:
He who has cast, and the harvest abided,
Whether of gain or of weeds, reaps his own.

Scouling of truth will return to the reaper
Harvest in kind, with a hundred fold gain:
Evils once sown, rooting deeper and deeper,
Yield at the last a foul harvest—of pain."

The Coming of the Lord.

For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Matt. xvi. 27.

The Master often told his disciples about his coming again, not only so, but spoke of his coming in a manner designed to cheer and console them, which would not be the case unless his coming was to be personal and real. For the truth of this proposition note the manner of his coming and what follows. He comes in his Father's glory with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Then no reward until he come again, and nothing short of a real, personal and literal coming will fill the bill and satisfy the minds of his waiting children.

When the disciples were much perplexed and their hearts were filled with sorrow over the sad news of their Master's going away, his kind and loving heart responds, "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you: I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." John xiv. 1-3. Here is a consolation that is real, solid and lasting, for as sure as this was the Son of God talking to his disciples, and that went away to prepare a place for them, just so sure will this same Jesus fulfil his promise by coming again and receiving them unto himself.

Now if it were expedient for his people that he go away that the Comforter might come unto them, O how much more expedient it is that he come again and receive them unto himself, that where he is they may be also. When our dear friends here leave us for a long time, sorrow fills our heart, and nothing but the return of the same identical friend will satisfy our longing heart and make our joy complete. No other friend ever can fill the same place in our affections, how much less a very cruel enemy? How very strange it is that sensible men and women will believe and teach that "death is but the voice that Jesus sends." Where is the consolation in the thought? And why do we so fervently importune the good Lord not to come in that way? Is the herald of death good news? If so why do we mourn departing friends and shake at death's alarm? Ah, the glorious old doctrine of the coming of the Lord has been shamefully perverted, as the two events are as much unlike as day and night. One is as dark as darkness itself, the other is all light as the day of the Lord; one causes deep sorrow and separation of dear friends, the other brings dear friends together, causing great joy and rejoicing. The poor Jew has been blind for a long time in part over his first coming; but he is not to be imposed upon by receiving an enemy as a substitute. But thanks be to God, a better day is now dawning, and their hearts are turning to the Lord, and that old veil of blindness is being taken away, which we can but regard as a good omen, a sure indication that the day of the Lord is nigh at hand, the day in which he will make up his jewels, and reward his people with glory, honor, immortality and eternal life. Some say it don't make any difference about the time, just so we live right and are ready when he comes. Can we live right when we are so cold and indifferent about so important an event as the coming of the Lord? Watch and pray lest that day come on us unawares and unprepared.

Pullman Vestibule Cars still run on Pennsylvania Lines.

CHICAGO, May 2.—Judges Gresham and Blodgett, of the United States Circuit Court here, this morning delivered an opinion sustaining the patent for the Pullman Vestibule Cars, and enjoining the Wagner Palace Car Company and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company from using the same by granting the Pullman Company the injunction asked for. The opinion, which was delivered by Judge Gresham, after reciting the history of the Pullman's suit against the Wagner and Lake Shore Companies, and explaining just what the Pullman's invention was, proceeds as follows:

"The patent was granted to Henry Howard Sessions on November 15, 1887, his application having been filed in September preceding, about the time the first completely equipped so-called vestibule train was put in service on the Pennsylvania Lines. The defendants were not slow in appropriating Sessions' improvements, by operating trains of a similar construction. The appropriation was so complete that the Wagner vestibule train appears to be a duplicate of the Pullman train. The defendants did not claim to do this under the authority of letters patent of their own. They deliberately appropriated every substantial feature which was exhibited in Sessions' invention and the Pullman vestibule train, whether patentable or non patentable. To say the least, this was a recognition by the defendants of the merits of the Sessions improvement. It is true that the defendants inserted an elliptic spring between the outward the frame plate at the top, instead of employing the Sessions or separate coil springs. This difference, however, was formal and not substantial, both springs performing the same function.

In support of the motion for an injunction the complainant filed a large number of affidavits, from which it appears that trains operated with the Sessions improvement move with greater steadiness; that the movement is so much reduced that passengers can sleep more comfortably in the upper berth; that the car lamps are capable of being turned with a lighter flame, and that persons affected with nausea suffer less in that way when traveling upon a Pullman vestibule train than on trains not embodying Sessions' improvement. The evidence seems to show the practical value and utility of the improvement.

We shall not refer at length to the various patents which are relied upon as having anticipated the Sessions improvement, further than to say that none of them embody the substantial feature of the Session invention. It is true that the patent is a recent one, but we think the complainant has established a fair prima facie case in favor of its validity. It is obvious that the defendant at once recognized the importance and value of the improvement. If they did not think it would promote comfort and lessen the danger to the traveling public, why were they so prompt in adopting it? This conduct of the defendants of itself strengthens the complainant's prima facie case."

Under the decision rendered, the Wagner vestibule train on the Lake Shore road could not have left Chicago for New York this afternoon without bringing the two companies mentioned into contempt of court, but an arrangement was made whereby the train left as usual. The legal representatives of the Wagner and Lake Shore companies had a conference with George M. Pullman this afternoon, the result of which was that Mr. Pullman granted them 14 days in which to make the necessary alterations in their trains.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional.
—BY—
FATHER CHINIQUY.

ITS REVELATIONS ARE APPALLING.

Painful and horrible are words too weak to express the things which he relates — things enough to rouse the stones to cry out against a system which brings forth such apples of Sodom and deadly poison to the Church, the family and society.

Cloth, 12mo, 320 pages, with Portrait and Biographical Notice of the Author; Price $1.00.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD, THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.
—BY—
A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already planted or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Roman'sm. The national policy to be slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth, 16mo, 160 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS { One Year . . $1.00. Six Months . . 1.00. Three Months . . .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the fact "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Who was Idithoun, and the Signification of His Name!

When David arranged the Levitical courses and appointed the heads of those courses, see 1 Chron. xxv. 1, he established over the temple music Asaph and Hoeman (שמן) and Idithoun. Hoeman was the leader and Asaph stood at the right hand and Idithoun at his left hand. While their first duty we are told was to furnish instrumental music, of which the principal instruments were the nabla and kinura (both stringed instruments akin to the later psaltry or harp) and the cymbals ("the cymbals of the alala" designed to swell the volume of sound principally, and "the cymbals of pleasing sound" designed more to promote the harmony) they also, we are told, presided over "the temple choir" or the vocal music. We naturally, therefore, find more or less of the Psalms specifically dedicated to one or the other of these three as well as to "the sons of Kore," who belonged to another course and were "keepers of the gate-ways" to the tabernacle or temple. These were also "of the sons of Asaph" we are told.

Now the dedication is always very significant, and frequently is the key to the esoteric or deeper meaning of the whole Psalm. Again, each of these three names is significant of what they were each to officially teach, namely, the truth, its hidden significance, and the diligence requisite to find it, or in a word "the mystery" fully revealed at a later day in the gospel—Jeduthun—"If true" or "Truth unasserted,"—Asaph—"Indistinct to the eye" or "something dimly seen." Hemon—Go swiftly to know." Read in their order from left to right and freely translated the three names would give us this moral injunction: "Go swiftly to know if that be true which is dimly seen."

We are told that "the truth" revealed to the saints "the angels even desired to look into." They must have dimly seen something, or they would not have had this desire. They saw enough to incite the desire to see more, we must infer.

The official duty then of these three was to incite this desire, expressed in the clause above, in the hearts of those to whom they ministered, and we would expect to find the veil of mystery drawn over their forms of expression in song. To us, however, "this veil" should now be removed in the light of the gospel.

There are three Psalms dedicated to Idithoun, three of the one hundred and fifty, and each significant in its true number, which has been changed in the Common and Revised Versions. The true numbers of these Psalms are the 38th, 61st, and 76th, instead of the 39th, 62d, and 77th. The numerical esoteric signification of the 38th is its marked Messianic import. The three tens of the 30 being significant of three conjunctive periods completed and numbered the three conjunctive periods of the "patriarchs," the "law," and the "kingship," at the end of which time the Messiah was to come. His own age ("he was about thirty years of age when he began his beneficent public ministry") corresponding in type also with the general conjunctive type given in prophecy. In other words, he had completed his esoteric experience in life and time in those thirty years, and then began his exoteric manifestation of himself—showed himself to Israel.

The consequent harmonic result denoted by the 8, a complete harmonic—an octave in music—but not complete in the sense of a full series like the 9, showing that he was to be cut off in his harmonic work, a fact very clearly emphasized in the closing words of the Psalm.

The burden, moreover, of this Psalm is the esoteric "watch to keep" denoted by the three times ten, this being significant of at-one-ment with God through obedience to his law—the day of atonement was a tenth day. Was this not a truth that "a chief singer" in Israel would and should especially emphasize, whose name even meant "go swiftly to know."

The numerical signification of the 61st Psalm is, in the first place, submission to God through the atonement—ten again—or through the human will becoming one with God's will, the six times ten being significant of the necessity of a creative act to accomplish this end, a finitely fully formed purpose, namely, and an infinite supplemental instrumentality to carry out. This spoken of here as God's σωτηριον or instrumental salvation, meaning of course the Christ as an instrumentality in God's hand to accomplish his σωτηριον salvation in the abstract.

The 12th verse emphasizes a fact upon which this truth rests, namely, that σθενος controling power and mercy are God's and not man's. The one of the sixty-one is esoterically significant of the oneness of God, the oneness of the purpose and the oneness of the instrumentality to be used. Was this not a truth to be especially emphasized by a chief singer in Israel; whose name esoterically signifies "go swiftly to know?"

The numerical signification of the 76th is first the very familiar ten times seven, or ten conjunctions of sevens, or an atonement of sevens, used so often in predictions of judgment under the law fully carried out. The esoteric signification of seven as the law number, is well understood. The law was perfect or complete in itself, like the seven notes in music, but powerless in itself to perfect anything else in the higher harmonic moral sense, as are these seven notes in music devoid of harmonic tone unless recombined.

The root of the word Hebrew coming from Heber, the ancestor who gave his name to the people, is moreover the root of the word meaning seven, and therefore esoterically the whole people as a nation are seen to be a seventh people. They perfected nothing, though given a perfect law with which to work out their harmonic salvation. It remained for the Christ to assert the harmonic beauty and utility of the law in the recombination of the third, fifth, and eighth.

"The burden of this Psalm is the purpose to seek God expressed in it as the result of tribulation incurred by God's judgments upon sin. The state of tribulation under judgment indicated by the ten times seven of atonement, and the newly formed purpose indicated by the six which is always esoterically significant of some creative act. See the six days of creation for example, the six denoting a full creative act; here the purpose fully formed to seek God, and more or less of the how, as in Gen. i.

Is not this also a truth important enough for a chief singer to emphasize whose name signifies "go swiftly to know?"

C. GARDNER.

THE OLD AND THE NEW COVENANT.

God made a covenant with his ancient people when he led them out of Egypt. What covenant was it? To be clear and definite in answering this question is very important, for it is a point upon which much depends. The following passages furnish an answer to this question, and should settle it beyond dispute:—Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words: for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel. And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments." Deut. iv. 12, 13: "And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of words, but ye saw no form; only ye heard a voice. And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even the ten commandments; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone," Deut. ix. 9-11: "When I was gone up into the mount to receive the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the Lord made with you, then I abode in the mount forty days and forty nights; I did neither eat bread nor drink water. And the Lord delivered unto me two tables of stone written with the finger of God; and on them was written according to all the words which the Lord spake with you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly. And it came to pass at the end of the forty days and forty nights, that the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant."

This is the covenant referred to by the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews. It was "written with the finger of God," and the writing was "the ten commandments." This is too plain to be denied. But Heb. viii. 7, 8, shows that this covenant was not sufficient for God's ancient people as a guide in a more advanced state, and therefore, not sufficient as a guide for the church. It was sufficient at the time it was given, in the infancy of the people as a people; but whatever their actual progress was, God knew that they ought to outgrow it, and therefore, something better was provided. "For if that first covenant had been faultless, then would no place be sought for a second. For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah. The first covenant was not blameless or perfect. However sufficient it might have been for the people in the age in which it was given, it was not sufficient when Christ came. It was not broad enough; it was not deep enough. It related chiefly to outward actions; something was needed that should touch the thoughts, the desires, the purposes. As man developed, he needed more spiritual truths. Hence the new covenant related more to the inner man. God's laws were to be put into the mind and written upon the heart.

In 2 Cor. iii. 7, 8, the first covenant is designated "the ministration of death," referring to the penalty annexed to the breaking of the literal law. "But if the ministration of death, written and engraven on stones, came with glory, so that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly upon the face of Moses for the glory of his face, which glory was passing away; how shall not rather the ministration of the spirit be with glory?" If this ministration,—if the decalogue as ministered by the Jewish lawgiver was accompanied with glory, or was given in glory, how much more glorious shall be the ministration of the Spirit? The former dispensation was passing away, was being then done away by Christ, and the new one was being established. There was glory with the former, but the glory of the latter was much greater. The old covenant was good, but the new covenant is better. The old covenant was made to suit a people whose ideas of duty and religion were very low; the new covenant was made for a people whose ideas of duty and religion were higher. In the interval between the giving of the old and the giving of the new, there had been some growth and development. The old covenant had been preparing the way for the new. Under the old dispensation the law said, "Thou shalt not kill;" under the new dispensation it says, "that every one who is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment." Under the first covenant the law said, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and to violate that law the outward act was necessary; under the second covenant the law says "that every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." The letter of the decalogue forbade stealing, but the teaching and spirit of Christianity forbid all kinds of dishonest dealing. The letter of the decalogue forbade every one to bear false witness against his neighbor; but the teaching and the spirit of Christianity forbid evil thinking and false insinuations.

The law of Moses with the ordinances connected with it, is called in Ephes. ii. 14 "the middle wall of partition," and was abolished by Christ. "This law," says Dean Alford, "moral and ceremonial, its decalogue, its ordinances, its rites, was entirely done away in and by the death of Christ. And the end of that abolition was, that he might create the two (Jew and Gentile) in himself into one new man."

We have the same truth clearly expressed in Col. ii. 14: "Having blotted out the bond written in ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us: and he hath taken it out of the way, nailing it to the cross." This bond, or hand-writing, is commandments, written on tables of stone, set forth the whole of Moses' law; and that law, as such, was an obstacle to Gentile believers, and hence Christ took it out of the way. He is represented as "nailing it to the cross," which is thus explained by Meyer: "Since by the death of Christ on the cross the condemnatory law lost its hold on us, inasmuch as Christ by this death bore the curse of the law for mankind, Gal. iii. 13, —in the fact of Christ being nailed to the cross the Law was nailed thereon, in so far as, by Christ's crucifixion, it lost its obligatory power and ceased to be in one way." The apostle then, on the ground of this fact, says, "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a feast day or a new moon or a Sabbath day; which are a shadow of things to come," Col. ii. 16, 17. As believers in Christ are perfect in him, and are above and beyond the Jewish law, they are not to be judged by others in such matters.

It is too much overlooked by some that in this age of the Church disciples of Jesus are not under the law, but under Christianity. We are followers of Jesus, not of Moses. We read in John i. 17, "For the law was given by Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." Our priesthood is a different priesthood from the Levitical priesthood, and therefore, a change is made in the law. "For the law," says the apostle, "made nothing perfect;" but through the "bringing in thereupon of a better hope," we are permitted to have access unto God, and may now be made perfect, complete in Christ fully and without blemish. He is our sanctification, and our robes, washed and made white in his blood, we are made meet for the kingdom of heaven.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 6.

BY DR. J. H. THOMPSON.

THE SECONDARY OR MESOZOIC AGE.

The morning dawn of [illegible] breaks upon the earth and [illegible] is resumed. This remarkable portion of prehistoric duration, [illegible] coinciding with the close of the judgment-day period of Paleozoic time,—embraces the rock deposits of three periods, to-wit: the Triassic, Jurassic and Cretaceous. The former are composed largely of sandstone, which have been not inappropriately called "the new red sandstone" by way of contrast with the "old red sandstone" of Hugh Miller in the Devonian strata. "In the United States the rocks of this period are found along the Connecticut valley from Long Island Sound to the northern boundary of Massachusetts; thence they may be traced from the Palisades on the Hudson, in long, narrow strips through New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia and North Carolina. The beds are from 3000 to 6000 feet thick. The great Pacific Triassic belt extends from Mexico to British Columbia through a width of perhaps four degrees of longitude." (Whitney). "The rocks are also found extensively in Colorado and Nevada." (Steele.)

"The Cretaceous Period comprises the chalk and sand formations represented in North America by a series of rocks from New York to South Carolina, along the Gulf of Mexico, through Louisiana north over the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, and along the Pacific coast westward of the Sierra Nevada." (Steele.). Western Kansas is said to furnish the only deposit of chalk to be found on the continent pertaining to the period.

The immense jungles and thick, dark forests of the carboniferous era, with their profusion of lepidodendrons and sigillaria passed into fossilization as the fuel-wealth of a later age, and these vegetable growths are not found among the new creations of Mesozoic time. In their stead were conifers, cycads, ferns and palms which nodded in the breeze and became the flora beautifying the Mesozoic landscape. In fact the vegetable productions of this age, were neither so profuse, nor so gigantic as were those of the former era, the atmosphere having been measurably cleansed and purified by the rank growth of trees and plants, of that era, and a large percent of its carbonic acid gas having passed with the plants into a fossil form. In obedience to the command of God—"Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven," (Gen. i. 20); peculiar animals, — air-breathers,— largely pertaining to one general class, unique in appearance, and varying in size from Mastodonic proportions to the smallest known reptile of today,— sported in the waters, or wallowed in the morasses, or swarmed in astonishing numbers over the land areas. It is the age of reptiles. Reptiles on the land, reptiles in the sea, reptiles in the air; some wallowing lazily by the rivulets and brooks, others roaming elephant-like through the forests cropping the herbage of those periods; some tossing the depths of the ocean in their gambols, or in the pursuit of their lobthye repast, and others, still, basking in the warming rays of a new-born sun.

The tribes of fishes were still largely present in the waters, but reptiles predominated on the sea and on the land.

Ichthyosaurs, (fish-lizzards), with a dolphin's shape, the vertebra of a fish and paddles like a whale, large heads, and thick, short necks, with bodies often twenty-five to thirty feet long, sported in the oceanic waters. Their enormous eyes,—sometimes two feet in diameter, possessed the capability of adjustment in obedience to the will of the animal, so that they might render them microscopic or telescopic as they pleased. The Plesiosaur, another large water lizzard, had a body like that of a quadruped, to which was joined, by its long, swan-like neck the head of a lizzard, armed with teeth like those of a crocodile, and it propelled itself through the oceanic waters by paddles like those of the whale, but which were larger and stronger than those of its inveterate enemy,—the Ichthyosaurus.

"The Hadrosaur was a massive herbivorous reptile about thirty feet long. Its monster doubtless walked mainly on its hind legs, its knees thrown upward and forward, and its huge tail trailing behind. Its expression was that of a perpetual grin, as its open mouth revealed several rows of shining teeth with which it ate the things on which it fed." (Steele).

Cimoliosaurs and Elasmosaurs, "were huge sea-serpents, twenty-five feet long, with bodies larger than an ox, sharp teeth and flippers like a whale, —the latter having a flattened tail, which it used like an oar for sculling." (Ibid). "The Dinosaurs rivaled in size the elephants of our day. Their aspect was strange and portentous; some of them chiefly squatted some leaped on their hind limbs like the Kangaroo, and some stalked on erect legs like great birds, with small arms hanging uselessly by their sides, as with bony wings they surveyed land and water from their lofty elevation." (Ibid.) The Hadrosaurs were of this family group, and also, the Iguanas which was "a powerful carnivorous reptile, and the destructive enemy of the smaller preceding reptiles. A full-grown specimen was probably twenty-three feet in length. Its toes were long and slender like those of a bird of prey. They were armed with flattened hooked claws, ten to twelve inches long, and adapted to grabbing and tearing. Its teeth were curved, knife-shape, saw-edged, and fitted like scissors for cutting. The tail was long, rounded and strong, and capable of striking a blow or throwing an enemy within reach of the kick or grab of the terrible hind leg. It could leap like the Kangaroo, and probably captured its prey by a few immense bounds." (Ibid).

To these were added Mosasaurs, Cetiosaurs, immense snapping turtles, —crocodiles, — mammoth frog-like creatures, rivaling the ox for size, and the group of Pterodactyles, besides many others uncatlogued, which inhabited the earth, the air and the waters in countless millions.

The remains of birds first occur in the Cretaceous period. Hugh Miller says, "in the times of the Lias."

Much discussion has arisen relative to the foot-prints in the Connecticut sandstones. Hugh Miller, although he claims that the remains of birds first occur in the chalk of the Cretaceous Period, still adheres to the view that these tracks were made by enormous birds of the family of waders to which cranes, herons, etc., belong, admitting at the same time that no fragments of their skeletons have been found in any of the formations older than the chalk. Basing his opinion on the one fact, of the three toe to the foot impression, he, apparently, jumps at once to the conclusion that they are of ornithic origin. Others doubt the correctness of his opinion, and it would appear that his reasoning hard, unlike his masterly deductions in general, are sadly at fault. Some of the lizzards of the middle portion of the age, and of the Lias to which he specially refers, were possessed of only three bird-like toes to each foot. This is notably true of the rhamphorynchus, a member of the family of Pterodactyles and possibly, also of others of the same class, and since none of the fossil remains of birds can be discovered prior to the Cretaceous Period, it seems almost self-evident these tracks were not the foot-prints of birds, but of the three-toed reptiles peculiar to that portion of the age. The fossilization of their skeletons, however, in the Cretaceous formation fulfils the statement of the inspired writer, and attests the truth both of scientific research and of God's revelation: the former showing in the geologic strata peculiar to the age the fossilized "tannaim" and every living creature which the waters brought forth abundantly, as well as the skeletons of birds, in the period prior to its close, and the catechism with which it terminated, exactly as recorded in the latter.

Just prior to the close of the age, and apparently prophetic of the type of life to follow in the new age, a small mammal was created. It has been named Dromatherium Sylvestre, and is the first of the four-footed beasts known to have existed upon the earth.

No fragments of the skeletons of birds have yet been discovered in formations older than the Chalk. . . . They," say he, of the foot-prints in the Connecticut sandstone, and which have been attributed to extinct birds— "tell of a time far removed into the by-past eternity, when great birds frequented by myriads the shores of a nameless lake, to wade into its shallows in quest of mail-covered fishes of the ancient type, or long-extinct mollusca; while reptiles equally gigantic, and of still stranger proportions, haunted the neighboring swamps and savannahs."

With what wonderful exactness does the man of God record the work performed during this age! How admirable the correspondence between his written memorandum, and that revealed by the rock strata of the Mesozoic Age! The revelation made by the Book of God is that—"God created great whales, (tanninim, sea-monsters, —whales, not of the mammalian but of the reptilian class)—and every living thing that moveth, which the waters brought forth, abundantly after their kind, and every wing-fowl after his kind." Gen.

The entire fauna of the age was called forth from the waters, its wonderful monsters of the deep; its ichthyosaurs, plesiosaurs and cetiosaurs which tempested the deep in their gambols and sports, or in their pursuit of food; its creeping lizards and crocodiles, such as teliosaurs, megalosaurs and iguanodon, which rivaled the elephant in bulk; its sea-serpents and its birds near the close of the age, were all peculiarly adapted to the age in which they predominated.

The five grand types of life have been introduced and remain, and no advance has been effected in the vertebrates from Devonian fishes which could only exist in the waters, to air-breathing reptiles, with organs of locomotion fitted to move upon the face of the earth and in the air above it. A grand advance, indeed, has been made by the Architect of the Ages in the plane of animated existence. Mentality is more thorough and effective. Locomotion is improved, and the mesozoic plane of living organisms are fitted to breathe the air, or rest long beneath the submarine waves, or travel over the land areas at will.

The labors of the six were completed and the evening of reptilian pre-eminence drew on apace. Creation again ceased. The earth shuddered and reeled like a drunken man as the judgment of the Creator was passed upon creative work in that day,—the fifth—of the judicial series, in which "God saw that it was good." The judge of the middle-life period scanned the forward movement of continental progression: the progress of animal life towards its highest type, —the advancement of the flora towards its perfected forms, and his judgment, as expressed by the language of the Divine record assures us that it was exactly adapted to the designs of the Creator. "God saw that it was good." Mighty events cluster around this little sentence. It covers a period of earth-throes and violent earth-storms which can only be imagined by us now,—yet that they transpired is evidenced by the displacements and dips of its rocky strata. Says Mr. Steele, "Long-continued upheavals and perhaps terrific convulsions attended the close of this era whereby such stupendous mountain ranges as the Sierra Nevada, Sierra Madre, etc., were lifted above the interior sea. The trap-rocks of Mts. Holyoke and Tom, East and West rocks near New Haven, Conn., the Palisades on the Hudson, and Bergen Hill in New Jersey, are all illustrations of the wide extent of the igneous action. Everywhere trap-dikes and ridges attend this formation. The proofs that the trap was thrown out in a melted state are abundant. The adjacent sandstone has been baked by the heat; the layers uplifted by the escaping steam; and the fissures often filled with crystallized minerals." "The Mesozoic Time, like the Paleozoic, was closed by mighty upheavals. . . . The increasing pressure of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans produced another upheaval of the land, and another addition to the growing continent. This was probably not a sudden convulsion, but a long-continued upward movement. By it, however, the conditions of life were changed. All the Mesozoic types disappeared—hardly any species survived the shock. A few mammals, birds, and flowering plants, types prophetic of the Cenozoic (Age to come) Time, had appeared, but they all went down in the shock. Another cycle of geologic history is finished; another phase of life has swept across the slowly forming world, culminated and broken on the shore of the past. The reign of reptiles is ended." (14 Weeks in Popular Geology.)

Such is the record of science in relation to this, the fifth day of God Almighty, with which the Mesozoic Age was closed and its successor, the Cenozoic, was begun. "The great Mesozoic upheaval burst asunder the Gulf Stream, which had sent the warm waters of the tropics to the Arctic Ocean. On the southwest it retired to nearly its present limits, but a long arm reached up the Mississippi Valley to the mouth of the Ohio River. On the north it broadened into the great Tertiary sea which extended through Nebraska and the western part of Dakota. The Pacific ocean still held possession of the western coast, while the Atlantic ocean covered the southeastern border of the continent, and the coral-builders were yet at work upon Florida." The evening shades of this merged into the long night of judgment and joined itself to the advent of the then "age to come," constituting a day in the which judgment (righteousness was passed on the labors of the age, and wherein the heavens and the earth of Mesozoic time passed away, to make place for a new heavens and a new earth, of the succeeding creation.

A Paradox.

Alone, and yet not alone am I; sad, and yet not sad. No human form intrudes upon my solitude, and yet he who ills creation with himself is surely with me; sad I am, for there are many earthly thoughts that contribute to cast a shade upon my soul, and yet heavenly thoughts soon dispel such mournful ones. Oh, that my whole affections might be placed upon things above, and not on things on the earth! Why should my heart be gloomy when such a glorious prospect opens before me?—a world of immortal beauty, enlivened by the presence of God himself, and a glorious city, even the New Jerusalem. "Fly, lingering moments, fly away, and bring that long expected day" when Christ shall appear in glory to take his weary children home.—Miss M. M. Johnson.

WE wish that all our readers, that can spare the small subscription price, would take the Primitive Catholic. By reading this journal one will learn what a pernicious system Papal Romanism is, in and of itself; and what a determined foe it is to the Bible, the Public Schools, to American liberty and to all American institutions. The Editor, E. S. Walsh, may be addressed at 313 State St., Brooklyn, N. Y. The paper is published at $1.00 a year, at 377 Fulton St., same city. Try it for one quarter at least.

A SAMPLE number of a large weekly journal entitled America has come to hand. Its aim is to "advance strictly American ideas and to strengthen and preserve American institutions." To secure these ends the restriction of foreign immigration, an extension of the time required for the naturalisation of foreigners, the protection of the American Free School System, American lands for American settlers, and, lastly, no public funds for sectarian purposes, are the more fundamental subjects to be advocated in its columns. While the columns of THE RESTITUTION are not devoted to the discussion of political questions, we are, nevertheless, rejoiced that there is a secular journal that resists all encroachments on the system of public schools, and that opposes all plundering of the public funds for any sectarian purpose. This journal is published by the American Publishing Co., Chicago, Ill.

Some Thoughts on the Coming Kingdom of Christ and Antichrist.

As the voyager on the ocean looks out from the prow of his vessel to catch a view of the first low line of land that shows above the horizon, so the watcher for the goodly "land of promise" that is coming with the coming King is always interested in the aspect of events as time reveals them, and the clouds under which he sails, or the rugged aspect of the rocks that surround that land are but things of the moment only interesting in a way, and as they stand in relation to the grand object of the voyage of life, "That city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." But brethren if you will pardon me for carrying the figure a little further, I would like to say that it behooves us at all time to keep out in deep water in the open channel; many have turned aside from God's wide waterway up some narrow little creek, and have either been lost in mazes of mud and mire, or split their frail craft on a reef. How many enthusiastic watchers, self-appointed, have set dates for the Advent of the Lord of glory, worked out schemes of prophetic interpretation, named men as coming antichrists, and published books large and plentiful that hardly anyone takes the trouble to read and few have the time.

Brethren what a hardship it would be if in order to understand the good word and be a faithful watcher we had to read up all the opinions published on the subject. It always affords me great consolation to know that God will deal gently with his people, "he will carry the lambs in his bosom and gently lead those that are young." Yes there are gospel terrorists with radical political ideas sometimes that want a crash, and the sooner it comes the better; they want a general sweep of everything that they don't like, which is a great host, and they want a royal crown and glory, their idea of glory being somewhat crude to say the least of it. It is a grand thought to me to know that "the Son of man came to seek and to save" and that he is the same Son of man yet, and when he comes again he won't come to crush and spoil any more than he came before. How much of the beautiful in the character of God and his Christ have been lost by the hideous misapplication of Scripture and chop logic worked on disjointed texts.

How much better it would be if we could saturate our minds as it were with the idea, the central idea of God's revelation, "God is love," and read the book in that light. Why yes there are evils to be swept away, and they will be swept away. Why yes, there will be bloodshed; without shedding of blood there seems to be no remission in anything, but then God is the Father and the benefactor of this race and there will be no unnecessary bloodshed. He formed the earth to be inhabited; the race will not be swept away because the evil that afflicts it will. God so loved the world, don't you know, that he sent his Son to save it, and that is what he is coming again to do. "Bind their kings in chains and their nobles in fetters of iron?" Oh yes, there will be suppression of oppression, but personally I don't care to apply the "slippers" on any man even if he has the misfortune to be a king. "Rule them with a rod of iron?" Oh yes, God's rule is always unbending, "inflexible," in fact that is the test of all good government, firmness in execution, and then God, you see, sends not his Son into the world to condemn the world.

I am sorry to say that this grand central idea seems to be often missed; the kingdom of God is represented as a mighty crush that wholsale everything before it, a mighty conquest of arms and blood. I would be sorry for such a thing. I think the arms will be the least part of it, else it would only be as the former kingdoms of men. As to the power of the world to come we can only vaguely speak, but we can judge of them as shown in the person of Messiah in the miracles at the first advent, and as to the usage of them we may also judge as he is the person that will then control, and they that would "call down fire from heaven and consume their enemies" are not of his spirit and will not be permitted to administer savage justice on the community at large.

But I see I have wandered from what I was going to say concerning looking ahead at the coming events, and to return I would like to close by saying that because one has dated here and another has schemed there and a third has pronounced Napoleon or some one else to be antichrist we must not conclude that there is no date to the coming of the Lord, no scheme in prophecy and no antichrist to come—keep in mid-stream brethren. A very good suggestion was made by Brother Weethee that the antichrist although future may not be personal. My idea is, as far as I have it "concreted," so to speak, that the antichrist is aggregational, or a conglomeration of human powers in some sort of alliance that will be plainly recognized at sight, still I can hardly fancy a scheme of government embraced by an individual although not nominally recognised. I would also like to mention that the idea of a future antichrist does not at all militate against the idea of a past antichrist or a present antichrist or antichrists; in fact the revelation of John particularly specifies that the Dragon that receives his doom in the end is the same "old" serpent, the Devil, so that dates back to Eden. The only question that is open on this subject is, has the spirit of antichrist arrived at its fullest "materialization" in the past and present systems of centralization of power. Some of us think one way, some another, let us be patient brethren and wait, waiting is easier than arguing and not so hard on the temper. J. F. GELSTLEY.

To My Orthodox Friends.

And not only they, but we ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit: the redemption of our bodies. Rom. viii. 23. For we are saved by hope, but hope that is seen is not hope, for what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for. Rom. viii. 24.

Ministers of the Church of Christ, are these things so? are these witnesses true? Is that last personal, visible, literal coming the one grand glorious gospel hope? That our Redeemer's second appearing is so held forth in the New Testament is beyond dispute. Admitting it to be so, then is not the doctrine neglected? How dare any believer restrict a scripture mentioned or referred to in the New Testament more times than there are chapters in that Sacred Book.

Brethren, why not introduce the blessed hope into the prayer meetings, the Sunday Schools, and the pulpits? Let us count on the coming of Christ; lay all our plans with this in view, let our conversation, our manner of life, be shaped by this prospect. The subject of Christ's coming ought to be constantly and regularly preached by the clergy, from every pulpit. My brethren, watch, preach the coming of Jesus, solemnly and affectionately. "But if we hope for that we see not then do we with patience wait for it." Rom. viii. 26.

Why do some teach that the resurrection is passed? What do we hope for if that be true? Do we hope to be changed, have a new heart or spirit given us, and when we die go home to Jesus and enjoy heaven and happiness for a season, or to the end of the world, and then we must be reunited with the body, that we can so well do without, if the soul can be capable of enjoying happiness? What use is there of the body after being absent so long? Is death the greatest consolation we realize here?

I am persuaded that there is something more than death for the Christian to feast upon. "But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus Christ from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11.

"For this corruptible must put on immortality." With this hope we can look forward to the second appearing of our Savior with assurance that we will see him as he is, and be made like him. Glorious hope! who can comprehend its excellencies! "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." Luke xxiv. 39. "Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus that is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts i. 11. Does he come at death, and receive us unto himself, or at the resurrection of the just?

These are questions I want instruction on. I can't understand the Scriptures to teach but one more advent, and that at the last day. If there be no resurrection then your faith is vain, and we are of all men most miserable [illegible] if the dead rise not. "Who concerning [illegible] the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is passed already, and overthrew the faith of some." 2 Tim. ii. 18.

In conclusion, brethren, preach the gospel as it is written, teach men and women to believe and obey the word. "Pure and undefiled religion is to visit the fatherless and the widow, and keep thyself unspotted from the world."

O. S. SALTS.

IN THE HOLY LAND.

Imagine yourself before Jaffa. Seen from the vessel the town presents a pretty appearance built upon a bluff with streets arranged to resemble terraces. Its harbor has the name of being one of the worst in the world. To enter it is not infrequently attended with danger. We happen here in a smooth sea and our steamer with its load of human freight passes through the rocky channel without mishap. The day is brilliant. The Holy Land is about to be invaded. We are on the way from the Nile to the Jordan. We are to see the land celebrated in story, the land which every Sunday-school scholar in America knows of as the scene of David's exploits and the captive Joseph's dreams. Enthusiasm among the boat's passengers is manifest. All are in haste to set foot on shore. Landing we pass through quaint streets, whose arabs are so small they seem almost to bar us out. Much we see is of interest, much picturesque. Here the dusky face of the Arab is not so often noticed as in Egypt. A peculiarity of the native Israelites is their light complexion, the faces of many being covered with a whitish powder, while upon each side of the forehead one curl of hair is worn. There is also a small English and German colony here.

Syria is one of the few countries in which the locomotive's shrill shriek or the steamboat's bell is never heard. He who travels over the hills and through the valleys does so for the most part upon the simple beast, as did Christ when he rode triumphantly into Jerusalem. To the holy city is a ride of nine or ten hours from Jaffa, usually done without much difficulty. The experience, however, of your correspondent, together with that of some fellow Americans, is worthy of note. Leaving Jaffa at 11 a. m. our way for a long distance is hedged in by huge cacti, these in time giving way to native fences. This road, when at the best is poor, and that from Damascus to Beyrout are said to be the best in the whole country. On our way the absence of habitations and people is noticeable. For miles the only persons seen are an occasional couple of soldiers stationed in watch towers, placed on the summit of a high hill, principally to protect the people in town from being surprised by robbers, who are numerous, the dragoman and others in charge of our party even deeming it important to travel fully armed. Sometimes a peasant would be passed, or perhaps a shepherd with his small flock. Now we overtake a party of convicts trudging along shoeless over the stone road on their way to prison in Jerusalem, to which they have been sentenced for stealing Jaffa oranges, twenty-five of which could be bought for one franc. We halt at Ramleh, the principal town between starting-point and destination. Here in a small German inn we take our lunch, and note among other things of interest on its register inscribed by that man to whom more than any other the potentates of the universe pay homage, the names of General and Mrs. U. S. GRANT. Olive and sycamore trees are numerous about the town, and the historically interesting tower should not be passed unnoticed, however pressed for time the traveller may be.

Leaving Ramleh, the scene again becomes barren and dreary. We pass a small Syrian town, whose houses resemble those of the Egyptian fellah, and at 5 in the evening we arrive at Job's Well. Again we lunch, and then make a grand start for the finish. You have heard of "the calm before the storm." We have enjoyed the former, and now, as the shadows deepen, I lead you into a mountain pass, where darkness and misfortune fall. A sudden crash, followed by investigation, proved the forward wheel of our landau had parted from the hub. Long search for the lost but availing nothing, the wheel was attached, being secured by a cord. Owing to the gymnastic propensities of one of the mules, it seemed as though the carriage with its occupants would be hurled over the precipice near by. This danger averted, and as all were hoping to get on with [illegible] this time matters, indeed, [illegible] look serious, and I felt sure the dragoman, who, like the writer, was on horseback, was much worried over the situation, as, in fact, he had a right to be, for the road was far from safe, and just here, as if to add to the unpleasantness of our situation, a down-pour of rain set in. The saying that time is of no value in the East was fully illustrated by the men, whose movements despite our condition, were provokingly deliberate, and at times it seemed as though they did everything in just the opposite way from what they should. Finally a second start was made, to be followed in a few moments by a third break-down. It was during this halt that the baggage mules overtook us, whose driver had by one chance in a thousand found the missing nut some fifteen miles back. The darkness was so dense it almost made itself felt, and the rain was heavy, altogether making our horses more and more unmanageable. After a time we arrived at a long-looked-for inn, whose only place of rest appeared to be a billiard table, and whose walls were artistically decorated with whisky bottles. Jerusalem was still an hour and a half distant. Involuntarily, as it were, come to our lips those familiar old lines:

> Jerusalem, my happy home,
> Name ever dear to me.

And it was at 2.30 in the morning we arrived at Jaffa Gate, the climax being reached when the driver, notwithstanding the rain was falling in torrents, informed the ladies of our party they would have to walk into the city. It was certainly an experience such as the writer trusts few may ever have.

And now, before entering the city of David, let us make an excursion to the Dead Sea and the Jordan. This is done upon horseback, and will occupy three days from and to Jerusalem. Mounting outside of Jaffa Gate, the walls are followed for some distance, the Damascus Gate and then that of St. Stephen being passed. Proceeding into the Valley of Kidron, crossing a brook of that name, Bethany, a village of stone houses, is soon reached, while just beyond is the Mount of Olives. The most prominent ruin is pointed out as the house of Mary and Martha, near which is the entrance to the tomb of Lazarus. The way then winds along through the mountains, and after an hour's ride the fountain of Absalom is reached. This historic round about site is infested with Bedouin robbers, and every party is escorted by an armed guard. After some four hours' riding through the windings of these rocky defiles a refreshing sight was the Dead Sea, gleaming below us in the distance. Now we pass the mount upon which our Lord was tempted. "Jericho," situated in a valley and consisting of some half a dozen houses, is reached. Its hotel is far superior to any found at Jerusalem. From its windows the blue waters of the Dead Sea are distinctly visible, though a ride of an hour and a half is necessary to bring one to its shores, where all is barren and desolate. A bath in this historic water is well worth taking, and very different from any other I have ever enjoyed. The water is so salt that one can not possibly sink, but may rest upon its surface without the slightest effort. From here to the Jordan is another hour in the distance over an extremely sandy plateau. Finally about noon this, the most famous river in all the world, is reached. Neither the Euphrates nor the Tiber, celebrated as they are, command to exceed a fractional part of the interest that attaches in every land to the mention of the name of "Jordan," and as we [illegible] on the banks of this most sacred of streams, all with one accord grow in silence upon the spot where Christ is said to have been baptized. Upon the opposite bank rocks tower up some fifty feet, while where the party is resting a few trees afforded a slight change. The river has a very swift current, which hurries it along until lost in the Dead Sea. Its water, though not clear, is healthful. While there one of the party was baptized, the ceremony, by reason of its surroundings, being peculiarly touching, and although the day was pleasant all realized as never before the feeling of him who wrote the lines:

> On Jordan's stormy banks I stand
> And cast a wistful eye
> To Canaan's fair and happy land,
> Where my possessions lie.

Among the Pots.

Though ye have lien among the pots, yet ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold. Psa. lxviii. 13.

This text has been a sealed passage for ages. Bishop Lowth declared it "unintelligible." In the latest work on the Psalms, "The Treasury of David," Mr. Spurgeon calls it "a hard passage, a difficult nut to crack." But new light is constantly breaking out of the Scriptures. Miss Whately, travelling in the East, observed a fact which gives us the lost key to this text and unlocks its beautiful imagery. In her work entitled, "Rugged Life in Egypt," she thus speaks concerning the flat roofs of the houses:

"They are usually in a state of great litter; were it not that at occasional clearance is made, they would assuredly give way under the accumulation of rubbish. One thing seems never cleared away, however, and that is the heap of old broken pitchers, sherds and pots that are piled up in some corner. A little before sunset numberless pigeons (or doves) suddenly emerge from behind the pitchers and pots and other rubbish where they have been sleeping in the heat of the day or picking about to find food. They dart upward and career through the air in large circles—their outspread wings catching the glow of the sun's slanting rays, so that they really resemble yellow 'gold glow;' then as they wheel around and are seen against the light, they appear as if turned into molten silver, most of them being pure white or else very light colored. This may seem fanciful, but the effect of light in these regions can scarcely be described to those who have not seen it. Evening after evening we watched the circling flight of doves, and always observed the same appearance." "Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold. Psa. lxviii. 13."

This beautiful passage is thus illuminated for the first time in modern days. It is a precious, comforting truth to the children of God. The doctrine unfolded is the promise of God that a holy character may be maintained in this sinful world, despite unfavorable surroundings. From among the pots, covered with dust and dirt, these beautiful doves rise clean and unsoiled, to soar into the heavens, flashing their wings covered with silver and their feathers glistening like yellow gold.

Many Christians find their lot cast amid the dust and grim of the pots, but they need not be soiled thereby. Out of such conditions they may soar unsoiled on wings of faith gleaming like silver and clothed in beatitudes shining like burnished gold.

No honorable business will grime the soul. The mechanic, merchant, artisan and laborer may have grimy work to do, but he can be as clean as a dove in character. Your character is not cheapened because your work is in the kitchen or at the forge, nor is it ennobled because you handle diamonds, write poems, thrill breathless audiences, or sit behind mahogany office desks. There are men in coal mines with souls like the wings of a dove; and there are men in decorated mansions with souls sooty and black with sin as the miner's face with coal dust. One has the soot on his face, the other on his soul.—Dr. J. O. Peck, in Homiletic

Youth's Column.

TAKE CARE.

Little children, you must seek
Rather to be good than wise;
For the thoughts you do not speak
Shine out in your cheeks and eyes.

If you think that you can be
Cross or cruel, and look fair,
Let me tell you how to see
You are quite mistaken there.

Go and stand before the glass,
And some ugly thought contrive,
And my word will come to pass
Just as sure as you're alive!

What you have and what you lack,
All the same as what you wear,
You will see reflected back;
So, my little folk, take care.

And not only in the glass
Will your secrets come to view;
All beholders, as they pass,
Will perceive and know them, too.

Out of sight, my boys and girls,
Every root of beauty starts;
So think less about your curls,
More about your minds and hearts.

Cherish what is good, and drive
Evil thoughts and feelings far;
For as sure as you're alive,
You will show for what you are.

—Alice Cary.

HIS ORDERS.

"I've got orders, positive orders, not to go there—orders I dare not disobey," said a youth who was being tempted to a smoking and gambling saloon.

"What special orders have you got? Show us your orders."

John took a neat wallet from his pocket and pulled out a neatly-folded paper. "It's here," said he, unfolding the paper and showing it to the boys. They looked and read aloud:—

"Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away." Prov. iv. 14, 15.

"Now," said John, "you see my orders forbid my going with you. They are God's orders, and by his help I mean to obey them."

BECAUSE I ASKED JESUS.

"Mamma is you very sick, and does you think you will die?" asked a little boy of his mother, who had been taken suddenly ill with a violent pain in her side and difficulty in breathing, and who at the time the question was asked her, was trying to suppress the groan that would come as she tried to relieve the pain by turning from side to side.

"I am very sick, dear, but hope I will not die just now," said the mother.

"You feels too sick to pray, does you?"

"Yes, couldn't you pray for me?" said his mamma.

"Yes, mamma, I will."

Kissing her good night, he went to his own room, and kneeling, repeated these words first as was his custom, "Now I lay me," then, "God bless papa and mamma;" then came the words slowly: "Dear Jesus, my mamma is very sick. She has such a bad pain in her side I is afr'id she will die if it don't go away, and I don't want my mamma to die. Dear Jesus take the pain away, and let her be well in the morning. Amen."

Sobs had choked his utterance, but he ended his prayer, and still crying went to bed.

His mother, worn out with pain, at last slept, and was awakened by a slight touch, surprised to find it morning, and Ralph beside her.

"Is you well mamma?"

Drawing a long breath she found the pain gone, and still further she turned and found herself well.

"I surely am," said the happy mother.

"I knew you would be," said the delighted child, "because I asked Jesus."

HIS LESSON.

A boy came home red, rumpled, bruised and excited, "Come, my son," said his father, "what is the matter? You seem to have been fighting. Was the boy larger than you are?"

The boy looked uneasy and mumbled, "No; I don't know that he was."

"Really! And now what did you fight for?"

A long delay and he blurted out the truth, "'Cause he wouldn't give me half of his apple."

"Indeed! Didn't give you half of his apple! So you have set up as a highway robber, taking your neighbor's goods? And a bully and a coward, whipping a smaller boy! Go, now, and get washed and dressed."

"He deserves a whipping," said his sister.

"Not at all. He has not lied; he told frankly the truth."

The boy, glad of getting off so well, soon returned to the tea table, wearing a smiling face.

"There is no place for you," said his father calmly. "Such principles as you act upon are not popular at this table. You will find proper food for a boy who conducts himself as you have done on a stand in the corner of the kitchen."

But breakfast and supper thus arranged proved unendurable to the boy.

"Can I ever come back?" asked the poor child.

"Certainly, when you have made your affairs right."

"But how can I do it?"

"Take your own money, buy the little boy an apple, and give it to him with an apology. Then you will be once more an honorable fellow, and we shall be glad of your company."

And so they settled it.

DIED.

TABER.—At the home of his mother, Sister Rachel Taber, in this city, June 8, 1888, Israel S. Taber, aged 17 years, 11 months, and 22 days.

On Monday, May 24, 1886, it was the privilege of the writer to bury our deceased brother in baptism, in the likeness of the Savior's death, with the cheering hope of attaining unto a resurrection in his likeness at the last day. Our young brother was never possessed of good health. Life's morning brought him gloomy clouds instead of radiant sunshine. As a disciple of Christ his allotment was to suffer rather than to labor. Instead of joining with the youthful followers of the Lord Jesus in songs of praise and the delightful services of the house of God, it fell to his lot to pine his young life away in comparative loneliness. We trust a future and eternal life awaits him on the sorrowless shores of the world made new, where tears cease to flow, where the inhabitant shall no more say, "I am sick," and where there shall be no more death. The funeral was attended by the writer on Sunday, the day after his death. In view of the resurrection we say, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." S. A. C.

THE DANIEL FOREVIEW OR ROMAN-ISM. No. 2.

In this lecture we deal with Daniel's political foreview, with his predictions of the great power of evil which was revealed to him as destined to arise in the fourth empire, and which he describes in chapter vii. of his book. Before we consider this prophecy you must allow me briefly to recall a few well-known historical facts that none can deny or question. The last twenty-five centuries of human history—that is, the story of the leading nations of the earth since the days of Nebuchadnezzar—has been divided into two chronologically equal parts, each lasting for about twelve and a half centuries. During the first half of this period four great heathen empires succeeded each other in the rule of the then known earth—the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman Empires. They lasted from the eighth century of our era, and ended with the fall of the last Empire of Rome, Romulus Agustulus A. D. 476. During the second half of this period no one great empire has ever ruled over the whole sphere dominated by these old pagan governments. Power has been more divided, and modern Kingdoms have replaced ancient Empires. A commonwealth of nations has for the last twelve hundred years existed in the territory once governed by old Rome, and no monarch has ever succeeded in subjecting them all to himself. This makes a broad distinction between ancient and modern times, and the dividing line is the fall of the old Roman Empire, the break up of the last form of ancient civilisation, the one which preceded our modern Christian civilisation. Rome itself—that great and ancient city—was founded about the beginning of the long period I have named, and has therefore been in existence for nearly two thousand six hundred years, though for many centuries it had but a local reputation. Gradually it rose to importance, and in the second century before Christ it attained supremacy in the earth. After that it was for about five hundred years the magnificent metropolis of the last and mightiest of the four great empires of antiquity, the seat of its government,—the very heart and centre of the then known world. Nineveh and Babylon had each in its day been great metropolitan cities of wonderful size, wealth, and influence; but the realms they ruled were small compared to those over which Rome in its zenith of power exercised her imperial sway. She was for long ages, in the esteem of all civilized nations as well as in her own, "Mistress of the world." Her proud pre-eminence of position was based on an unequalled degree of military strength and power. It was a rule, not of right, but of might, and it subjected the world to itself. Remains still extant, not only in all parts of Europe, but in Africa and Asia, and above all in Rome itself, sufficiently attest the wide extent of the sway of Rome, the luxury of her princes and people, and the refinements of her civilisation. Roman roads, Roman camps, Roman baths, Roman coins, statues, and remains of every kind abound even in our little isle, some of which have been examined with interest by most of us. Roman laws, Roman literature, and the fundamental relation of the Latin language to the language of modern Europe afford clearer evidences still of the universal, and long-enduring influence of the ancient masters of the world. Up to the beginning of the fourth century of our era Rome was a pagan city, and the Emperor was the high priest of its religion. The ruins of the old heathen shrines still adorn the city. The Pantheon, which is now a church dedicated to the Virgin Mary and all the martyrs, was formerly a heathen temple dedicated to Cybele and all the gods of ancient mythology. But in the fourth century of our era heathenism fell prostrate before the faith of Christ, which for three centuries Rome had persecuted and sought exterminate; the religion of Jesus of Nazareth overthrew the religion of Jupiter Olympius, and the Emperor Constantine established Christianity as the creed of the world. Rome had become the seat of a Christian bishop before that date, and in the division and decay of the Roman Empire which soon followed, this bishop, owing to his metropolitan position, became a person of great importance and the head of Latin Christianity. As other rulers passed away, and as the power of Rome waned before the hordes of Gothic and Vandal invaders, the Christian bishopric, sole survival of the old institutions in Rome, raised its head like a rocky reef in the midst of a wild expanse of roaring billows. It remained when all else failed round it. At first it had been itself a small, weak, new thing amid the shadow of a great, mighty, and ancient power. But time brought changes, and gradually it became the stable, strong, and only ancient thing in the midst of the turbulent young Gothic nations into which the fragments of the old Roman dominions slowly crystalized. To these rude and recently evangelized people the Church of Rome was naturally the Mother Church, and the bishop of Rome the chief of Christian bishops. The tendency of the Latin Episcopate thus enthroned in the old metropolis of the world in the midst of ignorant, superstitious, and child-like Gothic nations, was to become first a monarchical, and then an imperial power. This tendency was deep and enduring; it worked for centuries, till at last it produced that singular blasphemous usurpation and tyrannical government which we call the Papacy. The rise of this power was, like all great growths, gradual and slow. From the middle of the fifth century to the end of the thirteenth—i. e. for between eight and nine hundred years—it was steadily waxing greater and greater, rising higher and higher, reaching forth its branches more widely, and making more extravagant claims and pretentions. Time would of course fail me to trace the rise of ecclesiastical power in the middle ages to the monstrous proportions it assumed in the thirteenth century. After the conversion of Constantine, when Christianity became the established religion of the Roman world, the Church passed rapidly from a state of persecution, poverty, and distress to one of honor, wealth, and ease; and it degenerated as rapidly from its early purity. Covetousness and avarice came in like a flood, and ecclesiastical power became an object of eager ambition, even to ungodly men.

The bishop was a wealthy, influential, worldly dignitary, instead of a humble Christian pastor. Opulence poured in upon the priesthood, alike from the fears and the affections of the converts, and their intellectual superiority over the barbarian nations had the effect of increasing still more their ascendency. The time came when they alone retained any semblance of learning, or could prepare a treaty or write a document, or teach princes to read. By a variety of sordid frauds they contrived to secure to the Church immense wealth and an enormous share of the land. But they recognized their own subjection to the secular power, and respected mutually each others independence. Claims to supremacy over other bishops began however before long to be advanced by the bishops of Rome, sometimes on one ground and sometimes on another, but it was long before they were admitted. Papal authority indeed made no great progress beyond the bounds of Italy until the end of the sixth century. As this period the celebrated Gregory I., a talented, active, and ambitious man, was bishop of Rome. He stands at the meeting place of ancient and mediæval history, and his influence had a marked effect on the growth of Latin Christianity. He exalted his own position very highly in his correspondence and intercourse with other bishops and with the sovereigns of western Europe, with whom he was in constant communication. Claims that had been only occasionally suggested were now systematically pressed and urged. He dwelt much on the power conferred on the bishops of Rome in the possession of the keys of the kingdom of heaven, which were committed to Peter and his successors. (See note 1). The Gothic nations were too ignorant to unravel the sophistries of this clever and determined priest, and they permitted him to assume a kind of overright of their ecclesiastical matters. His successor, Boniface III., carried these pretentions still higher. He was the last of the bishops of Rome and the first of the popes. In his days the claim to supremacy over all other bishops was, not only definitely made, but it was acknowledged by the secular power and confirmed by an imperial Edict. The wicked usurper Phocas, to serve his own selfish purposes, conceded to Boniface III. in A. D. 607 the headship over all the Churches of Christendom. A pillar is still standing in Rome which was erected in memory of this important concession. This was a tremendous elevation, the first upward step on the ladder that led the bishops of Rome from the humble pastorate of a local Church to the mightiest throne in Europe. But still all that was claimed or granted was simply Episcopacy though of a universal kind; no thought of secular government existed at this period. The matter however did not stop here. This supreme Episcopal jurisdiction led to constant interferences of the Roman bishop in the affairs of the various nations of Christendom, and to ever increasing pretensions to authority in matters secular as well as ecclesiastical, until five hundred years later, in A. D. 1073, Pope Gregory VII. took a great stride in advance, and established a theocracy at Rome. He was the first who claimed to be the representative of Deity, to be above all the kings in the world. This proud and self-exalting man strove, and strove successfully, not only to emancipate the spiritual power from all control by the State, not only to secure for it absolute independence, but, further to subject the secular power of princes to the spiritual power of priests, and thus to establish at Rome in his own person and in the succession of the Roman Pontiffs an absolute and supreme ruler of the world. Nor did he propound this new and startling doctrine as a theory only. With daring audacity he excommunicated the German Emperor, Henry IV., released his subjects from allegiance to him, and forbade them to obey him as sovereign. (See note 2). He actually succeeded in exacting humiliating concessions from the Emperor, and yet he subsequently bestowed his kingdom on another. This pope turned the bishopric of Rome into a universal and unlimited monarchy, and the sovereigns of Europe were unable to oppose his unprecedented usurpations. He established also an undisguised and irresistable despotism over the national Churches in other lands, by enacting that no bishop in the Catholic Church should enter on the exercise of his functions until the pope had confirmed his election, a law of far reaching and vast importance, by which perhaps more than by any other means Rome sustained for centuries her temporal power as well as her ecclesiastical influence. Many of the constant quarrels between our own early English kings and the popes of Rome, as well as many similar feuds on the continent, arose out of the flagrant usurpation of national rights and invasions of national liberties. It virtually took from the Churches the power to appoint their own bishops and placed them under a foreign despotism. The clergy of all nations were by this time enslaved to the Papacy, and by obeying its bulls of excommunication and giving effect to its interdicts they placed in the pope's hand a lever to move the world. During the interdict the churches in a country were all closed, bells silent, the dead unburied; no masses could be performed, no rites except those of baptism and extreme unction celebrated. This state of things was so dreadful to a superstitious age, that monarchs were obliged to yield lest their people should revolt. The result of every such interdict was an increase to the power of the Papacy, and they soon brought all refractory rulers in Europe to terms. When the maxims of Gregory VII., had been acted out for a century, and the power to trample on the necks of kings had come to be regarded as an inherent right of the Papacy, the proud spirit of Papal aggression reached its climax. The period of climax may be dated from the pontificate of Innocent III., A. D. 1198. The leading objects which the Roman pontiffs had steadily pursued for centuries seemed at last attained: independent sovereignty, absolute supremacy over the Christian Church, and full control over the princes of Europe. The historian Hallam says of this man, "He was formidable beyond all his predecessors, perhaps beyond all his successors. On every side the thunder of Rome broke over the heads of princes." (See note 3). He excommunicated Sweno, King of Norway; threatened the king of Hungary to alter the succession; put the kingdom of Castile under an interdict; and when Philip Augustus of France refused at his bidding to take back his repudiated wife, Innocent did not hesitate to punish the whole nation by putting France also under the same dreaded penalty, until her king humbly submitted to the pope's behest. King John of England and Philip II. of Aragon were both constrained to resign their kingdoms and receive them back as spiritual fiefs from the Roman Pontiff, who claimed also the right to decide the election of the Emperors of Germany by his confirmation or veto. "The boundary of Papal dominion extends from the pontificate of Innocent III. inclusively to that of Boniface VIII., or in other words, throughout the thirteenth century. Rome inspired during this age all the terror of her ancient name; the sun once more mistress of the world, and kings were her vassals." (Note 4 ref.). Innocent III. claimed also the right to dispense with both civil and canon law when he pleased, and to decide cases by the plenitude of his own inherent power. He dispensed also with the obligation of promises made on oaths, undermining thus the force of contracts and treaties. The military power of the Papacy dates also from this man, as the crusades had left him in possession of an army, disposable pretension of lucrative kind also in this world-wide. The metropolitan, ecclesiastical, and assumptions of the Papacy had become so intolerable, that protests were making themselves heard in many quarters. It was felt there must be allowed at any cost, and a wholesale slaughter was commenced with a view to their extermination. The Inquisition was founded, the Albigenses and Waldenses were murderously persecuted, and superstition and tyranny were at their height. From this century Papal persecution of the witnesses for the truth never ceased until the final establishment of Protestantism at the end of the seventeenth century.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

Note 2. "Wherefore, trusting in the justice and mercy of God, and of his blessed Mother, the ever-blessed Virgin Mary, on your authority (that of St. Peter and St. Paul), the above named Henry and all his adherents I excommunicate and bind in the fetters of anathema; on the part of God Almighty, and on yours, I interdict him from the government of all Germany and of all Italy. I deprive him of all royal power and dignity. I prohibit every Christian from rendering him obedience as King. I absolve all who have sworn or shall swear allegiance to his sovereignty from their oaths." Milman "History of Latin Christianity," Vol. IV., p. 131.

Note 3. "The three great sovereigns of western Europe, the Kings of Germany, of France, and of England, had seen their realms under interdict, themselves under sentence of excommunication. But the Papal power under Innocent not only aspired to humble the loftiest: hardly one of the smaller kingdoms had not already been taught, or was not soon taught, to feel the awful majesty of the Papacy, from the Northern Ocean to Hungary, from Hungary to the Spanish shore of the Atlantic. Innocent is exercising what takes the language of protective or parental authority, but which in most cases is asserted by the terrible interdict." ## Predictions Concerning Gog or Russia.

Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix.

But who is Gog? The answer is at hand. The reference is to the vast and growing power of Russia—the outcome of the warlike Sclavonic tribes of ancient origin, descended from Japheth, eldest son of Noah. Gen. x. 2. The capital cities of European and Asiatic Russia are named in the first verses of the two chapters: Meshech—Moscow—formerly the seat of government of European Russia, now second city of the empire; and Tubal—Tobolsk—chief city of Siberia, are not only thus early designated, but Russia itself is distinctly named, and that too, fourteen and a-half centuries before she was known as Russia. The words in the beginning of our chapters, "the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal," should read, "Prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal." Such is the reading in the Greek version of the Old Testament, so largely quoted from and referred to by our Lord and the New Testament writers. Thus Russia—and were it still doubted, the naming of her chief cities will surely establish the fact—is clearly pointed out in the Scriptures of truth, a certain proof of the futurity of this prophecy.

Her geographical position is also indicated in the prophecy: "And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts." Gog is a symbolic term for the head of all the Russias; Magog, also symbolic, is his land. Gog is the last emperor of the vast Russian empire.

Russia is evidently destined to become master in Asia. Her frontier line across Asia is 5000 miles in length. Her vast empire stretches over half of Europe and nigh the whole of northern Asia, covering an area of 8,325,393 square miles. Her dominions compose about one-seventh of the habitable earth. Certainly the country is not a wealthy one, but the vast and well-disciplined army which Russia can bring into the field is numerically superior to any army which any other country can produce. She can command a force in time of war of more than 2,000,000 men. Russia will be no mean foe to contend with when the great struggle is entered upon. It is very well known that the Russian policy is one steady aggression, not chiefly in Europe but in Asia, and that she has long coveted sole mastery in the East.

Russia was almost entirely unknown in the Greek and Roman, and it was not till 862 A. D. that the history of the great northern kingdom commences. Ruric, a Norman pirate, founded the first royal dynasty of Russia, which existed till 1598. Till the accession of Ruric Russia, as the name of the country was not known, although specifically pointed out in Scripture. The foundation, however, of the present greatness of the Muscovite empire was laid by Peter the Great, and its rapid progress under his reign and that of Catherine II. is almost unequalled in history.

Paganism in Russia was abolished by Vladimir, the first Christian Czar, about 988, but it was not till the 12th century that Christianity was established in the land. The overthrow of idolatry and the introduction of Christianity and spread of the Scriptures—all emanating from the Greek Church—is as important era in the history of this kingdom. The Emperor exercises despotic power in the State and is also the recognized head of the National Church. The Russian nobility, however, exercise a powerful modifying influence in the counsels of the Czar. St. Petersburg, capital of the empire, was founded by Peter the Great in 1703, and is distant from London about 1500 miles.

Probably the most ambitious and grasping of modern kingdoms, and, we are compelled to add, the most faithless in public honor and treaty engagements and in the means employed to accomplish its designs, is that of Russia. The character ascribed to her in the prophetic Scriptures, coupled with her frequent outbreaks of undisguised and most disastrous hostility to her Jewish subjects in the past, and in the yet more awful future, exhibit Russia in a most unfavorable light. Thank God, however, there are many dear saints of God in that vast empire, and we have reason to believe that more than one of her Emperors have their names written in the Lamb's Book of Life.

Russia has for ages meditated the conquest of India, and from the commencement of her history has eagerly coveted possession of Constantinople. Her hankering after the Bosphorus commenced with her first attack upon Constantinople in the ninth century and during the reign of her first king, Ruric, or rather Prince of Novgorod; the title Czar, or its French equivalent Emperor, was first used of Ivan III., who became sole ruler of the empire in 1462, and thus founded the present monarchy.

From the period of the first Russian attack on Constantinople in 865, and which singularly enough was repulsed by a Turkish tribe, the impression has been shared by many that Constantinople will yet be held by the Muscovite. We have read the following in a modern history: "It is said that in the Square of Taurus, in the Eastern Capital, an equestrian statue was inscribed with a prophecy to that effect." Russia has never made a secret of her intentions respecting the Asiatic possessions of Turkey, and of her determination to plant the eagle on the heights of Constantinople, and from thence onward to Judea.

"Constantinople is the gate to Jerusalem." So thinks, says, and prays the Russian. Peter the Great said: "We must progress as much as possible in the direction of Constantinople and India. He who can once get possession of these places is the real ruler of the world. We must hasten the downfall of Persia, and force our way into the Indies, which are the affluent storehouses of the world. Once there we can dispense with English gold."

These sayings are carefully treasured up in the minds and memories of every true and intelligent Muscovite. It is very well known that the First Napoleon predicted the triumph of the Russian eagle in those very places just named. It is said that Alexander earnestly sought the consent of Napoleon to his favorite project, namely, to break up Turkey, seize Constantinople and thus command the commerce of the Mediterranean, but was sternly refused.

She has long coveted the Bosphorus, and would, ere this, have swept down upon the capital of the decaying Ottoman power, had not England doggedly interfered. This, then, brings us face to face with the crucial question: Who is to be master in the East? Great Britain and Russia stand as opposed and opposing powers. The awful struggle must come. The British lion and the Russian eagle will engage in sanguinary conflict, the effect of which will be to change the whole political situation of Christendom. We judge that the tide of Muscovite conquest will flow on to the very frontiers of China; that the rich and fertile provinces, dissolated by centuries of Turkish misgovernment and oppression, will fall a prey to the great Northern despot; that India—that most brilliant pearl in Her Majesty's diadem, will have to yield up wealth and treasures to the conqueror of Asia; that the standard of the prophet will have to give place to the Russian eagle on the walls of Constantinople.

The ascendency of Russia in the East, and the revival of the old Roman Empire in the West, necessitates these and other predicted political changes of vast importance.

The great Eastern or really Jewish Question, must be settled at Jerusalem—the City of the Great King—and in the Millennial triumph of Israel, and of her headship over the nations of the world.

Great Britain and Russia are the two greatest empires in the world. Supremacy in Central Asia has brought them face to face. It is no question of a mere frontier line; that is a matter of trifling moment. But the real question to be decided sooner or later is as to the mastery in Asia. Is it to be the Northern Autocrat or the British Lion?

By the two great rival powers 3,000 miles and more have been crossed. The buffer state of Afghanistan can be no real bulwark against the steady progress of the great Northern invader. We believe, from the place assigned to Russia in the Word of God, that her legions will yet sweep over the plains and mountains of Asia, and become the dominant power all over the east, till she falls ignobly and ingloriously and forever on the mountains of Judea. Ezek. xxxix. Thus she will command for a time the powers north of Palestine and those east of the river Euphrates.—Walter Scott, in Prophetic News.

ANOTHER YOUTHFUL PRODIGY.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., June 2, 1888.—A boy preacher, only eleven years old and wearing knee breeches, is creating a sensation in the city pulpits with his finished sermons and spontaneous eloquence.

His name is Pascal Porter, and he reached here last Sunday. Since then he has delivered a sermon every night and has drawn immense audiences to hear his fervid discourses. On Sunday afternoon he preached for one hour and five minutes in the pulpit of the Walnut Street Baptist Church to a congregation which filled every pew and overflowed the aisles. His text was "The Attributes of God, Justice and Mercy." His language was remarkably correct and his delivery surprisingly easy and graceful. The sermon was generally conceded to be a marvel of eloquence and feeling, and the congregation went away marvelling at the youthful prodigy.

A number of ministers and theological students remained to question the boy concerning his religious views. One of the latter asked him if he understood the doctrine of the atonement. With a puzzled air the child shook his head.

"I don't think I do," he answered thoughtfully.

The student put another question concerning the efficacy of grace, but received no satisfactory reply.

"I don't understand these things, nor all that I say," candidly said the boy. "They are given to me and I speak by inspiration. The Spirit gives me the words."

Nothing more was elicited from him by further questioning.

The Herald correspondent called upon Pascal Porter this morning. He found him in charge of a man named J. W. Bingham, who styles himself the boy's manager, and who keeps a jealous eye over his charge.

Pascal is a well-known lad of eleven years, his birthday being November 6. He is four feet eight inches tall, and of stocky build. His face is most intelligent, his eyes being large, brown and expressive, his mouth large and firmly closed, his features regular, hair dark and complexion very swarthy. His youthful appearance was added to by a child's velvet suit, with knee breeches and a very juvenile little round hat.

Pascal was born in Jefferson county, Ind., a few miles from the town of Madison. His father, W. H. Porter, is a farmer, and brought the gifted lad up to his own peaceful pursuits.

"Pascal has ploughed many a day," observed his manager, and the boy laughingly held up a pair of large but shapely brown hands. The palms were still callused, and their owner was evidently no stranger to manual labor.

The lad's mother is dead and his opportunities for an education have been very limited. He has gone to the neighborhood free school about two years, quitting school last winter. He can read and write and says he studies the Bible, picks out his own texts and then prepares his sermons. He does not write them out, but places the headings and the principal points on a sheet of paper. These are the only notes he uses. He receives no assistance from any one. He began preaching a little over two years ago and has preached in many new towns in Indiana and twenty-seven times in Kentucky. At Frankfort, in the latter State, he carried on services for eight days, addressing crowded houses till the time. Within the past six months, his manager says, the boy has taken over one hundred persons into the church.

"I wanted to preach when I was six years old," said Pascal, "and began by speaking in the Sunday-school. I felt it was my duty to preach; that was the reason I began."

"Does anybody help you about your sermons?"

"Nobody. I get them up the same as any other preacher."

"If you heard a sermon, could you repeat it?"

"I could repeat most of it, but not all. I have a good memory and learn things very quickly. I never read a book of sermons in my life."

Pascal said, in reply to further questioning, that his father and mother were Second Adventists, and he was himself a member of that denomination. Their principal doctrine was their belief in the second coming of Christ upon earth.

"Manager" Bingham does not create so favorable an impression as his youthful charge. He prefers to answer all questions himself, and Pascal confines his conversation to brief answers to direct questions. He said the boy made no charges for his services, but relies entirely upon voluntary contributions for support.

Pascal Porter will probably conduct protracted meetings in this city if he can secure a church. As yet none has been placed at his disposal. His method of preaching is that of the exhorter. When his sermons are concluded he always "opens the door of the church" and invites penitents to come forward.—N. Y. Herald.

"The Offence of the Cross." Gal. v. 2.

A European was once taken prisoner in a Mohammedan land. During his captivity he amused himself by sketching. His enemies saw his handiwork. As they gazed at his skillful and curious productions, it struck them that they might turn his talent to profitable account. He was promised his liberty, on the condition that he would design a new mosque. He agreed to the proposal. An elegant and substantial building was planned. At first it pleased them, and the hour of his emancipation seemed near. Some keen eye, however, made a discovery. It was found that the mosque was drawn in the shape of a cross. Disappointed and angry, they put the architect to death. Thus do some reject the Gospel. They are well pleased with the plan of salvation, until they discern in it the cross of self-denial.

"The face of the Lord is against them that do evil." So says the Bible. So says the just and holy character of God. So say the records of human history. So will say the judgment-day, and the destiny of men in the world of spirits. The only possible escape for those who do evil is to cease doing evil and seek for pardon through Christ; and if they decline to do this, then the holy wrath of God will fall upon them to the uttermost.

Poetry.

To Mrs. A. E. WHITE.

You say the sunny hours are passed,
And you are hastening down
To where the fading sunset casts
Its lengthening shadows round.

And you recall each springtime grace,
The shining braid or curl,
And with your eye the picture trace,
Of fresh and blooming girl.

Youth's vanished sweetness all regret,
And turn with longing eyes
To scenes along our pathway set,
Blissful as Paradise.

Forgotten elves old we grow,
The awful barren waste,
And how the fruit we learned to know
That soiled was to taste.

Life's river, as it nears the sea,
Grows broader in its sweep,
And moves in silent majesty,
But oh, how calm and deep!

And you, with crown of silver hair,
Are beautiful within;
Your eyes behold the good and fair
In everything, save sin.

MARTHA HARMAN.

SPIRITUALISM.

I noticed an article in THE RESTITUTION on, "What is spiritualism, and who are spiritualists?" and proceeding to give a slight explanation, permit me to give a few words on the same subject.

While many educated and cultured men and women are its strongest advocates they are in a worldly way sincere, and honestly seeking the truth, but have never tasted that the Lord is gracious, are puffed up with fleshly wisdom and know nothing of the blessedness of faith nor of the sweet simplicity of peace found only in Christ, and thus being worldly and of the world are mostly "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." And if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him, and these are open to deception.

To all who are in doubt as to the antichrist of these last days I will suggest an examination of the literature and teachings of this Great Movement, and thus learn that antichrist has here, like a great volcano, that for ages has sullenly thundered in its hidden depths, wrecking awful destruction by its quakings and upheavals, suddenly come to the surface, and like a blast from the bottomless pit swept millions before it. But woe to the unstable soul who dares in the face of the judgments of Almighty God teach to the world as gospel, such a mass of confusion and refuse the truth. For God is not the author of confusion but of peace as in all churches of the saints.

We know there are many who do not seem to be capable of thinking for themselves and thus are led by stronger minds. Many of these would gladly turn to the true light if they could behold it, but at present they are enthralled by a powerful delusion, it is here "Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light," it is not the deceived but the deceiver, in this case like in all others that merit the severest punishment. Seek ye out of the book of the Lord and read, no one of these shall fail. Isaiah xxxiv. 16. Paul writes, 1 Tim. iv. 1, Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils.

"There shall be false teachers among you who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. "And many shall follow their pernicious ways by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of."

And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you. "These are wells without water. Clouds that are carried with a tempest to whom the mist of darkness is reserved forever." "For when they speak great swelling words of vanity they allure through the lusts of the flesh," 2 Peter xi. 12; xvii. 18, For all that is in the world the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father but is of the world. "And the world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." "Little children it is the last time, and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists, whereby we know it is the last time. Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? he is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son. Whosoever denieth the Son the same hath not the Father, but he that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also. 1 John xi. 16, 17, 18, 22, 23. Plain as this language is he goes further, "Beloved believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God." For as many as are led by the spirit of God they are the sons of God." Romans viii. 14. Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God, and this is that spirit of antichrist whereof ye have heard, 1 John xii. 8, and the spirit that leads spiritualism. Here is wisdom. "Let him that hath understanding, search the Scriptures, and pray without ceasing, for the night is far spent, and the day is at hand, already we feel the breezes of the heavenly dawn, let us arise, and "be no more children tossed to and fro by the sleight of men and cunning craftiness whereby they lie and wait to deceive, but speaking the truth in love may grow up into him in all things which is the head even Christ," Eph. iv. 14, 15, for the day of the Lord is at hand, when the Spirit shall be poured upon us from on high. Isaiah xxxii. 15. And Michael shall stand up for the children of God. Daniel xii. 1. And with his angels fight against the dragon and his angels and prevail. Rev. xii. 7. And many shall be purified and made white and tried, but the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever, Daniel xii. 10. And the ransomed of the Lord shall turn, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, they shall obtain joy, and gladness; and sorrow and sighing, shall flee away. Isaiah xxxv. 10.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 66.

THE NEW BIRTH.

Lesson Chapter: John 3. 1-22.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God. 1 John 3. 1.

Q. According to whose purpose are we called?

A. God's. Rom. 8. 28.

Q. For what?

A. To be the brethren of Christ. Rom. 8. 29.

Q. What do the words foreknew and predestinate relate?

A. To those called ones as a class or body, because Christ is the head of the body, the church. Col. 1. 18; Heb. 12. 2t.

God calls men by the gospel, they step out, and he chooses them because they step out at his call. He purposed that the gospel should be preached, he foreknew that it would call out a class, and he predetermined that this class, through obedience to his word, should be conformed to the image of his Son, and should thus become his elect ones.

Q. What then is the first step toward the new birth?

A. The hearing of the word of truth; because faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the word of God. Rom. 10. 16, 17.

Q. How do we know that this has anything to do with the new birth?

A. Because John says "As many as received him (Christ) to them gave he power (right or privilege) to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." John 1. 12; 1 John 5. 1. For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. Gal. 3. 26. And faith in Christ Jesus is faith in the gospel, and faith to be of any account must be obedient faith.

Q. How are we born? by whose will?

A. God's. John 1. 13.

Q. What are made instruments of the birth?

A. Water. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. Gal. 3. 27. Therefore if any man be in Christ he is a new creature. 2 Cor. 5. 17.

The Spirit. Ye were sealed with that holy spirit of promise. Eph. 1. 13. 2 Cor. 1. 21, 22. He which hath anointed us is God. "He sets his impress or mark upon us. He names us at baptism with his name. Baptising them in the name of the Father, etc. Matt. 28. 19; 1 Cor. 12. 13.

To be born of the Spirit is to be born according to the will of God, by hearing the word and obeying it. It is to follow the teachings of the Spirit made known in the word. 2 Cor. 3. 3. Rom. 8. 14.

For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God foreordained that we should walk in them. Eph. 2, 10.

Righteousness. The new man is created in righteousness and true holiness. (Mark the word created.) Eph. 4. 24.

Every one that doeth righteousness is born of him. 1 John 1. 29.

Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin. 1 John 3. 9.

Love. Every one that loveth is born of God. 1 John 4. 7.

For the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. Gal. 5. 19-21.

Suffering. For whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. Heb. 12. 6; 3. 10-12.

The Resurrection. Christ is the first-born from the dead. Col. 1. 18. The first-born among many brethren. Rom. 8. 29; 1. 4-6. If we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. Rom. 6. 5; 8. 11; 1 Cor. 6. 14. We shall be made partakers of the divine nature. 2 Pet. 1. 4.

Q. Can we enter into the kingdom of God unless we are thus born?

A. No. John 3. 3-6.

Q. What does it mean by saying that whatsis born of the flesh is flesh?

A. The mortal, perishable man, the man who still stands, by natural descent, related to Adam, he who has not changed his relationship from a child of Adam to a child of God. He who stands as he stood at birth is still in the flesh; there is in him nothing that allies him to the second Adam; nothing whereby he may bear the image of the heavenly; he has not been made nigh to the covenants of promise by the blood of Christ, he is not in Christ Jesus, Eph. 2. 12, 13, not subject to the law of God. Rom. 8. 7. He has not been made a son of God by faith and baptism.

Then summing up, we find that the new birth is brought about by hearing the gospel, by faith, by obedience, by water, by the life of righteousness, by love, by endurance of suffering, by the spirit, and by resurrection. It takes it all to make us conformed to the image of God's Son, in character and nature. When we are born from the dead we will be able to go where we please, as the wind goes, and as Jesus went.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weston.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone Ages and shows that the same hand in the present Age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. Those votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success: whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is to-day as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

JEWISH INTELLIGENCE.

From the Jewish Herald, for the current month—June—we learn that the "Forty-fifth Annual Meeting of the British Society for the promotion of the Gospel among the Jews" took place in Exeter Hall, London on Tuesday, May 8th, and that it was largely attended by an intensely interested audience. From the addresses delivered on this occasion we have selected the following from a gifted author whose name has already become familiar to our readers. Christianity, since the first century of our era, has never been exhibited to the descendants of Abraham in its purity as a religion of redeeming love. Israel has had no opportunity of holding anything excepting some gross counterfeit. It is no wonder that the nation has turned away with infinite disgust from the Romish system of idolatry and relentless persecution that has overwhelmed it with centuries of spoliation and suffering. We commend the address as one worthy of careful perusal.

The Rev. Edward White:

I have been struck tonight with the fact that our modes of thought and feeling depend very much upon the friendships which it pleased God to give us in early life. Now, I had the exceeding honor and advantage of being tolerably well acquainted with the late Ridley Herschell, the father of the last Lord Chancellor. He was a thorough Jew, and he was also a thorough Christian; and nearly fifty years ago I came into possession of a book by Mr. Herschell, called, "A Brief Sketch of the Present State and Future expectations of the Jews." Its object was to explain to the Christian people of England a little more than they knew previously of the interior of Jewish life throughout the world. I do not know whether the book is still in print, but I can imagine few things more likely to further the object of this Society, than that this book should be reprinted; for in it Mr. Herschell answers the question in a very succinct manner, How the Christianity of Christendom appears to the Jew from the outside. It answers the demand of Burns' couplet admirably—

O wad some pow'r the gittie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!

(Laughter.)

If we look from the Christian standpoint upon the Jewish question, we forget that it has another side, and that the Jewish people themselves, blessed with a multitude of illustrious and godly men, have their views of Christendom also, and can give their own account of their reasons for rejecting Christianity. When you come into contact with educated Jews, you find that they are not all indisposed to reveal their inner thought on this subject. Now, what are the principal reasons which they allege for their continued rejection of Christianity after eighteen hundred years. In the Daily News of yesterday there was an interesting article giving the most recent statistics of the Jewish race, from which it appears that they number from eight to ten millions. Yet, in spite of all our efforts, it is a notorious fact that the large mass of this ancient and illustrious race are still outside Christendom; and if you were to ask them why they still persist in rejecting the gospel, what would be their reply? There are few questions that could more profitably occupy the attention of Christian people than this. Mr. Herschell's book brings to bear upon our convictions and consciences this statement—that so far as central Europe is concerned, and in view of the opinion that the mass of the Jewish people have formed concerning the Christian religion, it is rather to their credit than otherwise that they have rejected it,—or, rather, rejected that which has gone in those parts under the name of Christianity. Anyone who knows what Roman Catholicism is in central Europe, how it presents Christianity to the people as an organized machinery for saving souls by a system of priestcraft, which disowns the King of glory and places antichrist in his place, which abjures Christ's High-priesthood and places a human priesthood in its stead; which sets aside the Holy Scripture as its supreme standard, and, instead of giving to the people genuine Christianity, enforces a mass of traditions which do violence to the fundamentals of the Gospel; and when you think that the result of this apostasy has been to rear up European populations, who prove their unbelief by the rejection of pure New Testament Christianity when it is presented to them. When you know all this, can you wonder that the Jewish mind has been to harden them against the reception of the Gospel and indispose them even to listen to it. All this has to be taken into account when we judge the Jews for their rejection of a religion presented to them in such a guise. That is what Mr. Herschell enforces. Mr. Herschell sprang from a Polish family in central Europe. He speaks of his own ancestors as persisting in the rejection of Christianity; but he speaks of them as genuinely godly people, and gives an account of the rabbi under whom he himself studied in his youth, from which I may, perhaps, quote the following words:—

"When I think of this worthy man, under whose tuition I was for some years, I am forcibly reminded of the Apostle Paul's definition of what a bishop should be:—'A lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate' (Titus i. 8) He always freely educated from ten to fifteen children of the poor; and afterwards used all his influence to get them established in life. On Sabbath afternoons his house used to be filled with poor devout men, who, after partaking of his Sabbath meal, spent the evening in singing psalms and hymns with him. His charity was unbounded; he literally fulfilled the precept, 'He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none.' If, when the poor came to him, my sister happened to be from home, or any other cause prevented him from having access to his wardrobe, he made no scruple of parting with some of the garments he was then wearing, rather than send his poor brother empty away. Do not suppose that I wish to set forth my esteemed relative as a singular character; I give him as a specimen of a class, as a sample of what many of the Jewish rabbis are, and of what it is considered that all ought to be."

Mr. Herschell goes on to declare his belief that in this type of man the rejection of Polish "Christianity" was the result of better knowledge of the nature of God, and the true faith, derived from the Old Testament; and, until we have firmly grasped this idea, that no man is responsible for rejecting truth which has not been presented to him in some degree of purity, we cannot understand modern European Judaism. St. Peter said, "Now, I perceive that in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of him;" and with all our zeal for making known the Lord Jesus Christ throughout the world, we must apply this principle to the Jews of past ages—especially to those Jews who have experienced the most cruel treatment from the so-called Christian populations, and have seen in their "religion" only the most horrible misrepresentation of Christianity.

If we pass from the Roman Catholic to the Protestant world, let me ask, have not we given to the Jews some occasion for incredulity? Assuredly we have. Although almost a commonplace, it is of the utmost importance to reiterate that in the propagation of Christianity amongst the Jews we are bound to adhere to the words of the New Testament and not to represent to them the Gospel in the forms of the so-called creeds and traditions of the fourth and fifth centuries. St. Paul says, "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth." If that be still true, it is of infinite importance, it is our absolute duty, to preach the Gospel in the language of the Apostles. For example there is nothing at all resembling the Athanasian creed in the New Testament. The New Testament speaks of one God, the Father Almighty. To us there is one God, the Father, of Whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, and one Holy Spirit. Why will not men be contented to preach the doctrine of the Godhead in the language of the Apostles and Prophets? How is it that there does not exist even one considerable congregation of converted Mohammedans throughout the earth? I believe it is very much because Christendom persists in representing the chief doctrines of Christianity in subsequently invented language, and not strictly in the language of its original teachers. Therefore, I urge upon all who preach the Gospel also to the Jews to employ the language of Holy Scripture and not that of modern invention. The great Christian doctrines of justification by faith, and regeneration, were not novelties. In the third chapter of St. John's Gospel, our Lord's argument with Nicodemus shows that Nicodemus was ignorant of that which he ought already to have known. St. Paul labors hard in the Epistle to the Romans to show that justification by faith was not a novel doctrine of Christianity, but was as old as Abraham, and older; he was "justified by faith," and if Abraham could be saved by faith, without a full knowledge of Christian doctrine, why not Jews in later ages, if they have not had the opportunity of knowing the full and clear truth of the Gospel? If we go to the Jews and attempt to persuade them that all their godly ancestors have gone down to perdition, we shall shut ourselves out from every chance of bringing the truth home to them. (Cheers). A man becomes responsible for rejecting the Gospel only when it has been properly set before him; and it is properly explained only when it is presented in its primitive form. (Cheers). In the second place, Have we not done harm to the cause of faith by the sceptical criticism which has abounded in our times? Who has infused scepticism into the Jewish mind? To an immense extent, this has been the work of nominal Christians. There has come into vogue an anti-Jewish mode of dealing with the Old Testament Scriptures, which naturally prejudices them against Christianity. In the Old Testament, from Genesis to Malachi—but especially in the prophetic books—what can be plainer, as all admit, than that God in his wrath has denounced judgment against the Jewish people, which have been literally fulfilled in their history? But the moment we read of the great future blessings intended for the Jews, we then at once say that these mighty spiritual blessings for the Gentiles: and then we profess to be astonished, that when we thus treat the Old Testament Scriptures—setting at defiance the first principles of interpretation—the Jews pay little heed to what we may say on behalf of the New Testament. Suppose, again, the Jews had been possessors of the Gospel, and we were the heathen or unbelieving. What should we think if they insisted, in the first place, that, on believing in Christ, we should abandon our nationality as Englishmen and be merged in the Jewish nation? We should say, "No, thank you." Yet that is the way most Gentiles in England approach the Jews, even to this day. (Hear, hear). But they will surely retain their place in the world as a nation. Let us, therefore, bring Christianity before them as the New Testament brings it.

Lastly. I will enforce, almost more than anything else, that we should preach the Gospel as "glad tidings of great joy to all people"—including Israel. If we present Christianity chiefly as a system of abstract dogma, can we wonder at its receiving no cool a welcome? The Jew is, of all men, the most susceptible to kindness. Because of his sorrows, he feels the touch of sympathy, and well he may, for he comes of a nation of sufferers. Let us present the love of God to him with great joy, and let us make him understand that Jesus is the incarnation of that love, the Eternal Word made flesh, to breathe into all hearts the promise of pardon and life everlasting. Let us not deny the glory of Israel's national past, nor the exceeding glory of their national future. I humbly confess, for my own part, that I have found the greatest comfort and strength in a firm and perfect faith in the return of our Lord Jesus Christ from the heavens, in the restoration of the supernatural government of the world, and in the gathering of all the nations around the throne of the king of the Jews, when "the earth shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands before the Lord, because he cometh to judge the earth in righteousness, and the nations with his truth."

Communications.

"And a highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there: And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Isa. xxxv. 8–10.

How often is this Scripture misrepresented by the learned men of this day, do they not change the meaning by spiritualising it? We are told that it does not convey a literal meaning: from the fact, it never will be fulfilled literally. So we are told, it has reference to the Scriptures, that they are so plain that the most simple cannot err therein. If it is a fact that the fool (simple or illiterate) cannot misunderstand the Scriptures, why is it that the most learned Doctors of Divinity differ so much concerning the same volume?

Is this Scripture to be literally fulfilled, is the question; what is the meaning thereof? "A highway shall be there." What is a highway? The dictionary definition is, "Great road; public path." Now with regard to the place referred to according to the context, "Zion," or the city of Jerusalem, with the land of Judea. Was there not a time when throughout that whole country existed leading to the Holy City, that the people thereof should come up thereunto to worship? In the days of King David, Solomon, and other kings this whole country was in a fruitful and prosperous condition, but as the people became corrupt and disobedient, God made known to them through Isaiah the prophet, (as seen in the xxxiv. chapter) that that whole country should be laid waste. The princes shall come to nothing, and thorns, nettles, and brambles, shall be the fruits. And the cormorant, the bittern, the owl, the raven, the wild beasts of the desert, the satyr, and the vulture, shall be the inhabitants thereof, from generation to generation. See from the seventh verse to the end.

This has been literally fulfilled, history proves it; when the city of Jerusalem was one thousand four hundred and sixty-eight years and six months old, it was made desolate by the King of Babylon, afterwards rebuilt, but the sixth invasion upon that city, even by Titus made the desolation complete. See Josephus' Wars of the Jews, chap. x. Since that time Volney and other travellers give proof of the entire fulfilment of this prophecy.

Therefore, since the desolation is fulfilled according to prophecy so literally, let us not cast a cloud over the prophecy of the blessings that shall come upon the same country and people. In chap. xxxv. 1–3, we read, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice with joy and singing: the glory of Lebanon shall be given to unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon: they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God." The place therefore that has been forsaken and been the habitation of jackals so many years will again become a beautiful and fertile country; in fact the improvement of that land has commenced. Cities are building up, the roads are being improved, the land is being cultivated better, rail roads are in operation, thus the highways are being built. So when the root of Jesse shall come, "There shall be a highway for the remnant of his people (the Israelites) which shall be left, from Assyria: like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt." Isa. xi. 16. Thus we see that this highway is a great thoroughfare, prepared for travel, and when the time of the exodus is fully come, "the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people," etc. ch. xi. 11. "And they shall build up the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations," ch. lxi. 4. Again we read, "And they that shall be with thee shall build the old waste places, they shall raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in," ch. lviii. 12.

Now the question arises, why shall this highway be called "The way of holiness?" It should be remembered that when the children of Israel were dispersed into all the nations of the earth they were a disobedient and perverse people, but when they will be gathered together they will become willing subjects of the Great King. When Jesus was with them in Jerusalem, he said, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killeth the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto her! How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," Matt. xxiii. 37–38.

Then "the unclean shall not pass over it;" that country is still under the Gentile rule, they were considered unclean. Jesus said, "and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," Luke xxi. 24. So the Gentile possession of that land is limited. "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city: for henceforth there shall no more come unto thee the uncircumcised and the unclean," Isa. lii. 1. "So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain: then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall be no strangers pass through her any more," Joel iii. 17. With all these difficulties removed, it can be seen that the wayfaring men though simple will not err therein.

But the objector says we read, "No lion shall be there, nor shall any ravenous beast go up thereon, they shall not be found there." This they say cannot mean the quadrupeds of the earth. I answer, Yes it does. Take for example the country in which we live, when it was in its wild state, was it not common to meet with a wolf, a fox, a wild hog, a deer and many other wild animals, where are they now? As the country has been improved and the highways established, they have disappeared, and the higher the state of cultivation, the less they appear among us, they seek more wild resorts. Again by reading the eleventh chapter of Isaiah, we see that these animals will become tractable and kind. "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and fatling together; and a little child shall lead them," etc. "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters that cover the sea. Isa. xi. 6–9.

"But the redeemed shall walk there, and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion." Since people believe so strongly that the souls of the righteous ascend to heaven above when the body dies, they naturally conclude that the redeemed here has reference to their traveling to heaven, so the highway is a figure. But then "the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion." Where shall they return from? from heaven, no this will not do. So we read, "It shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea," Isa. xi. 11. "As the Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all the countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land," Jer. xxiii. 8. "In those days Judah shall be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely," ch. xxxiii. 16. So when they return, "Everlasting joy shall be upon their heads: they shall obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away," Isa. xxxv. 10; and li. 11.

Who can wonder at this, when we read, "Thus saith the Lord God: In the day that I cleanse you from all your iniquities, I will cause the cities to be inhabited, and the waste places to be builded. And the land that was desolate shall be tilled, whereas it was a desolation in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are fenced and inhabited. Then the nations that are left round about you shall know that I the Lord have builded the ruined places, and planted that which was desolate: I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it," Ezekiel xxxvi. 33–36.

These are only a few sample statements of what has been spoken through the holy prophets, and they are corroborated by Jesus and by his apostles. Therefore we should receive them with meekness, that we may profit thereby. For, "Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness; that the man of God may be complete, furnished completly unto every good work," 2 Tim. iii. 16–17. R. V.

J. B. Cox.

To the Brethren and Sisters of the Church of God in Iowa, Greeting:

In behalf of the church in Conference assembled at the Watkins flowing well, in Story Co., we write you, and in behalf of the scattered, isolated members of the body; the low condition of spiritual life, and lack of gospel preaching necessary to revive the hearts of our members and carry the gospel of salvation and the kingdom to a dying people dwelling under the shadow of false teaching, and ignorance of the true faith of the gospel of God, we appeal to you. Dearly beloved, the cry has long gone forth, "behold the bridegroom cometh," and the church in this state seems to have fallen asleep, and alas we fear that too many are letting the oil all burn out of their lamps and are in danger of being suddenly aroused by the heralding trump of God to find that the cares of this life have shut the door between them and the great and final consummation of the union of Christ and his church.

Dear brethren and sisters, the work is great and the call imperative to send forth laborers into his vineyard, and this is what we appeal to you to do; for while we cannot go out and preach the word ourselves, yet we can do the work by giving of our means as the Lord has prospered us; not just what we can easily spare but make a sacrifice for him acceptable in his sight, even as the poor widow who in putting in the two mites put in all her living.

The accompanying article will show you what the conference proposes to do, and to this end has this committee of evangelistic work been appointed and a liberal sum of money been paid by the few members present, with which we propose to have an evangelist for just so long a time as we can pay him, and we hereby appeal to every member of the body who may read this to not only freely and liberally respond by at once sending as much money as they can themselves to A. J. Eychaner, Marshalltown, Iowa, who is the treasurer of this committee, but to also consider him or herself hereby appointed a committee to bring this before all within their reach, and work earnestly to this end that we may be enabled to keep some able preaching brother in the field until every part of Iowa is thoroughly organized and in working order for the Master.

Oh, do not let us forget that we are God's stewards, and this work he has placed in our hands, and if we leave our work to others they will surely take our crown with it. And we pray you do not let any one think they are only to pay for work done in their locality, for one soul is just as precious as another, but let all pray earnestly for God to direct the work just where in his wisdom seems best.

And now dear ones please read this as unto yourselves individually, and so act as to insure the well done good and faithful servant.

LIZZIE PALMER,
A. J. EYCHANER,
MRS. A. J. EYCHANER. } Com.

We who are believers of the gospel of the kingdom of God being assembled in conference this 5th day of June, 1888, at Watkin's wells, near Story City, Story Co., Iowa, have entered into the following business plan to send out the gospel to the people of Iowa. To accomplish this end we have appointed a business committee of three, consisting of chairman, treasurer and secretary. Their term of office shall continue one year, or until their successors are appointed. They shall have power to solicit funds, hire an evangelist, and transact such other business pertaining to the spread of the gospel as shall be necessary to that end. This committee shall be governed in the hiring and payment of an evangelist by the following instructions:

1. To hire an evangelist by the day for so long a time as in their judgment will be prudent, or he is able to serve, or the cause of truth demands.

2. That the evangelist shall be paid only for the time that he actually works or preaches, and that his time shall be counted or allowed from the hour that he leaves his home or previous place of meeting.

3. That the person, persons or locality desiring the services of the evangelist, must pay his railroad expenses, counting the mileage or distance from his last place of preaching. In case the evangelist goes home or to any other place on his own business, and then goes to another point to hold meeting, his mileage shall be counted from his last place of meeting to that point, and not from his home or other place.

4. The committee shall require of the evangelist that he solicit donations to the evangelist fund in all places where he shall labor, and of any person or persons that he may find interested in the work.

5. They shall make it the duty of the evangelist to see that the place or persons where he labors pay his railroad expenses, board and lodging by collection or otherwise, and if the amount there collected or donated is in excess of the railroad fare to that place, board, etc., then the surplus shall go to increase the evangelist fund.

6. This committee shall further require of the evangelist that when he goes to a place to preach he shall remain there as long as the interest, in his judgment, shall demand.

7. The evangelist shall also keep a record of the number and names of the believers in every locality where he shall preach, and the names of those who are baptized, and forward these from time to time to the secretary of the committee.

8. The evangelist shall also organize the believers into a body and appoint an elder or elders in every church and set before them the importance of meeting together for prayer, exhortation and weekly contributions for the work of the gospel, also the importance of taking and sustaining our religious papers.

9. The committee shall have power to employ more than one evangelist at any time when the cause demands it, or the funds on hand will warrant.

10. In the event a case comes to the knowledge of the evangelist where those sending for preaching are too poor to pay the railroad fare, the evangelist shall report such case to the committee whose duty it shall be to make an effort to raise money for that special case outside of the evangelist fund.

Note. Brother T. J. Whitesitt has been appointed evangelist for the present.

QUITE a large number of subscriptions expire this month, and we hope our friends will be prompt in sending their renewals, because on your action depends, very largely, the success of our work. We realize that this is a hard time to get money, and we desire to be as lenient as we possibly can with our brethren. If you cannot send all now, send a part, and the rest as soon as you can.

ON Sunday last we met with the church at Argos, and had the privilege of immersing a believer of the glorious gospel into the Divine name in the afternoon of that day. This believer's name is Elias Dickson. We had to go about six miles and a half to a suitable place in Yellow River. As the Editor completed 79 years of age and entered his 80th on the second day of the current month, he can say that he had strength enough to immerse people in his eightieth year. His work in this direction and in all other directions of the Great Redeemer's cause is nearly done.

WE have just received a letter from Pastor Basil Stephanhoff, of Monastir, Macedonia, of date, June 7th, which will be given in our next. The letter contains a likeness neatly photographed on quite a small card. The advertising notice, in gilt letters on the back of the card, is in modern Greek, and shows that the likeness was photographed at Thessalonike by the Lloyds Brothers. Many thanks to our dear missionary brother in Macedonia for the picture. May God abundantly bless his labors in that land to which Paul was directed by the vision of the man saying "Come over into Macedonia and help us."

THEN AND NOW.

Forty years ago Elder H. T. Anderson of the Disciple Church, and one of their leading ministers, the author of, and translator of the New Testament, sent to A. Campbell the following article for publication in the Millennial Harbinger, and was published in 1849, No. 1, Vol. 0, third Series Page 261. Then the leading Disciples believed and taught the literal coming of Christ to establish a kingdom under the whole heavens that at that time the throne of David now in ruins, would be rebuilt, that Jesus the Christ would occupy the throne of his Father David and reign over the house of Jacob for ever. Now this people believe and teach that the Church is the kingdom, that the kingdom was set up on the day of Pentecost. They are however very accommodating, and give to us a sky kingdom in the heart. But to the article to A. Campbell. "One article in my religious creed reads as follows: And the angel said unto her, fear not Mary, for thou hast found favor with God. And behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a Son, and shalt call his name Jesus, he shall be great, and be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end Luke i. 30-34.

And another reads thus, For him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I have overcome and am set down with my Father on his throne. From these I conclude that there is a throne on which Jesus will sit, this he calls his (my) to distinguish it from his Father. It is evident that he now sits on a throne in the heavens, this throne is either God's or David's. If it is God his heavenly Father's throne on which he now sits, then hereafter he will sit on his father David's throne. But if that on which he now sits be David's, then hereafter he will have one which is called his. That there will be a change of thrones is evident from the portion last cited.

That he is not now on his father David's throne is evident from the fact of his being seated with his father on his (his Father's) throne. I say this is evident unless some one can prove that David sits on his throne in heaven. I think this will not be assumed by any one.

Therefore the throne of his father David is yet to be occupied by him, to strengthen this conclusion I will quote Isaiah, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given, of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and justice, from henceforth even for ever, the zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this.

Of the Jewish people and Jerusalem Jesus thus speaks, Luke xxi. 24. "They shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all the nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled."

This language needs no comment, yet I must observe that a part of this has been to the letter fulfilled. The Jews are now in all nations, and Jerusalem has been trodden down by the Gentiles for nearly eighteen centuries. When the time of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled, then will the Jews cease to be scattered, and Jerusalem to be trodden down. Blindness in part, says Paul, has happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. That same blindness is yet there, but when the fulness of the Gentiles is come in, then will that blindness cease. This seems too plain to be mistaken. I would know for what purpose this nation is kept and preserved as it is if all the Scripture relative to them has been accomplished.

Verily I believe they are destined to hold the kingdom under the whole heaven, the scepter of which will be in the hand of our Prince Messiah, and if the subject were not a common one, and if the people had not heard of it before, I would go about to give a reason for the belief that is in me.

Talk of missionary operations to convert the heathen, and of like societies to convert the Catholics. Strange that men should thus talk when God has pronounced sentence on a corrupt race, and when our only hope for the world lies in the resurrection of the sons of Abraham from their religious death, not that I object to such efforts when properly directed.

But when I see heathen at our own doors, and irreligion fill our streets I rather think the expediency would say, convert your neighbors and your own sons, and then, when these are converted, go with one heart, one faith, one purpose, to the distant land, the mighty colossus of superstition that bestrides European, African, and Asiatic nations will fall only by the visible manifestations of the Almighty power. Long since has the prophet said of Jerusalem, the nation and the kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish. Yea, those nations shall be totally destroyed. To the sons of Abraham engrafted on their good Olive, do I look as the only means of a world's conversion.

Who will persuade the archbishop of Canterbury to descend into the Thames, or the Pope of Rome and his Cardinals to the Tiber, that they may imitate him, who, in his humility, was buried in the waters of the Jordan. Who or what can reconcile the jarring and discordant elements of the present Protestant associations. Will any one say the gospel will do this? I answer, have they not heard, and again, who hath believed our report?... We will labor with perseverance and fidelity, that we may be found without spot and blameless, but my faith is in what God has promised to his Son, he has promised him the throne of his father David,

Paul says we are heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ, and his letter to the Galatians, if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. God has promised to Abraham the world for an inheritance, a heavenly city for a habitation, to Christ the throne of David and his kingdom, and to all who are faithful a joint possession. Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth.....Thou hast made us unto our God kings and priests and we shall reign on the earth, but Peter says, our inheritance is reserved in heaven. Let this be the answer to all objections of that sort, that the earth is our inheritance, and our city and its King in heaven, the inheritance is compound or two-fold. God will remove his tabernacle and dwell among men.

Jerusalem, therefore, says Paul is the mother of us all, that the new heavens and earth will be the habitation of the saints, and that the Messiah will be the King is nothing new, but that he will sit upon the throne of his father David and reign for ever, is a subject to which I have not known the attention of this people directed. This is the point to be decided. You may think in my mind at least this is decided. True it is so, but not so firmly and immutably fixed as not to be changed by a good reason to the contrary. I am ready to admit, that I can at present see no consistency in the Bible promises unless this is so, nor can I see why the nation of Israel should be preserved a distinct nation, unless they are designed for some grand purpose, such as that already named."

Such are the views of this great reformer, but what do the Disciples of Campbell say to this? They cannot answer the argument herein set forth. It is true they say that the throne of David was translated to heaven and Jesus Christ is seated upon it. Others say that David in his own right never owned a throne, and still others say that to believe Elder Anderson is to believe materialism. This we will not do. Others tell us that Elder Anderson for some years before his death, was not in keeping with the views of the representative men of the Disciple Church; this is to ascertain extent true, but he was one of their recognized leaders, and as proof of the fact, will say that preserved a distinct nation, unless they are designed for some grand purpose such as that already named.

Report of Labors.

I closed my last at Lanark, Ill., May 18th. The 19th I went to Buskeyville, Wis., and was received into the kind hospitality of Brother C. J. Lee and family. Held meeting over Sunday; had a good meeting and a good time. Monday morning we gave them the parting hand and returned to Lanark, Ill, and was again received into the kind hospitality of Brother and Sister Chown. Wednesday morning we repaired to the water and baptized Brother Chown's son and his wife into the anointed Jesus for the remission of sins. Preached Wednesday evening to the Brethren in Lanark. Friday morning we bade them farewell and took the three o'clock train for Gladbrook, Iowa, which place we reached at one o'clock, and was received into the hospitality of Brother and Sister Albert Allard. We continued till Sunday morning, it having rained so we could not get to our appointment Saturday evening. Sunday morning we assembled at the usual place of meeting. We preached at 11 o'clock and at 4 to a respectably sized audience with good interest manifested. We continued with the brethren at Gladbrook till Thursday, then we took the parting hand with them and made our way to Marshalltown and was received into the hospitality of Brother and Sister Eyebauer, Brother E. meeting us at the depot. Brother Eyebauer's residence is 103 West State St., Marshalltown, Iowa.

Next day, June 1st, we started for the meeting at the great flowing wells near Story City, Story Co., Ia. We reached Story at 12:18, and Brother Watkins' about two o'clock. Now to behold the great wonder of the west. There are two wells, eight inches in diameter. They flow into a great tank, and from the tank it is conveyed into the lake, which is used for boat riding, there being three boats kept on the lake for the accommodation of pleasure parties.

We continued there from the first till the tenth of June. We had three meetings each day. As to the particulars I will refer you to the report to be given in THE RESTITUTION. Let me say we had a blessed good time and met a host of the old pilgrims also. That Conference has made arrangements to send out an evangelist and engaged me to take that place. I will commence on that work next week, and let me say to all who desire preaching in this State, you are requires to pay my fare to your place and keep me while there, and you can have a meeting as long as the interest demands.

After the meeting we came back to Gladbrook and was received into the hospitality of Brother and Sister Allard where we are at this writing and intend to stay over Sunday and visit them through the week and preach for them twice on Sunday. Then we will commence on the work assigned us as evangelist. Our first point will be in Benton Co. about six miles nearly north of Marysville.

WAKE! HARP OF JUDAH.

Long has the harp of Judah hung,
Neglected, broken, and unstrung,
Beneath the willow's shade,
Whilst Israel's solitary bands,
By foreign stream, through foreign lands,
In sullen moods have stay'd.

But since our God reveals His face,
And smiles upon his chosen race,
We'll take our harp again,
Tune as in former happy days,
To notes of gratitude and praise,
We'll strike a joyful strain.

Our song shall be of Jesus' love,
Who left the other'd courts above,
To bear our guilt and shame,
The eternal, contested Word,
Both David's Son and David's Lord,
Jehovah is His name.

So vast the theme, it might inspire
An angel's song, a seraph's lyre,
Such wondrous grace to tell.
Wake! harp of Judah, hear the sound
Par as creation's utmost bound,
All hail, Immanuel!

THE STORY OF ISAAC LEVINSOHN.

I went again to my Jewish friends, and said I wished to return to them and to learn the trade I had begun, and they accepted me, on condition of my utterly refusing to have anything to do with Mr. Stern or his agents. So I give up going to him, and changed my residence to be out of his way. But I remained exceedingly miserable, and the words would come to me, "What doest thou here, Elijah?"

All the first night after this promise I could obtain no sleep, but lay awake thinking of the awful condition of my soul, and of the doom that awaits every unsaved sinner. Every moment seemed like an eternity, and I could not shake off my fears. "In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake." Job iv. 13, 14 This state of terror continued for some few days, and the Jew with whom I was thought me mad. At length I could bear it no longer, and, leaving my work undone, ran off to see Mr. Stern.

He greeted me with a smile, and, when I told him my Jewish friends had pronounced me to be mad, kindly said, "Never mind he, the God of heaven will satisfy your soul."

I cried out, "What must I do to be saved?"

"Believe in the Messiah," he replied.

"You must be born again," he added.

"What! be born again? How can I be born again?" said I. He calmed me by saying I should yet be a follower of the Messiah, the Lord of life and glory.

By Mr. Stern's advice I entered the home for Jewish Enquirers, where I employed every moment of my time in studying the Holy Scriptures, and several learned enquirers, who were also there, helped me to my difficulties.

During my residence in the home I received a letter from my father, who wrote: "Whilst I am glad of your enquiring after knowledge and truth, I feel that the dangerous doctrines, taught by many, may lead you away from the only path given to men in which to walk; depend upon it that all who walk in any other path will perish. The doctrine Mr. Stern teaches is nonsense; he is only a meshumad (that is an apostate). When you see the so-called Rabbi, tell him to wash his brain first, and then to teach doctrine. The religion of our ancestors cannot change—even a God cannot change it.

"The coming of Messiah is not to be of humiliation nor of repentance, but of victory and infinite glory and dominion. He shall sit upon the throne of his father David and make Israel happy forever; he shall have regal power, and be arrayed in glory and splendor. Such, my child, shall be our Messiah, who will gather together all the tribes from all parts of the earth when the trumpet shall be blown. Then there will be a universal gathering together of the Jews, and a return to Jerusalem, the name of which is as dear to us as our very lives, and then once more shall Jerusalem be the beauty and the metropolis of the globe.

"Hold fast, my beloved Isaac, to the religion of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which is our religion. Jehovah-Tsedonth is our God, and He will redeem Israel in his own time and pleasure. Be sure the days of Israel's glory are near."

This was in 1871, but my father's letter did not answer my difficulties; Jehovah certainly will fulfil his word about the reign of Messiah over the earth, and about our beloved city Jerusalem, even as my father had said; this I know, but how was I to be relieved from the distress of soul which had overwhelmed me? I wanted to be saved myself, and such was my despair that I was tempted to doubt whether Messiah had ever come.

In writing again to my father, I expressed my perplexity about the sins of Israel for many generations and the prophecies of the Bible, and then, turning to my own darkness of heart, added these lines, omitting the name of Jesus—

"I heard a voice I knew not say,
'Come unto Me and rest;
Lay down, thou weary one, lay down
Thy head upon My breast.'"

Again I visited Mr. Stern's house. He was not at home, but Mrs. Stern begged me to tell her my business if it were of importance. In broken English I said I wanted to know where to find real satisfaction for my soul—how to please God, and how to obtain the pardon of my sins. She replied with these words, "The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin." 1 John i. 7, I did not at all like what she said, for, despite my misery and my anxieties about the Messiah, I hated the name of Jesus, and treated it with contempt. As I look back upon those days, I am filled with wonder at the infinite mercy and grace of the One whom I hated and despised, and I am amazed that he should be so good to me, and that by his sovereign grace he should now be precious to my heart.

"Jesus, I love Thy charming Name,
'Tis music in my ear;
Fain would I sound it out so loud
That earth and heaven might hear."

Once more I poured out my perplexities to my father:—"Dear Father, in your last letter you say, 'The days of Israel's glory are near——' I remember, when you used to teach me the holy law at school, you said the great day of Israel was nigh, and now, though some years have elapsed, you still say the same. I cannot help thinking Messiah has disappointed Israel.

"If, as you say, with many of our holy and blessed Rabbis, the coming of Messiah be not of humiliation, nor of repentance, but of regal power, how can the writings of the holy prophets be true? Our great prophet Micah says, 'But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto Me that is to be the true ruler in Israel.' Chap. v. 2. Surely Messiah, the temporal ruler of Israel, would not be born in the insignificant village of Bethlehem, but in the glorious city of Israel. Our sublime prophet Isaiah says, 'Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteem him not. Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed.' Chap. liii. 1-5.

"What a mystery is this! If this refers to the Messiah, surely he cannot be a king upon earth arrayed in splendor and glory.

"My mind is full of thoughts about the difficult passages, which seem to upset all the doctrines you taught me.

"Again I read the words, 'Thus saith the Lord the King of Israel, and his Redeemer the Lord of hosts; I am the first, and I am the last; and beside Me there is no God.' Isa. xliv. 6. How can this be? From these words do we not understand that God himself must be the Redeemer? Surely this is a mystery—a wonder of wonders: Oh! that our eyes might be opened, and that we might have revealed to us the infinite and glorious mystery of Messiah!

"You cautioned me against the teaching of Rabbi Stern. Candidly, in the fear of God, I cannot help loving him for the truth's sake. He speaks to my heart, which melts by reason of the tenderness of his teaching. He reads the Bible in the holy Hebrew tongue, and explains it, oh! so sweetly. As he spoke the other day of a holy law, and showed that under it we are under its curse, for its language is obey or perish, I could but weep. He has directed my mind to the character of the Messiah, to his love, tenderness, mercy, sympathy, and compassion, and has repeated to me those words which were spoken by him whom the Christians believe to be the Messiah, 'Come unto Me, all ye that are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' This is just what we need, and for myself, ever since I can remember, I have been weary and worn. Oh, how I long for rest, and to have the realization of the pardon of my sins!

"I pray that Jehovah will send to visit us with His salvation."

My father entered into much correspondence with me. A few sentences from one of his letters I now bring before the reader:

"You refer in your last letter to the tenderness of Mr. Stern's teaching, but remember that the devil always attacks in tenderness, promising nice things. Oh! Isaac, Isaac, beware lest your soul be destroyed by the so-called teaching of the meshumad!

"If the Author of the Christian religion was characterised by the love and mercy of which you speak, your Jewish brethren as a nation, would not have to suffer as they have done. For what persecutions have they not undergone in Spain, France, Italy, England, Germany and Russia? These nations are called Christians. Where is the tenderness of Christians? We in Russia see what their tenderness is! Do not think that whatever appears truthful is of necessity true: the lion may be dressed as a lamb; and the devil can, and often does, appear like a saint.

"Do not despair. Israel's glory is near; Israel soon shall be gathered together. The Messiah will come to reign over his people. Every heavenly blessing be yours."

I could but tell my father that I did not wish to be of the Roman religion, though it might be called Christian, for I had seen enough of that while in Russia, neither would I bow down to images or pictures. None of these things are real Christianity; and here let me ask the true Christian to consider what every devout Jew must think of churches given over to such idolatry, whether the church be in England, Germany, or Russia. It was only the other day a Jew said to me, speaking of a "Protestant" church in this country, "I went into one of your churches, and what did I see? Men dressed up neither in men's nor woman's clothes, with candles, and images, and pictures! Is this your religion?"

The Jew hates idolatry in every form; the teaching of his Bible makes him hate it, and because of the idolatry in many Christian churches, he despises the Christian religion. Not none of these things are true Christianity. I told my father I had found a different kind of Christian religion in England, and one which abhorred idolatry even as does the Jewish religion.

In another letter I said, "Since I last wrote, I have determined to discover the answer to the great question, 'Is Christianity true or not?' and have therefore studied the Bible only, and the result is I am sure, unless Christianity is the true religion, the God of our fathers has not spoken the words of the book we call Holy—the Bible."

"I have been presented, too, with a truly wonderful little book called 'The New Testament.' It gives the life of Joshua the Messiah, and I now say, if Joshua the Messiah has not come, I do not believe he ever will come.

"The whole life of the Nazarene is remarkable. His life was pure and holy. I will gladly send you this book called 'The New Testament,' and you will find his life was wonderful indeed! If you do not believe in the Nazarene, what answers can you give to the miracles he performed?

"Once more I must tell you the feelings of my heart. I am almost a Christian, yet as I write my heart is sad, for I can see you reading this letter, and, filled with sorrow and anger, saying 'Away with Isaac, away with him!' Yet I must speak. The Messiah has come, and I believe in him, and, although our Jewish brethren consider it a disgrace and a shame, I cannot, I must not be ashamed of him.

"I have not yet made a public profession of my faith in him, yet in my heart I believe.

"Please read the book I send you, and examine the Holy Bible. My prayer is that the time may soon come when the veil shall be taken away from the eyes of our beloved nation, and when the words of our holy prophet Zechariah shall be fulfilled, 'They shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son; and shall be in bitterness for Him, as one that is in bitterness for his firstborn.' Ch. xii. 10.

OBITUARY.

BUTT.—At Phelps, Mo., May 7, 1888, of pneumonia, James Butt, aged 49 years, 6 mo., and 0 days.

Bro. Butt leaves a wife and two children, together with a large circle of friends to mourn his loss. He had been a firm believer in conditional immortality, and the coming and kingdom of Christ, and preached the same for many years. We shall miss him, but trust he sleeps in Christ, and we shall see him by and by.

In response to a message, the writer visited his home and spoke to a large assembly of friends and neighbors, of the Christian hope, after which we sang that beautiful song "We shall sleep, but not forever," and laid him away to await the Master's call.

NICHOLS.—Near Heron Lake, Min., on May 5, 1888, of paralysis, Mrs. Sallie D Nichols, aged 66 years, 8 mo., and 21 days.

Some years ago Sister Nichols made a profession of faith in the promises made to Abraham and his seed, since which time she has been a faithful disciple of her Lord, and a constant reader of THE RESTITUTION.

A precious one from us has gone,
A voice we loved is stilled;
A place is vacant in our home,
Which never can be filled.

He lived a just, upright, Christian's life, and died in the blessed hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave. He leaves eight children to mourn his absence, six of whom have bright hopes of meeting him "in the sweet by and by."

NEW EVERY MORNING.

Every day is a fresh beginning;
Every morn is the world made new,
You who are weary of sorrow and sinning,
Here is a beautiful hope for you,
A hope for me and a hope for you.

All the past things are past and over,
The tasks are done and the tears are shed,
Yesterday's errors let yesterday cover;
Yesterday's wounds, which smarted and bled,
Are healed with the healing which night has shed.

Yesterday now is a part of forever;
Bound up in a sheaf, which God holds tight,
With glad days, and sad days, and bad days which never Shall visit us more with their bloom and their blight,
Their fulness of sunshine or sorrowful night.

Let them go, since we cannot relieve them,
Cannot undo and cannot atone!
God in his mercy receive, forgive them!
Only the new days are our own,
Today is ours and today alone.

Here are the skies all burnished brightly,
Here is the spent earth all reborn,
Here are the tired limbs springing lightly
To face the sun, and to sing with the morn
In the chrism of dew and the cool of dawn.

Every day is a fresh beginning,
Listen, my soul, to the glad refrain,
And, spite of old sorrow and old sinning,
And puzzles forecasted, and possible pain,
Take heart with the day, and begin again!

I WILL COME AGAIN.

As there is much doubt in the minds of the ministers of the present day in regard to the second coming of the Lord, I will pen a few lines on that all important subject. First Christ says, "If I go away, I will come again." Also John xiv., "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am ye may be also." During my meetings at Scipioville, Ind., I preached on the subject of the coming of the Lord, also on the promises of God made to our fathers, that the faith once delivered to the saints, was the faith of God's children now, and those promises were made to father Abraham and all of God's children and would be realized in the age to come.

At that meeting one Elder Johnson of the Christian or Campbellite church, of Darlington, Ind., was present, and heard me. When I was through, I said, Elder, have you any remarks to make, and he said, No. But that night he took it upon himself to review me, and at his next meeting he took occasion to name me a few times. From what I heard from some of our brethren these were his remarks at the time. Brother Hatch has been telling the people here that Christ will come literally to this earth, and set up a kingdom. Now, says he, it has been eighteen hundred years since he was here, and we may wait eighteen hundred years longer and still he would not be here, and tried to leave the impression that he never would come. Now Peter says they will say, "Where is the promise of his coming? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation; for this they are willingly ignorant of. What is the promise of his coming? and where is the promise of his coming?

Let us look at some of the promises of his coming. First read Num. xxiv. 17. "I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh; there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a scepire out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab,....out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion." Deut. xxxiii. And he said, the Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from Paran, and he came with ten thousands of his saints; from his right hand went a fiery law for them. Habakkuk iii. 3. God came from Teman and the Holy One from Mount Paran. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. Dan. vii. 13. I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before him, and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him.....And the kingdom and dominion....under the whole heaven was given to the people of the saints of the Most High, and that is to be an everlasting kingdom; no kingdom till Christ comes in the clouds of heaven. Matt. xvi. 27. For the Son of man shall come with his angels; then he shall reward every man. Matt. xxv. 31. When the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory, ....then shall the king say to them on his right hand, come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. 2 Thess. i. 10. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first. See vs. 17; 2 Thess. v. 2, 3; also 2 Thess. i. 9, 10; ii: 19; iii: 13; 1 Peter v. 4; James v. 7. The coming of the Lord draweth near. vs. 8. Rev. i. 7. Behold he cometh with clouds and every eye shall see him. Rev. xxii. 12. And behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me.

I would rather stand with such men as Moses, Habakkuk, Daniel, Christ, Paul, Peter, James, John, and all the good men of ages past, than to stand with Peter's scoffers and Jude's mockers. They will say, "Where is the promise of his coming;" we hear them now all over our land, professed ministers, doing and saying all they can against the coming of our dear Lord and Master. It is time for all of God's people to stand firm in the truth as it is in Jesus. If ever there was a time when darkness covered the earth and gross darkness the people, it is now. The time has fully come when men will not endure sound doctrine. Let us all who are of the day stand firm and unshaken for we know our labor is not in vain in the Lord. J. S. HATCH.

Dear Restitutian:

Let me once more through the columns of THE RESTITUTION speak to the many brethren and sisters scattered. To them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Savior Jesus Christ. Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord. According to his divine power hath given us all things that pertain unto life and godliness through the knowledge of him that has called us to glory and virtue. Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust 2 Peter i, read the whole chapter. Well, dear brethren and sisters I am still in the race. So I press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. I will now give a brief report of my labors in the Master's cause.

On the 29th of March, 1888, I left home and went to Lyon Co., near where Brother William Uptigraff lives. Preached in the Harmony schoolhouse three nights and on the first Sunday in April. Went to the house of Bro. Uptigraff and staid all night. On Monday morning I baptized Mrs. Uptigraff and her daughter into the all-saving name of Jesus. From there I went to see Brother and Sister Samuel Lawrence. Preached at what is called the Indianhill schoolhouse where I preached some ten years ago. There they had some forty members at one time, but the flock is scattered, as the wolf in sheep's clothing got amongst them. Still we have some good brethren and sisters at that place. We had a good turnout for a short notice. I have many good warm friends at that place. I left them on the next day with a promise that I would again make them a visit some time in the future.

Home again. Next I had an appointment at the Grady schoolhouse on Big Creek, where I have preached more or less for fifteen years. But on account of the sickness of my daughter and the death of her infant child, I had to disappoint them at that place. On Friday before the fifth Sunday in April I started on Nahum's chariots for the State of Illinois to a place called Ripley. At that place we met Brother I. Lanning, H. Bowman, and several others. Preached at the house owned by our brother one week every night. The result was that nine souls put on Christ by being immersed into the all-saving name of the anointed Jesus. From there we went to Cooperstown. At that place the Campbellites have a nice cosy building. So they invited us to hold our meeting in their church. We did so; none added. But if I ever enjoyed myself it was at that place. The Campbellites are different there than in any other place I ever have been; all clever and sociable. They only need to take another step to make good Christians. I believe that one-half of them are with us in faith. But the shepherds make them believe that it made no difference what they believed just so they were honest. The devil has never fallen on a better plan than that to deceive the people. Jesus said, To him that overcometh will I grant to set with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on his throne. Rev. iii. 21. He that has an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. Not what the preacher saith to the church; no, hear the Savior. Rev. iii. 22.

Then we must attribute some of the good that was done at that place to a few sisters that stand firm in the faith and let the people know and especially the sects that we have no need of falling out with them as to what they teach; we throw away such as the immortality of the soul, a good man going to heaven at death, a bad man to a suffering, burning hell, church kingdoms, sky and heart kingdoms, their trinitarian God and such monstrosities outside of the Bible only taught by one witness in the Bible, and Jesus said that he was a murderer from the beginning and abode not in the truth because there is no truth in him. John viii. 44. Now go to the beginning, Gen. iii. 4, "Ye shall not surely die." Then tell me that it makes no difference what you believe just so you are honest. How long, O Lord, will these perverters of God's truth be permitted to draw away thy children into the broad and easy road in which many travel together to destruction. So the Savior said, Matt. vii. 13, on the two ways, one the strait, the other the broad. We cannot be in both of these roads, must be either in the one or the other. The second Sunday evening the house was crowded full and all eager to hear the word of eternal life; many of them were anxious for me to come back again to that place, but I fear that will never be, at least if their bell can ring loud enough to keep me out of their house. Good by at Cooperstown to the good sisters at that place, for there are only a few noble sisters there, the men seem to stand back and look on.

On Monday night I spoke again at Ripley, in the church, on the great salvation, to a very attentive audience. Some of the Campbellites did venture out, but they are very shy. At that place we had to baptize some of their members over, or into the Christ of the Bible, and so they are very bitter and say some hard things about our people. They are more noble at Cooperstown than they are at Ripley. Well I pray that God may open their minds so they may yet see the truth. We then sung, "When Jesus comes to reward his servants;" while we sang that we extended the right hand of fellowship to the brethren and sisters that were baptized. Our trip last fall and the one this spring added some fifteen or sixteen to their number. The church is in good running order at that place. Then came the parting hymn, "We are going home when Jesus comes."

The brethren remembered me in their mites; they knew that the iron horse would have to be fed, and that we have to wear clothes just the same as other men; so they remembered me at both places, Cooperstown and Ripley. Thus ended one of the best meetings that I have been to for many a day. Went home with Brother and Sister Lanning and staid all night. On Tuesday Brother Isaiah Lanning conveyed me to Mount Sterling. There I called on Dr. Gray and his pleasant wife, and spent the day with them talking over the blessed gospel and the restitution, as the doctor is adrept in faith, still is no restitutionist, a world-horner. While talking Sister Gray said that the way I taught the restitution she could see some beauty in it, and we all got very much interested in our glorious hope in the blessing of all nations in Abraham and his seed. As Dr. Gray has quite a reputation for curing rheumatism, he concluded that he could cure me of my trouble, asthma. I got one bottle of medicine which he says will cure me up sound and well in three weeks, so I am in good spirits.

At just 8:00 p. m I stepped aboard the chariot and started for the Bluffs. There we changed cars for Hannibal, Mo. The water in the great Mississippi river was angry at Quincy. The river was nearly eight miles wide it was said. At Hannibal it had broken through the levee and water covered the Wabash R. R. to a depth of three feet. Here I was over four hundred miles from home. I began to think that I had seen my family for the last time in this world, and that when I gave the brethren farewell at Cooperstown and Ripley it was a last farewell. Then I looked into the angry Mississippi. Well if I go down there I never will be seen by mortal man any more on earth, no one to tell the story. While the conductor and all the train hands crawled back to the rear end of the cars, I sat silent and looked on the terrible floundering in the water. I raised the window and sat silent not knowing which way we would go. But I said we are in the hand of that God that saved Daniel and the three Hebrew children and the one that could say to the waves and the wind and the sea to be still. But thank God I am again at home with my family. Well we are in the hands of a just and loving God and he will do with us just what is right. Those whom he loves he will chasten in love. Well brethren if it was not for that glorious hope that I have got I would stop right here and go no further. But as I am still in the race for the prize let me run with patience the race set before me, looking unto the author and finisher of all our faith. Pray for me brethren that my faith fail not. May God awaken the brethren to come out from among them, and be ye separate, (2 Cor. vi. 14 to 18,) saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing and I will receive you. And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. Brethren what we do we must do quickly; the Master will soon come, the signs declare him nigh. Wake up you men that are taking an active part in politics, see that you are not on the wrong side when Jesus comes. Let us all be on the Lord's side and pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." That is my politics, that is my prayer. Amen and amen.

THE DANIEL FORERVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 3.

In A. D. 1294, Boniface VIII. became pope, and by his superior audacity he threw into the shade even Innocent III. He deserves to be designated the most usurping of mankind, as witness his bull Unam Sanctam. In this document the full claims of the Papacy come out. We have noticed several ever-increasing stages of Papal assumption already, but now we reach the climax—the claim which, if it were the true one, would abundantly justify all the rest; we reach the towering pinnacle and top-most peak of human self-exaltation. What was the claim of Boniface VIII.? It was that the Pope represents God upon Earth.

As this claim is the most extraordinary and audacious ever made by mortal man, I will state it, not in my own words, but in the words of the highest Papal authority. In the summary of the things concerning the dignity, authority, and infallibility of the pope set forth by Boniface VIII. are these words; "The pope is of so great dignity and excellence, that he is not merely man, but as if God, and the vicar of God (non simplex homo, sed quasi Deus, Et Dei vicarius). The pope alone is called most holy. .....Divine monarch, and supreme emperor, and king of kings.....The pope is of so great dignity and power that he constitutes one and the same tribunal with Christ (fa stat unum et idem tribunal cum Christo), so that whatsoever the pope does seems to proceed from the mouth of God (ab ore Dei)... The pope is as God on earth (Quasi Deus in Terra). That which was claimed by Boniface VIII. in the thirteenth century has been claimed ever since by a succession of popes down to Pius IX. and Leo XIII. in the nineteenth century. The pope speaks today as the vicar of Christ, as God's vicegerent. The great ecumenical council of 1870 proclaimed him such, and declared him to be Infallible! A professor of history in the Roman university, writing on the council of 1870, uses the following language, which strikingly expresses the Roman ideal: "The Pope is not a power among men to be venerated like another. But he is a power altogether Divine. He is the propounder and teacher of the law of the Lord in the whole universe; he is the supreme leader of the nations, to guide them in the way of eternal salvation; he is the common father and universal guardian of the whole human species in the name of God. The human species has been perfected in its natural qualities by Divine revelation and by the incarnation of the Word, and has been lifted up into a supernatural order, in which alone can it find its temporal and eternal felicity. The treasures of revelation, the treasures of supernatural grace upon earth, have been deposited by God in the hands of one man, who is the sole dispenser and keeper of them. The life-giving work of the Divine incarnation work of, wisdom, of love, of mercy, is ceaselessly continued in the ceaseless action of one man, thereto ordained by Providence. This man is the pope. This is evidently implied in his designation itself, the vicar of Christ. For if he holds the place of Christ upon earth, that means that he continues the work of Christ in the world, and is in respect of us what Christ would be if he were here below, himself visibly governing the churches." Note.

Do you hear those words? Do you take them in? Do you grasp the thought which they express? Do you perceive the main idea and central principle of the Papacy? The pope is not simply man, but "as if God" and "the vicar of God," as God on earth. No wonder the sentence is addressed to every pope on his coronation, "Know thou art the father of princes and kings, the governor of the world;" no wonder he is worshiped by cardinals, and archbishops and bishops, by priests and monks and nuns innumerable, by all the millions of Catholics throughout the world; no wonder that he has dethroned monarchs and given away kingdoms, dispensed pardons, and bestowed indulgences, canonized saints, remitted purgatorial pains, promulgated dogmas, and issued bulls and laws and extravagants, laid empires under interdict, bestowed benedictions, and uttered anathemas. Who is like to him on the earth? What are great men, philosophers, statesmen, conquerors, princes, kings, and even emperors of the earth compared with him? Their glory is of the Earth, Earthy; his is from above, it is Divine! He is the representative of Christ, the Creator and Redeemer, the Lord of all. He is as Christ; he takes the place of Christ. He is as God, as God on earth. This blasphemous notion is the keystone of the entire Papal arch; it is the stupendous axis on which the whole Papal world has rotated for ages, and is rotating at this hour. But to complete this very brief sketch of the history of Romanism, I may just remind you that the long and checkered decline of Papal dominion may be dated from the pontificate of Boniface VIII., from the end of the thirteenth century. Early in the next century Clement V. took the strange and fatal step of removing the seat of Papal government from Rome to Avignon, where it remained for seventy years, greatly to the detriment of its authority and power. There it was to some extent dependent on the court of France, and it lost the affections of Italy and the prestige of Rome. Then came the great schism which seriously weakened and discredited the Papacy. Rival popes ruled at Rome and Avignon. Corruption and rapacity, demoralization and disaffection rapidly increased, and then supervened that darkest hour of the night which precedes the dawn. Ere long Wycliffe, the morning star of the Reformation, arose, and at last came the blessed movement itself, with Martin Luther and the rest of the reformers, which delivered Germany, England, and other lands, from the Papal yoke, dividing Christendom into two camps, Romanist and Protestant.

Vainly did Rome seek with frantic efforts to arrest or reverse this movement! Hecatombs of martyrs, oceans of blood, centuries of wars could not stop it. At the beginning of the sixteenth century Rome boasted that not a single heretic could be found; now Christendom contains a hundred and fifty millions of those whom the Papacy calls heretics, and whom it would exterminate with fire and sword if it could. It did succeed in crushing out the Reformation movement in France, Spain, and Italy by awful Inquisition tortures, by bloody massacres, by cruel wars, by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, by the deeds of such men as Philip of Spain with his armada, and the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands. Rome recovered some ground she lost in the Reformation, and she still exercises spiritual power over a hundred and eighty millions of mankind. Though her temporal power was overthrown for a time in the French Revolution, and to the joy of Italy brought to an end in 1870, her claim to it is in no wise abated, nor her pretension that she has a right to rule the world. The religion of Rome has so disgusted the continental nations, that, knowing nothing better, they have drifted into practical infidelity, and with one consent they have to a large extent despoiled the Church of her revenues, secularized her property and her religious houses, and repudiated her interference in their respective governments. For the last five hundred years the authority of the Papacy has been declining, "Slowly and silently receding from their claims to temporal power, the pontiffs hardly protect their dilapidated citadel from the revolutionary concessions of modern times, the rapacity of governments, and the growing aversion to ecclesiastical influence. .....Those who know what Rome has once been are best able to appreciate what she is. Those who have seen the thunderbolts in the hands of the Gregories and the Innocents, will hardly be intimidated at the sallies of decrepitude, the impotent dart of Priam amid the crackling ruins of Troy." So wrote Henry Hallam in the early part of this century; and while the fall of the temporal power has since taken place, and carried to low-water mark that steady ebb-tide of Papal influence which he alleges, yet there has been during the last half century a revival of Romish influence in Protestant nations, which Hallam probably did not expect. I must not pause to estimate the causes or the importance of this revival here, but shall have occasion to allude to it again further on. Let me now propose to you a puzzle. It is to condense into some brief, simple sentences, which could be read in a few minutes, an accurate, graphic, comprehensive summary of the thirteen centuries of Papal history. Milman's "History of Latin Christianity" is here on the table. It occupies nine octavo volumes, and would take weeks to read. Ranke's "History of the Popes" is in three volumes, and does not cover the whole subject. D'Aubigne's "History of the Reformation" is in five volumes, and takes up only one episode of the long story. The Papacy has existed for thirteen centuries, has had to do with forty or fifty generations of mankind in all the countries of Christendom. Its history is frequently extremely complicated and various. It embraces both secular and ecclesiastical matters, and has more or less to do with all that has happened in Europe since the fall of the old Roman Empire. The time is long, the sphere vast, the story exceedingly complex. I want to tell it all, in outline at least, in a narrative that you could read in less than five minutes or write in ten. You must bring in every point of importance; the time and circumstances of the origin of the Papacy, its moral character, its political relations, its geographical seat, its self-exalting utterances and acts, its temporal sovereignty, and a comparison of the extent of its dominions with those of the other kingdoms of Europe; its blasphemous pretensions, its cruel and long-continued persecutions of God's people, the duration of its dominion, its present decay, and the judgments that have overtaken it; and you must moreover add what you think its end is likely to be, and explain the relation of the whole history to the revealed plan of Divine providence. You must get all this in—not in the dry style of an annual Times' summary of the events of the year,—but in an interesting, vivid, picturesque style, that will impress the facts on the memory, so that to forget them will be impossible. Can you do it? I might safely offer a prize of any amount to the person who can solve this puzzle and write this story as I have described. But hard, even impossible, as it would be for you to do this, even if you perfectly knew the history of the last thirteen centuries, how infinitely impossible would it be if that history lay in the unknown and inscrutable future, instead of in the past and present! If no eye had seen, nor ear had heard it; if it was an untraversed continent, an unseen world, a matter for the evolution of ages yet to come—who then could tell the story at all, much less in brief? Now this is precisely what the prophet Daniel, by inspiration of the omniscient and eternal God, has done. He told the whole story of the Papacy twenty-five centuries ago. He omitted none of the points I have enumerated, and yet the prophecy only occupies seventeen verses of a chapter that can be read slowly and impressively in five minutes. This is because it is written in the only language in which it is possible to compress Multum in parvo, the ancient language of the hieroglyphics. God revealed the future to Daniel in a vision by which he saw, not the events, but living, moving, speaking hieroglyphs of the events. These Daniel simply describes, and his description of them constitutes the prophecy written in the seventh chapter of his book. Our consideration of this remarkable prediction we must however postpone for the present, as we have already claimed your attention long enough for one lecture.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 7.

BY DR. J. E. THOMPSON.

TERTIARY OR CENOZOIC AGE.

The Cenozoic age which followed the closing scenes of the Mesozoic in point of creative time, was no less remarkable for its fauna and flora than was its immediate predecessor; and the exact fidelity with which modern research verifies the testimony of God's word is truly astonishing. The Cenozoic creations stand out in bold relief, earth-births, a grand advance in the scale of animal life, above the reptilian productions, water-births, of the former age in type, in structure, in mentality, and in the propagation of their several species, and the care of their offspring. Mammals of gigantic stature, yet approximating those now in existence, possessed the age for age advancement. Enormous quadrupeds, generally of the pachydermatous (thick-skinned) order, and those which are closely allied to such as live at the present day, cropped the green herbage of the warm earth, and garnered in their capacious stomachs the fruitage of plant and tree, or laid down to rest and repose under the wide-spreading branches of fruit-bearing trees, or partook of the waters of the mercanyi-lake, bog and fen that afterwards furnished its tomb, and preserved its remains for examination by paleontologists of a succeeding age.

Succulence of plant, profusion of flower and fruit or grain, afforded an abundance of forage for the animals that thronged hill, valley and plain. The sturdy oak was there for shade and shelter, with its rich harvest of acorns that dropped at maturity from the wide-spreading boughs; the trim, smooth-trunked maple, abounding in its wealth of sap and deep-cut foliage; the stately poplar; the fragrant cinnamon tree; the luscious fig and many others, were all present, and swayed their green heads over the rich carpet of grasses and vegetables, that covered hillside, vale and plateau.

Insects, in countless millions, were propagated in the lowlands and warm waters of lakes, pools, morasses, bogs and fens, and flitted through the evening air,—then as now,—a scourge and horrid pest to animated existence. Beetles, butterflies, ants, crickets, grass-hoppers and dragon-flies pertain to the tertiary deposits. "The honey-bee makes its first appearance in the Eocene division," — "an embalmed corpse," — says Hugh Miller,—"in a crystal coffin."

Such were some of the many diversified forms of the fauna and flora known to have existed during the age under consideration, and its beds have been classified and are known as follows, to-wit:—

1. The Ligulitic, which is superimposed directly upon the chalk of the preceding age, and is known from its strata of light bituminous coal, deposited as far north as the Arctic Ocean, and thence southward to central Colorado, embracing a range of territory bounded by the Missouri river and the Pacific slope. Its beds furnish the early settlers an abundance of fuel, utilized for the necessities of the pioneers in their settlement of the country.

2. The Alabama, with its fossil remains, among which may be seen those of the Zeuglodon (yoke-toothed). This was a whale-like animal attaining to a length of seventy feet, having 118 vertebræ, one single piece of which is a man's load to carry, the remains of which are so plentiful in some of the southern States as to admit of their being used in fencing the fields, as well as in the manufacture of lime.

(These two divisions are known to the Europeans under the single title of Eocene [dawn of recent life] Period and their strata reach a thickness of 2650 feet, with about three and one-half per cent. of present existing fauna found in it. The flora was profuse, embracing hickory, maple, oak, poplar, and other fruit and forest trees of our knowledge, as is shown by the lignite deposits of the earlier eras.)

3. The Yorktown, corresponding in point of classification with the Miocene (less recent) Period of Lyell and others, which contains an average of 25 to 30 per cent. of the fauna at this time in existence. Its strata, in some localities, consists of clay interstratified with imperfect lignites, and, in others, of layers of coken, lignites and bituminous deposits. The Mull beds, of the Hebrides, in the county of Argyle, Scotland, are 121 feet thick. In India it yields "the remains of a mammoth, elephant, giraffe, hippopotamus, and a large ostrich, besides several carnivora, monkeys, crocodiles and a large tortoise whose shell measured twenty feet across. The European beds contain the remains of dinotherium." Library of Universal Knowledge.)

4. The Sumter, or Pliocene of Sir Chas. Lyell, is the name given to the section lying uppermost in the tertiary or cenozoic group, which yields 60 to 70 percent of living species, in its strata. In England the Suffolk beds are, composed of shelly sand and are known under the local name of "crag," of which two divisions are recognized, viz., 1. The Red Crag, fifty feet in thickness; and 2. The Coralline Crag, also fifty feet thick. The former consists of "quartzose sands and gravel with a mixture of shells" of a reddish color, and the latter, of "shells and polyzoa, separated in some places by thin layers of hard limestone, and coral-like masses which occupy the position in which they lived," (Lib. Un. Know.) and is readily recognized by its whiteness. Among the fossils of the former are "the teeth and bones of sharks, skates and other fish and the ear-bones of one or more true whales;" in the latter, "conus, oliva, mitra, voluta, and pyrula," besides the polyzoa and echini already spoken of. The language of inspiration is, "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle and creeping thing and beast of the earth after his kind and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God said that it was good. And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him: male and female created he them."

No less plain is the language of science in relation to cenozoic age-work. Says Hugh Miller, "The Tertiary Period had also its prominent class of existences. Its flora seems to have been no more conspicuous than that of the present time; its reptiles occupy a very subordinate place; but its beasts of the field were by far the most wonderfully developed, both in size and numbers, that ever appeared upon the earth. Its mammoths, and its mastodons, its rhinoceri and its hippopotami, its enormous dinotherium and colossal megatherium, greatly more than equalled in bulk the largest mammals of the present time, and vastly exceeded them in number. The remains of one of its elephants (elephas primigenius) are still so abundant amid the frozen wastes of Siberia that what have been not inappropriately called "ivory quarries' have been wrought among for their bones for more than a hundred years."....And with this ancient elephant there were mostly associated in Britain, as on the northern continents generally all around the globe, many other mammals of corresponding magnitude. "Grand indeed," says an English naturalist, "was the fauna of the British islands in those early days. Tigers as large again as the biggest Asiatic species lurked in the ancient thickets; elephants of nearly twice the bulk of the largest individuals that now exist in Africa or Ceylon, roamed in herds; at least two species of rhinoceros forced their way through the primeval forest; and the lakes and rivers were tenanted by hippopotami as bulky, and with as great tusks, as those of Africa. The massive cave-bear and large cave-hyena belonged to the same formidable group, with at least two species of great oxen (Bos longifrons and Bos Primigenius), with a horse of smaller size, and an elk (Megaceros Hibernicus) that stood ten feet and four inches in height. Truly this Tertiary age,....was peculiarly the age of great beasts of the earth after his kind, and of cattle after their kind.' The mammals of its early oceans ages were comparatively small in bulk and low in standing; in its concluding ages, too, immediately ere the appearance of man, or just as he had appeared, they exhibited, both in size and number a reduced and less imposing aspect. It was chiefly in its latter and middle,....that the myriads of its huger giants, its dinotheria, mastodons and mammoths encumbered the soil." Tuskin, of the Rocks.

"Over the plain," says Mr. Steele, in his work on geology, "gallops a troop of wild horses; zebras scamper through the bushes; and flocks of birds sing in the branches of the willows that border a neighboring brook. Everywhere wander great, unwieldy quadrupeds. Here is a solitary megatherium—a gigantic sloth—standing on his massive hind legs and propped up by his huge tail, which makes a sure tripod support. See, he slowly reaches out his muscular arms, draws down branches and young trees, and lazily feeds on their tender foliage. Yonder is a herd of mammoths with long curved tusks, broad flapping, leathern ears, large as a blacksmith's apron, and legs like fleshly pillars. Now they feed along the bank, now they trumpet shrilly to their companions in the forest, whose responses sound like distant thunder, and now they go crashing through the woods, tearing down trees for sport, and leaving the branches strewn over the ground as if a hurricane had passed. Fierce beasts abound. A drove of wild oxen of colossal strength, maned and shaggy, feed over the meadow, and troops of hyenas prowl about, waging relentless war on all the weaker tribes. Hark! the yelping of dogs. A pack of hounds are on a hunt. The herd of wild horses catch the dreaded sound, snort with fear, toss their manes, and go flying off like the wind, with their gaunt pursuers in full chase. Scarcely have they disappeared when a drove of camels stalk deliberately down to the water's edge, and while they drink (as only camels can), a troop of monkeys, chattering in the branches overhead, with solemn grimaces, mock the gravity of their slow, awkward movements."

"Cattle and beasts of the field," writes Hugh Miller, "graze on the plains; the thick-skinned rhinoceros wallows in the marshes; the squat hippopotamus rustles among the reeds, or plunges sullenly into the river; great herds of elephants seek their food amid the young herbage of the woods; while animals of fiercer nature, the lion, the leopard, and the bear, harbor in deep caves till the evening, or lie in wait for their prey amid tangled thickets or beneath some broken bank. At length as the day" (the age, J. K T.), "wanes and the shadows lengthen, Man, the responsible lord of creation, formed in God's own image, is introduced upon the scene." Testimony of the Rocks.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weather.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

THE GLORIOUS APPEARING.

Among the blessed teachings of grace in reference to the salvation wrought out for us by our Lord, the Apostle Paul, in writing to Titus, places this. "Looking for that blessed hope, the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ." Titus ii. 13. A consideration of this joyous prospect may serve to quicken our faith and animate our joy.

There are three definite and distinct appearings of our Lord spoken of in Scripture. They are all referred to in the ninth chapter of Hebrews; the first is past, and is set forth in verse 26; then in verse 24 we read, "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." This refers to the present, and points to the position he occupies while absent from earth, hidden from mortal sight within the veil; but in vs. 28 we read, "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." It is to this latter, future, and nearing manifestation our subject, as set forth by Titus, alludes. Christ is gone into heaven only for a time; so soon as this present dispensation of faith has passed away he will again be revealed to sight, in order that the earth, which as yet has only been the scene of his humiliation and suffering, may be the sphere of his glory and complete triumph over all the works of the devil. Hence we read in Acts iii. 20, "He shall send Jesus Christ, who before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began." There is nothing more sure and certain than the fact that Christ shall come again, and be made manifest as the King of kings and Lord of lords. As surely, and as personally, as he came the first time to suffer and to die, shall he come the second time "to reign, and to prosper on the earth."

The second advent is as much a part of God's purpose as the first, and is essential to the completeness of that redemption which he came to obtain. No spiritual influence connected with the gospel dispensation, however widespread or blessed it may be, can answer the great ends of his promised appearing in the glory of his kingly power, nor can anything he does in heaven as the Aaronic Priest within the veil, or as seated on his Father's throne on high, answer to, take the place of, or render needless, his Melchisedek priesthood, as the one who is to be "a Priest upon the throne," in the day when "He shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."

This glorious appearing of Christ is the great object of Christian hope, the polo-star which steers and guides the earnest watchers whose place it is during the night of this age to watch for the dawn of the coming day. Grace teaches us that here we are only strangers and sojourners, called to be followers of our Lord in his rejection by the world, and to suffer with him, treading the same path of self-sacrifice and consecration to the Father's will he so constantly and perfectly pursued. He assures all who faithfully do so that, if they suffer with him, they shall also reign with him; sharing his cross, they shall share his crown; thus animating their hearts with hope and inspiring them with courage to do battle with every foe, and to resist steadfastly all that impedes their course. It is well for us, therefore, to have a clear knowledge of the hope set before us in the gospel, and to acquaint our minds with Scripture teaching on a subject so closely allied with our present experience and future prospects as "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ."

Let us consider this appearing in reference to the glory of Christ, which shall then be revealed. The Revised Version, instead of "the glorious appearing," reads, "the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ." Hitherto the world has only beheld his humiliation, "He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not." Once, for a brief space, the veil was withdrawn, and to the favored three, Peter, James and John, a glimpse was given of his glory; they were allowed to be eyewitnesses of his majesty, when they were with him in the holy mount," so that they were enabled to make known with certainty "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." But full soon the splendid vision passed away, and gave place to revelations of the sufferings and death their Lord was to undergo at Jerusalem. After his resurrection no eyes saw him but those of disciples and chosen witnesses. He appeared at intervals to those who knew and loved him, by many infallible proofs assuring them that he had risen, and then ascended to heaven without making any sign or manifestation of his kingly glory or power. The men of Galilee who watched his ascension were comforted as he vanished from their sight by the promise that, "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven," and went their way to learn that the glory which he was to have in accordance with the predictions of the Old Testament was to follow (not precede) this present dispensation of faith during which their Lord would be hidden from view, remaining absent from the earth until the time should come for his glory to be revealed.

Then too shall the glory of his kingdom be revealed. The kingdom and the church have often been confounded, one with the other, as though they were one and the same, but Scripture does not so speak of them. The prophets of the Old Testament continually set before us a far different state of things, under the reign of Christ, to that which obtains in connection with the church. The era of Solomon is typical of a time far brighter than any that has been known upon the earth, or that can be known while "the King of Glory" is absent." Psalm lxxii. brings before us a King and a kingdom of which Solomon's palmiest days were but a shadow and figure. Israel shall under his sway be no longer scattered and peeled, but regathered, restored to divine favor, and made a blessing and a praise in all the earth.

In that day he who is now rejected and disowned by the vast majority in every land shall be universally adored, and his "name be set up for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek, and his rest shall be glorious." It is for this we are taught to pray, saying, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Glory beyond compare shall then be seen upon the Son of Man, the ruler whose coming shall be bright "as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, a morning without clouds, as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." These shall all that God has decreed for men in connection with the work of Christ be accomplished, and his solemn oath be performed, "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."

But we must turn from this part of our subject to consider what is the attitude grace teaches us to maintain in reference to this bright appearing of our Lord. It is to be cherished by us as a blessed hope. Hope is one of the three chiefest of the Christian graces, and is as important to the completeness of the Christian character as faith or love. It is designed to comfort and soothe in the midst of sorrow and trial ever incident to mortal life. Its province is to soar beyond things seen and temporal, and to rejoice in the things not seen and eternal. It animates the heart and nerves the soul for conflict and endurance, and by its ever-increasing confidence and assurance, begotten of experience, it enables the believer to sing and triumph even though the clouds be dark and all surroundings adverse. The object of our hope is clearly defined to be one and distinct in its nature, "We are called in one hope of our calling," so that there need be no mistake as to what is for us we are to be yearning after and aspiring to. The teaching of our text is uniform with that of the New Testament throughout. The appearing of the Lord, his return in glory and to power to reign as King of kings, and Lord of lords, is the one sure and blessed and and consummation to which we are to look forward. Not death, or its results to the unclothed spirit, not heaven in the technical sense of the word, but Christ himself; perfect salvation is only attained when he appears.

We are to be looking for this blessed hope. The words are significant and suggestive. They denote eager desire. We do not look for that for which we have but little concern, or on which we set little value. Well may we long for the appearing of our Lord; all that is brightest and best in our calling and destiny as believers depends upon it, is attained when it takes place. One of the truest tests of our regard for the Savior is found in this, if our hearts are full of faith in him, and of joy in his service, we shall "love his appearing," the period of his absence will be to us a season of earnest longing for his return; while if we are, on the other hand, taken up with the world, and living to ourselves, we shall have little desire for his coming, being consciously unready to meet him. Diligent preparation is also involved in looking for his return. What manner of persons ought those to be who expect his speedy approach? The only fitting reply is found in the words of 2 Peter iii. 14, "Wherefore, beloved, seeing ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless." This "blessed hope" is intended to exert a holy influence upon our hearts and lives, kindling a flame of sacred devotion, and arousing to zeal and fidelity in every sphere of life. It is impossible to cherish it and be careless, worldly, and half-hearted, for "every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." May the Holy Spirit so reveal Christ in us, "the hope of glory," that under its blissful inspiration we may indeed "live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world."—W. Fuller Gooch, M. A., in Christian Herald.

BISHOP CHATARD ON "TEMPORAL POWER AND THE PAPACY."

The article with the above title, in the May number of the Forum, from the hand of an American Catholic prelate, is significant in that it is an expression of the evident revival, at this hour, among Catholics of the hope that the pope will ere long be restored to his temporal throne.

The loss of the Roman States was a terrible blow to the papacy and to the Catholic world. The supreme Pontiff has never for a moment been reconciled to this loss, nor given up his claims and hopes of temporal sovereignty; and in this all real papists, clergy and laymen, fully sympathize with them.

This inspiration of new hopes in the pope and church that the papal government will soon be restored to Rome, and perhaps in all the former pontifical States, is easy of explanation.

The notion of the divinely given right of universal supreme spiritual dominion—a dominion that allies to itself and holds in subjection the temporal rule of the world—has through long ages so deeply fixed themselves in the ambitions and doctrines, in the whole system of thought and action, of the papal church, that it can no longer think of existing without such dominion, which has for ages constituted the very life, the power and the glory of Rome. Amid all the mighty changes of the spiritual, the political and civil order of things in the Christian world, this vast papal hierarchy has remained the same, unchanged in its constitutions, its awful claims of power over the souls of men, its boundless earthly ambitions and its modes of action. It has never yielded, and will never yield, a jot or tittle of its pretensions to power; it gives up only to superior restraining force; and then always with protests and maledictions. In all that is characteristic of it, the papacy of today is the papacy of the Middle Ages; if it does not do what it did then, it is only because it cannot. The church of the Syllabus of 1864 is the church of Pope Hildebrand in faith and spirit. Therefore the papacy feels that it can not live without temporal power; and believing with the fierce tenacity of blind fanaticism that God will give it the victory over all its enemies, and trusting with supreme confidence in its skillful, oft-tried diplomacy, and the political power of the church among the nations, it interprets every favorable sign in the political and social heavens as the day-dawn of its restoration to its ancient power in the world.

The "sign of promise," which has cheered the supreme hierarch with the hope that he will ere long again ascend his lost throne, is the comforting assurances of respect and sympathy he has received in these last days from the potentates of the earth, on whom his eager eyes are always fixed. In this the papal church differs from the Church of Christ, which does not "trust in princes," and does not enter into diplomatic relations with them. The Vatican has been greatly elated, and with it the whole Catholic world, by the recognition received by Leo XIII. during his Jubilee from Protestant rulers, including the President of the United States. Bishop Chatard, and the Catholics everywhere, have called the world's attention to this homage rendered the Pope by "Protestant nations," as they say, and have interpreted it as signifying the desire and readiness of the world, "of statesmen," to see the Pontiff restored to his temporal power.

But really this plea that the pope must have a temporal throne in order to enable him to rule the Catholic Church is the most overwhelming judgment against this church. It proves that in its constitution, life and habits it is wholly a contradiction to the church of God as portrayed in the New Testament, and in contradiction also to all that is best in the world today. If the Roman Church can not live its own proper life without a temporal throne, without coming into perpetual collision with the governments of the nations, without needing constantly the powerful aid of a vast, cunning, intricate bargaining diplomacy—it can not be in any sense whatever a Christian church, much less "the elect spouse of our Lord." "My kingdom is not of this world," said Jesus; "if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews; and now is my kingdom not from hence."

The papacy is a political institution, its church constantly absorbed in politics; the pope demands a temporal throne, and an army to fight for him. Even now he has a military guard.

Bishop Chatard cities Article XVII. of the law of guarantees enacted by the Italian government for the pope, as an outrage on the pope's liberty and rights. This article ordains that "In case of a conflict between the civil and ecclesiastical powers, the supreme civil tribunal of the kingdom shall decide." This is the spirit of the law in all free countries—ours of course included. It establishes that the ecclesiastical authority is not to be independent of the civil, and ignore and over-ride it; that religious bodies can not try by their ecclesiastical laws its members and arbitrarily impose pains and penalties upon them, or shield them from the law of the land; that all persons are alike under the control as well as the protection of the civil law. The article cited denies to the Catholic Church the privilege of the ecclesiastical forum, this abominable relic of the tyrannous papal Church of the past, but which is yet so fondly cherished by Rome and was so zealously advocated and tenaciously claimed by Pius IX. in his Syllabus.

As this is a capital matter, one of the most extensive features in the Roman Church, and but little understood or even known by the many, we shall devote a special article to it.—C. L. L., in Christian Standard.

To the Faithful in Christ Greeting.

The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light. Rom. xiii.

Never since these words of inspiration were given were they so full of meaning, as imperative an admonition as today. Never was the long, dark, weary night of Gentile darkness, of weary watching and waiting, and longing and praying, so far spent, so near an end. O, how the heart yearns to see the King appear in his beauty. But this is not enough. My brother, my sister, there is an important work for each of us to do, a work that cannot be done by proxy. Each and every one must work out their own salvation. Phil. ii. 12. Not independent of Christ, no, no, but in God's appointed way which is by exercising faith in him, as the only name given under heaven or among men whereby we can be saved. What are we to do? We are to "cast off the works of darkness;" and O what a load to cast off, but assuredly we cannot carry them into the kingdom. What are they? Are they not those things which lead us away from the light of life? are they not, "the lust, or desires of the flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life" for we read that these "are not of the Father but of the world and the world passeth away," and it will carry all these things with it, down to silence and hades. The works of darkness. The temptation to become rich in this world's treasures seems stronger now than in any past age. As Israel of old wanted to have a king who would visibly lead them to battle like other nations, one who would go in and out before them, so today with the professed church of the living God, there seems to be too much of a desire to appear "like other people in all the relations of life. The desire of the flesh must be gratified in looking like other people, not only to look like them, but to eat and drink those things which tend neither to physical health nor godliness.

Riches is surely the pride of this age. Humanity universal is on the race for the mighty dollar, yet we are plainly told in the word that "they that would be rich fall into temptation and a snare of the adversary." O that the church might awake and put on the whole armor of light! When in olden times the soldier put on his entire armor there was no mistaking who he was. Wherever he went it told in very truth whose servant he was, and too that he was to fight whatever foe came in his path. If we put on the whole armor of light, it will be just as manifest to the outside world whose servants we are, nor will they be surprised that we are constantly found contending for the faith, fighting the good fight of faith, that in the coming age we may lay hold of eternal life. Surely the day is at hand. The signs of the times indicate that the Judge, the Ruler of the coming age, standeth at the door. Are we ready to enter into the joy of our Lord, or are we drifting down the tide of time with the busy throng who know only the god of this world, and who desire not and seek not the life to come? The war cloud in the East seems gathering; the cry of peace and safety cannot and does not smother the clanging noise of machinery making ready for war. The "day of his preparation" seems even now here, and it is ours to lift up our heads, knowing that redemption is nearer now than when we first believed. Let us therefore watch and be sober, resting only on the word of truth which is able to make us wise unto salvation.

To the Loved and Loving, the Watching and Waiting Ones.

Husband and I were thinking and talking of the cause of Christ today, and of the loved ones, so many of them, that we would like to meet once more, of the good meetings we have had in Indiana and Michigan, and he says perhaps the brethren would like to hear from us; and so while he is lying on the lounge we will both talk to you a little while. Twice of late the Elder has had loud whispers from our common enemy, death. Four weeks ago while coming from his appointment at Millbrook, he was severely injured by a flying piece of steel. For two weeks he was laid up and suffered much pain. He was just getting nicely over that when he fell from an apple tree which he was trimming. He fell backward a distance of perhaps fifteen feet, striking on his head and left shoulder. In falling his foot caught in the fork of the tree, breaking the fall and undoubtedly saving his life. He was bruised and strained badly and has suffered very much pain since. He has neuralgia now which keeps him about sick, but we thank God that it is as well as it is with us. My health is much improved and I pray God I may soon be able to go into the work again.

But it is good to know that while we cannot always be engaged in just the work we would choose, there is plenty of work to do, none need be idle, nay, no child of God can be idle. There is always some work to do somewhere. Little lambs of the flock to be nourished and cherished; there are the daily walks of life filling up with deeds of love, if we are doing our duty, little helps given to the tired discouraged ones. Feed my lambs was a beautiful thought of the dear Christ, was a beautiful work left for the impulsive Peter to perform; and while he spoke to Peter on that far off Galilean shore, let us catch the echo of his words and hasten to feed the lambs also. With what shall they be fed? Dry husks? Long lessons in theology? Beautiful stories of a false religion? Shall we hold out glowing hopes of eternal life outside of hope in Christ? No, no! God help us to bring ourselves to the thoughts and wants of his flock. With what did Peter feed them? It will be safe for us to venture on the same kind of material he used; but how dangerous to teach any other gospel. The apostles cheered each other and their followers also, with the bright and glorious hope of a crown of righteousness at the second coming of Christ, not one venture out of that path into heaven or paradise at death, for he knew that to be false. They strengthened each other with love and good works, being willing to suffer for the cause of Christ, to carry the marks of their suffering for what they held sacred. How many of us, loved ones, are carrying one mark of the wounds made on the body of Christ? Are we wounded for his cause and bear it patiently? Then we have one mark for him in our bodies. Are we patient through suffering, believing he doeth all things well? Another scar then; covered and lightened by God's love, we must be willing to be made perfect through suffering, if we will inherit with our suffering Lord; purified and tried, made white and ready if we would reign with him. How many of us are ready to stand the test? Labor on beloved ones, be patient, and coming off victorious, a crown of righteousness, a white robe of purity, a mingling with all the pure and true, and a home in the kingdom is ours to enjoy forevermore. You waiting and hoping.

MARY A. WOODWARD.

P. S. Since writing the above, a week has passed, and the Elder has improved sufficiently to attend to some of his ministerial duties. Yesterday he drove over to Moline, preached twice, and baptised four believers, Brother Ralph Pomeroy and wife, Sister McMillen, and Sister Ella Whitsum; their husbands were baptised about one year ago. The little church at Moline is doing well, an this addition to their number is encouraging to them. M. A. W.

THE RESTITUTION.

A. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 4, 1888.

We have now reached the middle of the year, with a much fairer prospect for good crops generally than was anticipated early in the spring. Many subscriptions expire at this time, and we hope all will find themselves well enough pleased with our paper to promptly renew. God has given the sunshine and the showers of blessing that have perfected the harvest for the garner of the husbandman, and it is now for those that have been blessed of him in their basket and their store to do something for his cause in return. Editorially we say to one and all our friends and patrons, that religious papers can only live through the constant and energetic aid of believers in the truths advocated in their columns; and we know this to be emphatically true of THE RESTITUTION.

THE three items following are noteable indications of events that—with others of like character—mark our eventful age. The Jewish race are yet to act a most conspicuous part in the closing scenes of this age. Everything therefore connected with their current history becomes important to the student of prophecy. Another sign of our times of a no less important character is the general circulation of the Scriptures. See Matt. xxiv. 14. Then a few Romanists are leaving that modern Babylon that is now nearing her fiery doom—a doom no less overwhelming than befel the cities of the plain for their intolerable iniquities. Read Revelations chapters xvii. and xviii.; also xix. 1-3. If these twenty-five could have embraced the glorious gospel in its simplicity it would have been better but a few steps out of Sodom are better than nothing.

In a single Protestant Episcopal church in this city there were twenty-five communicants received at the last confirmation who had been baptized in the Roman Catholic communion.

A foreign item announces the very comedy of history, that two Jews of Baghdad have purchased Babylon, and now own all that remains of the palaces and hanging gardens of the city where Daniel was thrown in the den of lions, and Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego into the fiery furnace.

The Canadian Christian Guardian says: Now that the translation of the Bible into the Japanese has been completed, Western civilization has given its choicest gift to the people of Japan. At a time when that great empire is in the midst of a keen awakening, it is impossible to overestimate the importance which the presentation of Christianity will have on its moral and religious future. Just now the higher classes of Japanese are in a mental attitude both inquiring and receptive, acutely perceiving the inferiority of their own institutions, and eager to welcome the superior models of the West. The religion which this people now adopts will determine, more than any other cause, the future position and character of the nation. The great gift of the Holy Scriptures in Japanese is peculiarly timely. Rev. Dr. Hepburn, an American missionary, has just finished the translation, and a meeting has been held at Tokio to commemorate it. Japanese scholars have assisted in the work, and the result is a version in pure language intelligible to the masses.

My Dear Brother in Jesus:

Thanks for the kindness of sending to me your excellent paper, THE RESTITUTION. I find in it a great many interesting readings, and some truths that I never thought of. Truly the truth that was once delivered to the saints makes us free in deed and in truth. Truth gives us power to fight the good fight against the abominable views of all protesting against the truth. Truth leads us in the way of light that shineth more and more, by the truth grace and peace can be multiplied in our hearts. Some think that they have the spirit of God and at the same time they are fighting against the truth and are not willing to receive the truth that God reveals to his obedient children. Truly if we have the Spirit of God we will have the truth, for the Spirit leads us into all the truth" as Christ tells us, and we will love the truth, sacrifice for the truth, fight for the truth, stand for the truth, with the truth and stand in the truth, and at last ours will be the victory through Jesus Christ.

During some weeks past a great many outside of this city have been interested in the truth and have come in talk and talk more about the subject. A great many of them were in a terrible state about the knowledge of God and of his Son Jesus Christ, and some of them told me, "Pastor S., I tell you honestly, I don't know what I worship." Others told me that they were in darkness about God. Others told me that God is spirit, wind, air, breath, and hence they worship wind, air and breath like the pantheist. Why so, I ask them? So we are taught by some who profess to hold the faith of Jesus and of his apostles. Now will you please tell us or preach to us a sermon on God. I answer I am ready to do it gladly and for Jesus' sake, for he came to give us an understanding about God, but people are afraid to search the Bible fearing they will lose honor among men and be persecuted for the truth, but I fear not, for God is my protector and I will tell all the knowledge I have for him.

My text I took from Acts xvii. 23, "The Unknown God," unknown to the worldly, unknown to those who love sin, seek honor from men, etc. God gave us two books which tell us about him. Which are these two books? The first is, Nature, the Universe, i. e., heaven and earth. This is the oldest book that tells us about him; that he is the Creator of all things, visible and invisible. Illustrations have been given against infidelity, that this earth etc. was not created by itself as some of the present evil age dare to say. The second book is the Bible; this tells who he is. This leads me to make the following propositions:

I. Nature and the Bible tell us that there is a God who made all things. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things? Now compare nature and the Bible. Gen. i. 1; Psa. viii. 3; xix. 1; xxxiii. 6; Prov. iii. 19; Isa. xl. 12-18, 21, 22, 25, 26; xlv. 18.

II. Nature and the Bible tell us that his existence is from everlasting to everlasting. Look for a moment how God has controlled and is controling the universe from the beginning till now and will from now till the end. Truly he faintoth not, neither is weary, and there is no searching of his understanding." Now let us see what the Bible tells us about his existence, "From everlasting to everlasting thou art God." "The Lord shall endure forever." "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not." He has immortality. See Psa. lx. 7; xc. 2; Job xxxvi. 26; Isa. xl. 28; Deut. xxxiii. 27; 1 Tim. i. 17; vi. 15, 16; Psa. civ. 31.

III. Nature and the Bible tell us about his personality. The heavens and the earth, the sun, moon and the stars are not made by the winds or air or breath, but by the mighty hand of God. It is said God created heaven and earth, not the wind created; the wind was made by him who is above all, in all and for all. The Bible tells us plainly that he has image and likeness. Gen. i. 26, 27; v. 1; ix. 6; Col. i. 15, and Christ is "the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person" the apostle tells. Heb. i. 3. Still further we read:

1. The eyes of the Lord are upon the saints. Psa. xxxiv. 15; xxxiii. 18; 2 Chron. xvi. 9; Prov. xxii. 12. If he has no eyes how can he see us?

2. The ears of the Lord are open unto the cry of his people. Psa. xxxiv. 15; etc.

3. The mouth of the Lord. Num. xii. 8; Isa. xxx. 27.

4. The arms and hands of God. Deut. xxxiii. 27; Psa. lxxxix 13; viii. 3.

5. The feet of the Lord. Psa. xviii. 9. viii. 3.

6. The breath of the Lord. Isa. xxx. 28, etc.

7. The soul of the Lord. Isa. i. 14.

Has he then body? Read the following texts please. Gen. xciii. and xix. Ex. xxxiii. 20-23; Num. vi. 25; Psa. xxxi. 10; cxix. 85; lxvii. 1; lxxx. 3, 7, 19; Matt. v. 8; Rev. xxii. 4. Now let us see the next. His body is spiritual, holy, incorruptible, immortal, glorious.

IV. Nature and the Bible tell us that he is unchangeable. He is the same yesterday, today and forever. His power in the same as he has ever controlled the universe from the beginning so he does now—think of it!

If Protestant theology tells us that God is changeable, as he wants so he makes himself," let us see what God himself tells us about it, for his word is truth and shall abide forever and by the word we all will be judged. Listen now, "I am the Lord, I change not." Mal. iii. 6; James i. 17. What do we with Protestant mythical theology? This will lead me to the next:

V. The habitation of God. Protestants tell us that God is everywhere; how is this? How can it be? Is not this against common sense? Is not this against the founder of our faith when he tells us plainly where his habitation of God is? Jesus said in his Master's prayer, "Our Father which art in heaven," (not everywhere). See Matt. vi. 9; Psa. xi. 4; John xx. 17; Micah v. 2. Although he is there yet he sees us and knows us. Psa. xxxiii. 13; Heb. iv. 13. The time will come when we shall see him face to face. Matt. v. 8; Rev. xxi. 3, 8; xxii. 4. Then we shall be perfect and with immortal and glorified bodies. God is in heaven, like the sun, but the light shineth over the earth, so his power (the Spirit) is poured everywhere on earth, to comfort us and to lead us in the path of the Lord; then it is not God that is found everywhere, but the spirit (the power) of God. This is in harmony with the Bible and nature.

Objections:

1. God is Spirit. John iv. 24.

2. The angels are Spirit. Heb. i. 7, 14.

3. Christ is called "quickening Spirit." 1 Cor. xv. 45.

What means here the word Spirit? Read carefully 1 Cor. xv. 40, and you will understand it plain. Can Spirit be seen? Luke xxiv. 39; Gen. xix. 1; John xx. 11, 12; Rev. xxii. 8. The word spirit denotes also sometimes personality. "Try the spirits." 1 John iv. 1. "Preach unto the spirits in prison." 1 Peter iii. 19. This shows plainly that the word spirit in John iv. 24, Heb. i. 7, 14, and 1 Cor. xv. 45 can be taken for "spiritual" as 1 Cor. xv. 40. Also for person; let the reader think for himself on this point and determine for himself.

VI. The true knowledge of God and Jesus is necessary before we obtain life eternal, "for this is life eternal that they might know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ," etc. John xvii. 3; Heb. xi. 6; 2 Peter i. 2; 1 Chron. xxviii. 9.

VII. The end of those that reject the true knowledge of God. 2 Thess. i. 8.

After I delivered the discourse all my hearers thanked me and many of them were brought to the true knowledge of God and were astonished to see where they have been kept in that darkness. Several priests of the Greek church were convinced about the true knowledge and personality of God. We praise God for the light given unto us, and we wait daily on him for still greater light. Since, I have delivered discourses on the nature of man, the state of the dead, the end of the wicked, not terminating in hell fire, but destruction, etc.

Some of your readers of THE RESTITUTION have asked me, what do I think or believe on "the restoration of the Jews"? To this point I will answer by and by after I take a thorough study of my Bible and then I will know better what to say, but not till then. There is light to come on this point and on others, our hearts are open, we are not sectarian, but thank and praise God for light and truth. We hold not the truth under a bushel as some do; this is not honesty. The apostolic counsel is, "Preach the word," Preach the truth and fear not, for I am with thee to deliver thee.

We have been tried of late terribly by our enemies, yet we praise God that his grace is sufficient for me. After two months, if God will, we expect to make a long missionary journey all over Macedonia and part of Bulgaria, where we expect to baptise some and to organize a little Association of believers of life in Jesus and through Jesus, given unto them that shall endure unto the end. Love to all the saints. Pray for us and forget us not. I am yours in the blessed hope of meeting by and by and be with the King of Zion for ever, amen. Praise ye the Lord.

BASIL STEPHANOFF.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM IN SCOTLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

The following newspaper report of a pilgrimage in worthy of notice as indicating the present unchanged position of Roman Catholicism in several important points. I reserve a few remarks as a sequel to the report:

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC PILGRIMAGE TO IONA.

OBAN, Wednesday night.—The Roman Catholic pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Columba was accomplished to-day under the most favorable auspices. Most of the pilgrims were astir as early as four o'clock in the morning, attending service in the Pro-Cathedral previous to embarkation. From 4:45 to half-past five the streets of Oban were alive with strangers hurrying from the hotels to the quay where the Grenadier was lying, which was to convey the party to the island. The sodden condition of the roads told of heavy rains overnight, and the feelings of the company were rather damped by a drenching shower which fell as the boat was making up its complement. Hopeful pilgrims, however, pointed joyously to a brilliant rainbow which for a brief period lit up the leaden sky and proclaimed a beautiful day. Soon the hills in the south were clipped with a gold and watery sunlight, and when the Grenadier, with fully 500 souls on board, cast off her moorings, the spirits of the company, which had fallen to zero, rose with leaps and bounds. Six o'clock had been fixed as the hour for departure, and punctually to the minute the Grenadier left the quay, but waited in the bay till her consort, Glencoe, had taken aboard the rest of the pilgrims. After lying-to for nearly a quarter of an hour, the Grenadier again ran alongside the quay, and the remainder of the passengers, to the number of about a dozen, were transferred from the other vessel. This was accomplished with as little delay as possible, and the pilgrims were soon under weigh for "the blessed isle." Before a quarter of a mile had separated them from the landing-stage, a little boat was seen to put off, manned by a couple of rowers, and having aboard some six or eight of the party who had overslept themselves. Observing their signals, the captain waited till they came up, and took them on board, where a rather lively greeting awaited them for their dilatoriness. They mounted the side, however, smiling pleasantly; all the while, as Canon Smith of Stirling remarked, apparently entirely oblivious of the fact that they were the cause of a quarter of an hour's delay. Once more, at half-past six o'clock, a start was made, and fortunately there was no further interruptions. Less than an hour had been spent upon the water when the heavy banks of clouds were broken up; the thick mist on the surrounding hills was dispelled, and a brilliant sun in a bright blue sky shone down on an azure sea. The passage was greatly enjoyed, though several of the ladies were somewhat disturbed by the heavy swell rolling in from the Atlantic. Devotions were twice engaged in on the way, the pilgrims forming themselves into groups on deck and reciting the rosary, followed by the singing of the hymns "Look down, O Mother Mary," and "Hail, Queen of Heaven." Monsignor Persico, who was recognized as the Papal representative in the pilgrimage, sat in the cabin during the earlier part of the passage, and many of the pilgrims sought him out and paid their respects to him on bended knee. Among others on board were Lord Lovat, who is a pupil at the Benedictine Monastery of St. Augustus, Lady Lovat, and family; Lord Ralph Ker and Lady Ann Ker of Woodburn, Dalkeith; Archbishop Smith, Edinburgh; Bishop Macdonald, Aberdeen; the Very Rev. W. Clapperton, administrator of the diocese of Dunkeld; the Rev. Lord Archibald Douglas, Annan; the Committee of Management, consisting of Canon Maguire, Glasgow; Canon Smith, Stirling; Father M'Glynes, Alloa; Father Turner, Dumfries; and Father Colin Grant, Eskedale. The clergy of Edinburgh were represented by the Rev. Canon Hannan and Father Stewart, St. Patrick's; Father Kasron and Father Hoban, St. Mary's; and Father Gray, Laurieston. As the boat neared its destination a sharp lookout was kept for the ruined monastery, and as soon as it was sighted the pilgrims, with heads uncovered and faces turned towards the island, joined in singing "Faith of our Fathers," and their voices, pealing over the waters, were heard by Bishop Macdonald in the monastery, giving timely intimation of their arrival.

The party were disembarked with the greatest expedition, each boat-load on landing forming in processional order, and marching slowly along the winding paths, reciting decades of the rosary as they went. The ruins of the nunnery and Maclean's cross, which are among the objects of interest pointed out to visitors, arrested attention only for a moment, and the procession did not halt till it reached the ruined monastery, where it had been arranged that the ceremony should take place. Here, in the chancel familiar to all tourists in the Western Highlands, a temporary altar had been erected, and the first arrivals on the scene found the Bishop of Argyle and the Isles busily engaged giving a few finishing touches to the work. He was receiving indispensible assistance from several young ladies, whose deft fingers were suitably arranging on the altar the flowers and candelabra. They were Miss M'Clement, Lochnell; Miss M'Laverty, Miss M'Hardy, Edinburgh, and Miss Campbell Long. Though roughly constructed, the altar, which occupied the site of the original high altar, was artistically draped, and the mouldering walls in the vicinity were hung with carpets. The portion of the chancel in which the altar was situated was roofed over, and the ground had been warmly carpeted. As each succeeding boat-load made their appearance on the scene, the chancel soon became crowded to overflowing, and the surrounding clergymen found themselves confined in a very limited space. All of those who took part in the services were vested in their surplice and stoles, and were their Breviaries. Benedictine, Franciscan, Vincentian, Cormulite, and other monks were represented, thirteen of the first-mentioned order, under the leadership of the Prior, furnishing a choir. When all the pilgrims had assembled within the precincts of the ancient building, solemn Pontifical High Mass—In Coram Archiepiscopis—was celebrated by Bishop Macdonald of Argyle and the Isles, with the Very Rev. Dean Clapperton, administrator of the diocese of Dunkeld, as assistant priest. Among others present were Monsignor Persico, wearing the Papal cross, purple biretta, and brown robes of office; Archbishop Smith, attired in full pontificals, within the sanctuary; the Rev. Canon Grady, vicar-general, Falkirk, and Canon Caven, rector of Glasgow Seminary, deacons in attendance on the throne; Father M'Almain, Kuoydart, and Father Woods, Newton-Stewart, the deacon and sub-deacons of the mass respectively; Father Angus Macdonald, Oban, and Father Colin Mackenzie, masters of ceremonies. The music, which was a Gregorian chant, was led by the Benedictine choir from the Monastery of St. Augustus. During the progress of the service the rays of the sun were falling upon the pilgrim band, and lighting up the crumbling wall and decaying stone of the ancient monastery.

Archbishop Smith preached upon the words, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth glad tidings, that publisheth peace;" and in the course of the sermon he sketched the history of the Saint at whose shrine they had come to kneel in holy reverence. Sprung on both the father's and the mother's side from the noblest races of the Irish kings, Columba, he said, would have had much at his command had he chosen to spend his life in his native country. Setting out in his frail craft, with twelve companions from the coast of Antrim to begin his missionary labors among the heathen Picts, he touched at various islands on the way; but finding that the hills of his dear Ireland were still visible, he put off to sea again, fearing lest the sight of his beloved country would make him falter in his great purpose. On the 12th of May 563 he landed upon Iona, whence Ireland in the distance could no longer be discerned. From that day the little speck on the ocean grew into a mighty power. It flamed out into a beacon of glorious light that for centuries flashed across the ocean a steady blaze. Soon after Columba arrived on the island there arose on the spot selected a humble monastery and a church constructed of rough planks, covered with boughs of trees and reeds, and also the humble cell of the Abbot himself. When Columba carried his mission into the mainland the powerful Pictish King shut his gates against him but, at the sign of the cross the gates flew open, and in the presence of the barbaric monarch stood the commanding figure of the Saint, of more than ordinary stature, of angelic countenance, and with a sonorous voice. The King, overawed, gave Columba permission to preach in his dominions, and the cross soon triumphed over all that country. Whatever influence the miracles might have had on the conversion of Caledonia and the Pagan Picts, there was little doubt that the example of Columba's pure and ascetic life, joined with his preaching and his constant prayer, wrought the conversion of the whole country. In this way Columba converted the nation of the Picts, and in the thirty years during which he buried himself in the great work the form of Christianity was found to be precisely the same as that which the Catholic Church still believed.

At the conclusion of the sermon High Mass was again proceeded with, the Benedictine choir singing the Credo and Agnus Dei; after which Bishop Macdonald of Argyle and the Isles preached in Gaelic from the words, "Be merciful of your prelates," observing that the text was especially appropriate on such an occasion as that, when they were gathered to honor the Saint to whom the Highlands owed their Christianity. He concluded by alluding to the well-known prophecy of Columba, and said that that day was looked upon as a partial fulfilment of it. Then, before bringing the ceremony to a conclusion, he, as Bishop of the diocese, welcomed the pilgrims to the shrine, expressed his obligations to the members of the Clerical Committee, to whom they owed the success of the pilgrimage, and conveyed his thanks to the wife of Sir Benedict for their assistance in the choir. He also expressed, in name of the pilgrims, the pleasure they experienced in having among them Monsignor Persico, and publicly conveyed to the Duke of Argyll their thanks for the courtesy with which he had endeavored to place every facility in their way. Three complimentary references concluded, Dean Clapperton read the petition which had been forwarded to the Vatican, asking permission to administer the papal blessing, and the reply, couched in very few words, granting the request. The "Confiteor" having been recited, the Bishop of Argyle and the Isles administered the apostolic benediction, which brought the ceremony to a close.

While leaving the chancel and dispersing themselves throughout the ruins, the pilgrims joined in singing the hymn "Faith of our fathers." The entire service was of a most beautiful and impressive character, the effect of which was deepened by the knowledge that it was being conducted on historic ground, within sight of the spot where the Saint, whose memory is now revered alike by Catholics and Protestant—for only a few days ago, at forerness, his name was associated with the planting of the Free Church in the Highlands—first placed foot on Scottish soil, and where his restless relics have now found a peaceful shrine. Having still two hours at their disposal, the pilgrims—clergy and laity alike—were conducted in groups over the island, where they viewed with interest the many curious remains of centuries long gone by, and were shown the various places made memorable by the life of St. Columba. In order that a fitting souvenir of the pilgrimage might be obtained, photographs of the party were taken amid the ruins, each diocese forming itself a distinct group.

Shortly after two o'clock the re-embarkation commenced, and at three o'clock the vessel weighed anchor. The return journey was made in the most delightful weather that has been experienced on the coast this summer. On entering the bay at Oban, singing was recommenced, and just before reaching the quay, in response to several calls on the part of the clergy for "Three cheers for the Pope," a lusty cheer from five hundred throats was raised from the deck of the steamer, proclaiming to the inhabitants of Oban, who were out in hundreds to witness their arrival, the successful issue of the pilgrimage. All were delighted with their experience, and were loud in praise of the officials on board the Grenadier for the means taken to provide for their comfort, and of the inhabitants and the custodian of the island of Iona for the kindness and courtesy they showed to the pilgrims. A large proportion of the pilgrims left Oban last night for the South, but a considerable number, and among them a fair representation from Edinburgh, will not start on the return journey till to-morrow morning.—Edinburgh "Scotsman"—June 14, 1888.

The first point that may be noted is the claim that Columba's faith was identical with the Roman Catholic. Possibly, if we look at the doctrine of the Trinity, and related dogmas, which, however are by no means peculiar to the Roman Catholics, this contention might be granted. But facts show that Columba was independent of Rome in various respects. He had a different mode of fixing the time for the observance of Easter, namely that of the great mass of the Eastern churches in ancient times—derived from the Jewish passover. This was quite opposed to the Roman time. He had also a different style of tonsure or shaving the head. He successfully resisted all attempts to make him change. I. Rhys, Professor of Celtic in the University of Oxford, says:—"The Columban Church had done a great work in Northumbria, but it had come to an end there in 664, when the Angles conformed to Rome. The same was now threatening it in Pictland under Nechtan. Now Nechtan was at peace with the Angles of Northumbria, and with their example before his eyes, he ordered the observance of Easter, and the tonsure of the clergy to be regulated by the then practice of the Church of Rome. This took place in the year 710 at Scone, in Scotland, which is supposed to have by this time become the capital, and possessed of the coronation stone now at Westminster. The King had the assistance of Anglian priests to carry out the change, and the Columban clergy refusing to obey, were expelled in 717, when they crossed Drumalbin to the country of their Scottish kinsmen" (In Argyle) Celtic Britain. pp. 171-172.

The status of Columba was also peculiar. It is thus described by Reeves: Iona "had always for its ruler a presbyter [elder] abbot, to whose jurisdiction both the entire province, and the bishops [ordinary elders] themselves also, contrary to the usual order of things, must own subjection, after the example of that first teacher of theirs [Columba] who was no bishop [in the elevated sense] but a presbyter and monk." Chamber's Encyclopedia.

The following extracts from the Duke of Argyll's work on Iona may be interesting in connection with this subject:

J. C.

"Iona is situated at the southern apex of that long triangular track of mountain land which lies to the northwest of the great Caledonian valley (now canal J. C.) and which stretching from Inverness on the one side and from Cape Wrath on the other terminates in the elevated summit of Ben More in Mull. In approaching Iona from the South coast of Mull we see the massive hills of gneiss rocks which constitute the great bulk of that large island subsiding somewhat suddenly into the long promontory of comparatively low elevation; at first with sharp and broken outlines due to mica slate, and then with rounded knobs and knolls of granite swept naked by the blast along the margin of the sea; and farther inland covered with sheets of moss and heather. Off the point of this long promontory called the "Ross" and separated from it by a Sound of shallow sea, about one mile broad lies Columba's Isle.

"Passing through the labyrinth of rocks, his boat was received into a creek which to this day retains the name of the "Port of the Coracle" (Port-na-Churaich) a port guarded round by precipitous rocks of gneiss, and marked by a beach of brilliantly colored pebbles of green serpentine, green quartz, and the reddest felspar. Again he mounted the nearest hill, and here at last the southern horizon was nothing but a line of sea. And so this hill has ever since been marked by a Cairn which is known to the Gael as the "Cairn cul ri Erin," or "the Cairn with the back turned upon Erin."

"On the south-eastern side of the island between the rocky pasturage and the shore there is a long natural declivity of arable soil, steep enough to be naturally dry and protected by the hills from the western blast. And so here Columba's tent was pitched and his Bible opened, and his banner raised for the conversion of the heathen.

"The ancient ecclesiastical buildings which are now slowly mouldering to decay, and which are all grouped within a short distance of each other, mark, beyond all question, the few acres of ground on some part of which Columba's cell and church were built. . . . But one and all of them belong to a very different age from that in which Columba lived. One of them, the least and the most inconspicuous, but the most venerable of them all, Saint Odhrain's Chapel, may possibly be the same building which Queen Margaret of Scotland is known to have erected in memory of the saint, and dedicated to one of the most famous of his companions. But Queen Margaret died A. D. 1092, and therefore any building which she erected must date from nearly 500 years after Columba's death.

"But St. Odhrain's Chapel has this great interest that in all probability it marks the site of the still humbler church of wood and wattles in which Columba worshiped."

Archbishop Smith speaks of Columba having converted the nation of the Picts, but it was only one portion—the northern. In Chamber's Encyclopedia it is stated that "the Picts dwelling in the south of the Grampian range had been converted by St. Ninian in the fifth century," who, Rhys says, "labored also among the Picts of Galloway as early as 397."

The hymns "Look down, O Mother Mary," and "Hail, Queen of Heaven," point clearly to the Pagan origin of much of Roman Catholic religion. The latter phrase, Queen of Heaven is shown in Jer. vii. 18 to refer to an idolatrous usage derived by the Israelites from their Pagan neighbors. "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough to make cakes to the Queen of Heaven and to pour out drink offerings unto other gods." Mary is evidently represented in the first hymn as "as the mother of God," and to suppose that she, if in heaven, could hear the invocation here addressed to her, is to invest her with the Divine attribute of Omniscience.

This is another point where Columba parts company with Rome, as I am not aware that the Irish saint practiced Mariolatry in any form.

I have made an extract from the Duke of Argyll's little book on Iona, which supply some items of information not found in the report, which may add interest to the subject.

I WONDER WHY.

I wonder why this world's good things
Should fall in such unequal shares;
Why some should taste of all the joys,
And others only feel the cares!
I wonder why the sunshine bright
Should fall in paths some people tread,
While others shiver in the shade
Of clouds that gather overhead!

I wonder why the trees that hang
So full of luscious fruit should grow
Only where some may reach and eat,
While others faint and thirsty go?
Why should sweet flowers bloom for some,
For others only thorns be found?
And some grow rich on fruitful earth,
While others till but barren ground?

I wonder why the hearts of some
O'erflow with joy and happiness,
While others go their lonely way
Unblest with might of tenderness!
I wonder why the eyes of some
Should ne'er be moistened with a tear,
While others weep from morn till night,
Their hearts so crushed with sorrow here!

Ah well! we may not know indeed
The whys, the wherefores of each life!
But this we know—there's one who sees
And watches us through fog or strife.
Each life its mission here fulfils,
And only he may know the end,
And loving him, we may be strong,
Through storm or sunshine he may send!

THE DANIEL FORETIEW OF ROMAN-ISM. No. 4.

Allow me to commence this lecture by reading to you Daniel's description of the divinely designed hieroglyph by which the history of Rome was prefigured. He has previously described the hieroglyphs of the Babylonian, Persian, and Grecian Empires, and then he says:

After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth; it devoured and broke in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it; and it had ten horns. I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots; and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things. I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the judgment was set, and the books were opened. I beheld then because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away; yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time.... I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth of all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things. These great beasts, which are four, are four kings which shall arise out of the earth. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever and ever. Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron, and his nails of brass; which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet; and of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom. Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; and another shall rise after them, and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings. And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time, and times, and the dividing of time. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end. And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. In these verses you have the entire story of the Papacy, and what is more, you have its future as well as its past, the judgment of God as to its moral character and deserts. And how vivid the coloring, how graphic the pictures! I wish I could paint, or, better still, display in action before your eyes, such a dreadful and terrible and exceedingly strong wild beast, with its brazen claws and iron teeth, and ravening, ferocious nature, with its ten horns, and its strange, head-like "little horn" able to see, and speak, and blaspheme the Almighty, so as at last to bring down destruction on the beast itself! I wish I could let you watch it, rending and tearing its enemies, breaking their bones in pieces, devouring their flesh, and in wanton, fierce ferocity stamping on and tramping with its brazen-clawed feet what it cannot consume! If you had learned the A B C of the language of hieroglyphics you would at once recognize that such creatures as this are figures of godless empires, kingdoms which are brutal in their ignorance of God, in their absence of self-control, in their bestial instincts; which love blood-shed and are reckless of human agony, selfish, terrible, cruel, mighty. They represent and recall proud military heroes, like Julius Cæsar, who trample down all that oppose them; cruel despots, who oppress their fellows; reckless conquerors like Tamerlane and Napoleon, to whom the slaughter of millions of mankind was a matter of no moment. This is the generic signification of all such hieroglyphs. But we are not left to guess the meaning and application of this particular monster. The symbol has a divine interpretation. "The fourth beast," we read, "shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth." That, beyond all question was Rome, as all historians agree—the fourth and last of the great universal empires of antiquity. The monster represents Rome, her whole existence as a supreme or ruling power, after the fall of the Greek or Macedonian beast before her attacks (B. C. 197). It represents, therefore, the history of Rome for over 2000 years, in the past, and on into a time still future; for, be it well noted, this beast ravages and rules, and his characteristic little horn blasphemes and boasts, right up to the point when empire like to wild beasts come to an end, and "the Son of Man and the saints of the Most High take the kingdom and possess it forever."

It is important that we should grasp one great historical fact; i. e., the rule of Rome has never, since its first commencement, ceased to exist, save once, for a very brief period during the Gothic invasions. It has changed in character, as we have seen, but it has continued. Rome ruled the known world at the first advent of Christ, and still rules hundreds of millions of mankind, and will continue so to do right up till the second advent of Christ. So this prophecy teaches; for not until the Son of Man takes the dominion of the earth; and establishes a kingdom that shall never pass away, is the monster representing Roman rule destroyed. The rule of Rome, we repeat, has never ceased. It was a secular pagan power for five or six centuries; it has been an ecclesiastical and apostate Christian power ever since, that is to say, for twelve or thirteen centuries. There lay a brief period between these two stages, during which professed Christian Emperors ruled Rome, followed by an interval when, for a time, it seemed as if the great city had received a fatal blow from her Gothic captors. It seemed so; but it was not so, for the word of God cannot be broken. The rule of Rome revived in a new form, and was as real under the popes of the thirteenth century as it had been under the Cæsars of the first. It was as oppressive, cruel, and bloody under Innocent III., as it had been under Nero and Domitian. The reality was the same though the forms had changed. The Cæsars did not persecute the witnesses of Jesus more severely and bitterly than the popes; Diocletian did not destroy the saints or oppose the gospel more than did the Inquisition of papal days. Rome is one and the same all through, both locally and morally. One dreadful wild beast represents her, though the symbol, like the history it prefigures, has two parts. There was the undivided stage, and there has been the tenfold stage. The one is Rome Pagan, the other Rome Papal; the one is the old Empire, the other the modern pontificate; the one is the Empire of the Cæsars, the other is the Roman Papacy. I speak broadly omitting all detail for the present. We shall find more of that when we come by-and-by to John's later foreview. Daniel's was a distant view in the days of Belshazzar, too distant altogether for detail. No artist paints the sheep on the hillside if the hill be fifty miles off; he may sketch the bold outline, but he omits minor detail. So Daniel's distant foreview, dating from 2,500 years ago, shows the two great sections of Roman history—the undivided military empire, followed by the commonwealth of Papal Christendom, the latter as truly Latin in character as the former; and he shows the end of Rome at the second advent of Christ. But he refrains encumbering his sketch with confusing political details. He does not fall however to delineate fully the moral and religious features of the power symbolized by the proud, intelligent, blasphemous, head-like "little horn" of the Roman beast. To this he devotes, on the contrary, the greater part of the prophecy; and I must ask you now carefully to note the various points that prove this horn to be a marvellous prophetic hieroglyph of the Roman papacy, fitting it as one of Chubb's keys fits the lock for which it was made, while it refuses absolutely to adapt itself to any other. The main points in the nature, character, and actings of this "little horn," which we must note in order to discover the power intended, are these:

1. Its place; within the body of the fourth empire.

2. The period of its origin; soon after the division of the Roman territory into ten kingdoms.

3. Its nature; different from the other kingdoms, though in some respects like them. It was a horn, but with eyes and mouth. It would be a kingdom like the rest, a monarchy; but its kings would be overseers or bishops and prophets.

4. Its moral character; boastful and blasphemous: great words spoken against the Most High.

5. Its lawlessness; it would claim authority over times and laws.

6. Its opposition to the saints; it would be a persecuting power, and that for so long a period that it would wear out the saints of the Most High, who would be given into his hand for a time,

7. Its duration; "time, times and a half," or 1,260 years.

8 Its doom; it would suffer the loss of its dominion before it was itself destroyed. "They shall take away its dominion, to consume and destroy it to the end." Here are eight distinct and perfectly tangible features. If they all meet in one great reality, if we find them all characterizing one and the same power, can we question that that is the power intended? They do all meet in the Roman Papacy, whose history I have just briefly recalled, and we are therefore bold to say it is the great and evil reality predicted. A few words on each of these points, to convince you that this is the case.

1. Its place. No one can question that the Papacy is a Roman as distinguished from a Greek or an Oriental power. Its seat is the seven-hilled city; its tongue is the Latin language of Cæsar of Pliny and of Tacitus; its Church is the Church of Rome, and is the only Church that is or ever has been named from a city. Others have been named from countries, or from men; the Papal Church alone bears the name of a city, and that city is Rome. The Papacy fulfils the first condition therefore.

2. Its time. We have shown that the last Bishop of Rome and the first pope was Boniface III., A. D. 607. Now the western empire of Rome came to an end with the fall of Romulus Augustulus, A. D. 476; that is, 130 years earlier. During that time the ten kingdoms were forming in the body of the old empire, and during that time the simple pastor of the church was transformed into a pope. The little horn grew up among the ten. The Papacy developed synchronously with the Gothic kingdoms.

3. Its nature. The power symbolized by the little horn is of course a kingdom, like all the other ten; but it is not merely this. It is "diverse," or different, from all the other ruling dynasties with which it is associated. It is a horn of the wild beast, but it has human eyes and a human voice, denoting its pretensions to be a seer, or prophet, and a teacher. It takes the oversight of all the ten, it is an overseer or bishop and it has "a mouth speaking great things." Its paramount influence depends, not on its mere material power, for it is small as a kingdom, a "little horn," but on its religious pretensions. Does not this exactly portray the Papacy? Was it not diverse or different from all the Gothic kingdoms amid which it existed? Was it a mere kingdom? Nay, but a spiritual reign over the hearts and minds as well as the bodies of men—a reign established by means, not of material weapons, but of spiritual pretensions. It was founded not on force, but on falsehood and fraud, and the superstitious fears of the half civilized and ignorant Gothic kingdoms. The popedom has always been eager to proclaim its own diversity from all other kingdoms. It claims "a princedom more perfect than every human princedom," surpassing them "as far as the light of the sun exceeds that of the moon." It arrogates to itself a character as superior to secular kingdoms as man to the irrational beasts. Its laws are made not with the best human wisdom; but auctoritate, scientia, ac plenitudine, with the fulness of Divine knowledge, and the fulness of apostolic power. Is not the Papacy sufficiently diverse from all the rest of the kingdoms of western Europe to identify it as the little horn? What other ruling monarch of Christendom ever pretended to apostle authority, or ruled men in the name of God? Does the pope dress in royal robes? Nay, but in priestly garments. Does he wear a crown? Nay, but a triple tiara, to show that he reigns in heaven, earth, and hell.

Does he wield a sceptre? Nay, but a crosier or crook, to show that he is the good shepherd of the Church. Do his subjects kiss his hand? Nay, but his toe! Verily this power is "diverse" from the rest, both in great things and little. It is small in size, gigantic in pretensions. It is, or was for centuries, one among many temporal kingdoms in Europe. It is the only one which claims a spiritual authority and universal dominion.

4. Its moral character. The salient feature here is "the mouth speaking great things." Great words spoken against the Most High, and "a look more stout than its fellows." Audacious pride and bold blasphemy must characterize the power that fulfils this point of the symbol. We ask, then, has the Papacy exhibited this mark also? Time would fail me to quote to you verbatim its great words, its boastful self-glorifications, and its outrageous blasphemies against God! You will find pages of them quoted in my work on "The Approaching End of the Age," and volumes filled with them exist, for Papal documents consist of little else. The Papal claims are so grotesque in their pride and self-exaltation, that they almost produce a sense of the comic, and the feeling of pitying contempt with which one would watch a frog trying to swell itself to the size of an ox! I must however mention some of the claims contained in these "great words," which will show you the nature of Papal blasphemies. It is claimed, for instance, that "no laws made contrary to the canons and decrees of Roman prelates have any force," that "the tribunals of all kings are subject to the priests," that "no man may act against the discipline of the Roman Church," that "the Papal decrees or decretal epistles are to be numbered among the canonical Scriptures," and not only so, but that the Scriptures themselves are to be received only "because a judgment of holy Pope Innocent was published for receiving them." It is claimed that "emperors ought to obey, and not rule over pontiffs;" that even an awfully wicked pope, who is a "slave of hell," may not be rebuked by mortal man, because "he himself is to judge all men, and be judged by none" and "since he was styled God, by the pious prince Constantine, it is manifest that God cannot be judged by man!" They claim that no laws can bind the popes, but that just as Christ, being maker of all laws and ordinances, could violate the Sabbath, because he was Lord also of the Sabbath, so popes can dispense with any law, to show they are above all law.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 8.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

TERTIARY OR CENOZOIC AGE CONTINUED.

God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and man, the crowning work of Tertiary creation was created,—at once creation's lord, and a co-worker with God for the completion of that glorious scheme in relation to the earth by which Jehovah had wrought upon it before the foundation of the world, and by which he had brought it from chaos to its present beautiful form and completeness, filling it with organisms of wonderful form and life, each adapted to its own peculiar period of pre-eminence, to add to its beauty, its fertility and its productiveness. "Creation receives its deputed monarch. Moulded by God's own finger, and in God's own likeness, he enters upon the scene, an exquisite creature, rich in native faculty, pregnant with the yet undeveloped seeds of all wisdom and knowledge, tender of heart and pure of spirit, he was formed to hold high communion with his Creator, and to breathe abroad his sympathy over all that the Creator had made." (Hugh Miller.)

"Till the introduction of man upon the planet, the humbler creatures, his predecessors, formed but mere figures in its landscapes, and failed to alter or affect by their works, the face of nature. They were conspicuous not from what they did, but from what they were. At an early period reefs of coral, the work of minute zoophytes, whitened the shallows of the ocean, or encircled with pale, ever-broadening frames, solitary islands, green with the shrubs and trees of extinct floras; but though products of the animal world, they were not built up under the direction of even an instinctive intelligence, but were as entirely the results of a vegetative process of mere growth as the forests, or reed brakes of the old carboniferous savannahs. At a later time an ant-hill might be here and there described, rearing its squat brown pyramid amid the recesses of some oolitic forest, or, in a period still more recent, the dam of the gigantic beaver might be seen extending its minute eye-like circlet of blue amid the windings of some rocky ravine of the Pliocene age; or, existing as a little mound-skirted pond, with the rude, half-submerged cottage of the creature, its architect, rising beside it, on some rivulet of the Pleistocene. But how inconsiderable such works when compared with the wide extent of prospect in which they were included! Not until man is introduced on the earth do we find the creatures whose works sensibly affect and modify the aspects of nature." Hugh Miller, in Testimony of the Rocks.

Inspiration gives a clear, terse and vivid statement of man's creation. It is complete, comprehensive and concise, as follows: "And God made (caused to be) the man according to an image of a God (a disposer) made he him; male and female made he them," and, again, "And God moulded the man dust from the earth, and breathed into (or implanted in) his face a breath of (ζωης) life, and the man came to be a living organism, (εις ψυχην ζωσαν)," (Chas. Gardiner in RESTITUTION), or as the Common Version reads, "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him: male and female created he them," and, "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul."

All the creatures of the Tertiary creation, its gigantic mammals, its massive quadrupeds, its fierce carnivora, its animals of domestication and lastly its Man, were earth-births, in contradistinction to the water-births of the Mesozoic. In the latter God had said, "Let the waters bring forth;" while of the former it is written, "And God said, Let the earth bring forth."

Man, the last-formed work of the age, was not an exception to his predecessors. Formed of the same dust of the ground, inhaling the same life-giving, life-sustaining, vitalizing aerial element; subjected to the same modes of life, partaking of the same diet, and nourished by the same methods of nutrition and assimilation, it is not wonderful that Solomon in his wisdom should say, "I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast: for all is vanity. All go unto one place: all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again," Eccl. iii. 18–20; and again, "For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun.... Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest," Ibid. ix. 4, 10, or that David should so emphatically assert, that "Man that is in honor and understandeth not is like the beasts that perish." Psa. xlix. 20.

Geology knows of man only as a creature of tertiary creation, and God's word confirms it. Neither record recognizes any principle, or part in man as deathless, or regards him in possession of an undying spirit, or an immortal soul. No. Immortality was brought to light through the gospel as a reward for patient continuance in well-doing; it is to be sought after, and is the gift, a free gift of a well pleased Deity to those who are found worthily seeking after it.

Man, as he came from the hand of the Divine Architect was neither perfect nor imperfect, mentally or morally; neither holy nor unholy; mortal nor immortal, yet susceptible of becoming either as he might elect. A test was needed to show whether he would prove to be a law-breaker, imperfect, unholy, and unworthy to live, or, a law-observer, worthy of perfection and immortality. He was placed in the garden to dress it and to keep it. This was his daily avocation. A law was given him that he might form a character. Had there been no law, there could have been no transgression, no standard by which to have claimed obedience, or sin, and without such a standard or guide for judgment no character could have been formed. Without law, man would have lived and died, as did the brute creation around him, with no higher aims and aspirations than the supplying of his daily wants, and the propagation of his species. But a law was given him, a basis of right and wrong, and the fact stamps his ability to obey, or to disobey it. Here, too, we observe the distinction between him and his contemporaries. To him was granted a higher, nobler, grander intellectuality than to the brutes around him. In this he far exceeded any of the former creations. He could take cognizance of a law; they lived and died without any knowledge of law. They were doomed to death and destruction; he, through obedience to the law, might perpetuate his existence eternally. He was not subject to death, except by a violation of law, and the tree of life was there in the midst of the garden, a fountain of perpetual youth, to which he was granted free access, if he proved himself worthy to partake of it. Under it man was, and is, the great creature-worker of the world,—a created being, continuing the work of an all-wise Creator to the development of the highest, purest and best plane of existence for the age, and for the ages to follow. He tills the soil, plants the trees, for flower, fruit and vintage, and sows the grain with outstretched hand to gain an increased store of golden cereals. He builds his habitations, and a shelter for his flocks and herds; removes here a forest and there transplants another; builds cities and carries on successfully the arts and sciences; makes the winds, the waves, and the elements do his bidding; domesticates as beasts of burden, or for his use, the beasts of the field, and enriches his mental store from social intercourse. As Hugh Miller beautifully expresses it, "Man, in these departments of industry is what none of his predecessors have ever been,—a fellow-worker with the Creator. He is a mighty improver of creation."

Paul recognizes the earth-born nature of man when he informs his Corinthian brethren that "The first man, Adam, was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit." "The first man is of the earth, earthy." "As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy," etc. In fact all the writers of the Bible acctly accord with what has been noted, and we may read farther, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return to the ground: for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," Gen. iii. 19, and "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." Eccl. xii. 7; or, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him. For he knoweth our frame: he remembereth that we are dust." Psa. ciii. 14.

No intimation is anywhere given of an undying entity or principle in man different from the other fauna of the age, but to the contrary. Much of theory, inference and speculation has been offered in support of man's inherent immortality. A difference is observed between the mental caliber of man and his age contemporaries, and this difference has been thought by some to be due to a God-given inherency—an undying entity—variously denominated, an immortal soul, an immortal spirit, the deathless principle, the immortal mind, etc., indicative of an existence through and beyond the death of the individual. Such a thing is unknown to the sacred volume, or at least remains unrevealed therein, and is foreign to the teachings of science. Inspiration is as silent as the grave as to its creation, its location, its function in the individual, its object in life, its nature, its use, its future or its finality. The supposition of its existence is only an assumption based upon inference, and the ideality in relation to it is varied according to the fancy of its advocates. Poetic imagery indulged, clothes this fancy and peddles it out thus:

"Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul."

Or,

"The soul immortal as its Maker,
Can never, never die."

And so on ad infinitum. But this imagery is rather the fanciful tracings of poetic license unsupported by truth; either through the revelations of science, or of God's word.

Cessation of animated existence (death) had prevailed over the fauna of the ages from the earliest dawn of zoophytic life, and through all the genera and species of the intervening ages, but to man was granted an immunity from this dire result by obedience to the divine law. Man's failure in the garden of Eden to prove himself of the law-abiding class, inheres in the race of tertiary, earth-born man, rendering him imperfect, mortal, and death-doomed.

The age closed with a severe ordeal of judgment, yet the judicial verdict is that its labors were good. Its creations, made for the age, filled the place the Creator had planned. They were acceptable of God for the age. Its close exhibits 60 to 70 per cent. of the present forms of animal life. But the time of giant quadrupeds is full and they no longer predominate over the new age types. Man's advent ushered in the era of mind, of mental endowment, of comprehending and obeying law, and remained a type of life for the then age to come.

The age was closed and its successor inaugurated by the Glacial Period, one of the most terrific ordeals through which the earth had ever passed.

Note. It seems to have been a peculiarity of the ages and of age-work that during the cadence of each, or sometime prior to its close, a typical individual prophetic of the predominating type of life for the next age was almost invariably introduced, to show, as it were, what would be the organic peculiarities of the age to come. Thus a small vertebrate mammal (Dromatherium Sylvestre)—the only one of its class—has been found in the Mesozoic strata of North Carolina, but in such limited quantities as to have only a slight effect upon the profuse reptilian productions for which that age is remarkable. Two or three small mammals have been discovered in the same strata in Europe also, but they were an insignificant part of the prevailing fauna, and of the smaller and less conspicuous forms of that order. Thus, too, man was brought upon the stage of action just prior to the close of the Tertiary or Cenozoic Age, a part of the age-labors, and a prophecy of the prevailing fauna of the age to come (the Quarternary, or Post-tertiary.)

Dear Restitution:

We are going to have a camp meeting near this place, beginning on Friday night before the third Sunday in August. We want all the preaching brethren who love the appearing of our blessed Lord, and who are looking for his soon personal coming, to meet with us. The sole object of this meeting is to serve the Lord and preach the gospel of the soon coming King and kingdom. Therefore we want no debating or controversy during said meeting, and all who cannot meet with us for the sole purpose of worshipping the Lord, and preaching the gospel, and let others alone, will please stay at home. But to all those whose hearts are filled with love for God and his cause, we throw wide the door and bid you welcome. Come praying that the Lord may wonderfully bless our meeting. If any of the brethren have any tracts they can spare, please send them to us. We want to give every person one who comes to our meeting. Yours in the blessed hope.

RUSSEL.—In West Lovelock, Butte Co., Cal., June 17, 1888, Chas. L. Russel, of pneumonia, aged 20 years and 7 months.

By his death Brother and Sister Russel have lost their only child, and the community a highly respected and honored member. Charlie was a model young man and was esteemed and loved by all who knew him. Always amiable, kind, true, generous and patient. He had a large circle of friends who deeply mourn his loss. He was followed to the grave by a larger concourse of people than ever was seen here on a similar occasion. The writer spoke words of comfort from 1 Cor. xv. 26. May the blessing of God rest upon the parents in this great affliction and they be brought to that land where death can never come.

ELDER J. D. GAREY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 24, '88,

Dear Restitution:

My father, Newell Bond, has died after long and severe suffering, aged 90 years, 2 months and 2 days. He died as he had lived, in hope of the soon coming of his Lord and Master. Please insert the notice of his death in your paper, the paper whose coming he had watched for each week.

Yours, F. D. BOND.

"NEVER MIND."

What's the use of always fretting,
At the trials we shall find
Ever strewn along our pathway?
Travel on, and "Never Mind."

Travel onward, working, hoping;
Cast no lingering glance behind.
At the trials once encountered
Look ahead and "Never Mind."

What is past, is past forever,
Let all fretting be realgned.
It will never help the matter,
Do your best and "Never Mind."

And if those who might befriend you,
Whom the ties of nature bind,
Should refuse to do their duty,
Look to heaven, and "Never Mind."

Friendly words are often spoken,
When the feelings are unkind,
Take them for their real value,
Pass them by, and "Never Mind."

Fate may threaten, clouds may lower,
Enemies may be combined,
If your trust in God is steadfast,
He will help you. "Never Mind."

Faith Like a Mustard—Seed, or the Mustard-Seed Philosophy.

"And he said unto them; Because of your little faithfulness (ολιγοπιστιαν not ολιγην πιστιν—little faith).

For verily I say unto you, if ye had faith as a mustard-seed, ye might say unto this mountain, go over from this place to that, and it would go over; and nothing would be impossible for you," Matt. xvii. 20.

What does this mean and what is the philosophy of it? In the first place, is the Teacher speaking of quantity or kind? The context shows that he is speaking of kind. But does a mustard-seed display faith, and can an inanimate object of any kind be said to have faith? No. How then does a mustard-seed illustrate faith or a kind of faith? In this way, namely. The mustard-seed is an undeveloped germ and contains within itself a possibility and potency. So did those disciples addressed. They were the germ of a kingdom spiritual and in them was the undeveloped potency and possibility of "all things" as they are told later. Does the mustard-seed become "the largest of the herbs of the garden" without a due process of growth? Neither would these disciples become such a kingdom in the garden of God without a similar process of growth in due time. Notice, they are addressed as a body not as individuals. The ultimate potency and possibility determined by kind in the case of the mustard-seed and act by quantity or size. For the seed is one and the smallest of the garden-seeds too. So the seed of this spiritual kingdom is one also "and that seed the Christ." The germinal kingdom too so small and insignificant among the kingdoms of the earth as to be despised and rejected of men. How does the mustard-seed grow and develop its possibility and potency? It grows in the earth. So does the spiritual kingdom. Would the mustard-seed grow in the air? Neither can you have an aerial spiritual kingdom of imagination. The mustard-seed must have suitable environments and must respond to them. It must take root downward and grow upward. So must the kingdom. It too must be "rooted and grounded in good soil." The soil must be set apart for the mustard-seed, so must it for the kingdom, and it must be kept free from weeds in each instance. All the forces of nature are enlisted to give potency to the mustard-seed growth. If "all things are yours" are they not all likewise enlisted to give potency to the kingdom, and when the due time has arrived, do you doubt that "the saints is light" will sway the forces of this cosmos? And if this be true will it be a great thing to cause a mountain instantly to change its place? Have you any idea of the latent power there is wrapped up in a sun-beam? "The saints in light" are those who have been fully "enlightened." They will know and know how to use this enlightenment to God's glory, their own good, and the greatest good of "the many." It has been written that "they will sway the cosmos" and that "all the dunamois (forces) of the heavens and the earth will be on their side." Will it be a great thing for such "a kingdom" or such a royalty to say to a material mountain "go from this place to that" with full assurance of its "getting there?" Give me "the sway" of the volcanic forces alone and I will "take the contract." Give me the latent power in a drop of water and I'll guarantee the contract for any one of "the royal priesthood" when they have returned to earth with their promised incarnations.

—Faith like a mustard-seed then is like first in kind when applied to "the kingdom of righteousness." Both are germinal products with latent possibilities.

Second. Both require planting in the earth, and both must be true to their environments.

Third. Both require the divine as well as human ministration.

Fourth. Both develop and reach their mature potency and possibility according to a germinal periodicity that is determined by a divine, not a human agency.

Fifth. Both enlist the natural forces of this cosmos in the development of their potency.

Sixth and last. Both are one in their germinal life. It is one mustard-seed that is faithful to accomplish that for which it was sent, and it is one kingdom-seed that must in its kind and degree be faithful to its germinal trust if it would realize its latent potency and possibility.

Well might the Teacher then say in a question of faithfulness "If ye had faith as a mustard-seed ye might say unto this mountain (or any other mountain) go over from this place to that, and it would go over, and nothing would be impossible for you."

C. GARDNER.

Unto the Brethren In Christ Jesus Greeting.

Grace be to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort, Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. We take pleasure in writing a few lines to express our heartfelt thanks to the dear ones who have written so many words of comfort wherewith they have been comforted of God, helping us to overcome trials and temptations and cheering us in time of trouble. How often Sister Wince's letters seemed written expressly for us, and have comforted us and made us rejoice and take courage when everything seemed dark and dreary. Many thanks dear sister for your labor of love, and the many exhortations you have given us through the columns of our much loved paper. May you with your worthy companion still live to do good in these times of peril, and at last be found blameless at the coming of our blessed Lord.

Sister Wilson's letter of experience came at the time we ourselves were almost in despair. We had listened to those who taught that Jesus was the son of Joseph, that all the Spirit we now received was the Word, and God would not answer prayer, that was only for the apostle's day, and many other things that had caused us to almost think Christianity in this day was a fraud, because we found no peace nor joy in this belief.

There are many others that give us exhortations, that, as it were, create in us new life.

To our beloved Editor, whose letters seem to be written with a pen directed by inspiration, and whose heart is filled with the love of God, may his (God's) grace be sufficient in every trial and temptation, enabling you to perform the work you have to do in the fear of God and to his glory and honor, and at last you may receive a crown of life in the kingdom of God. On the beautiful morning of May 22nd there was a little company of thirteen went two miles to the creek, and while all nature seemed to rejoice, our hearts were made glad to see our son and his wife go down in the watery grave and raised up again to walk in a new life; we could only say, praise the Lord. Our worthy brother, T. J. Whitesitt performed the act. May the blessing of God be with them that they may be bright and shining lights in this age of darkness. Dearly beloved, let us take courage; the prize is at the end of the race, and everything declares the end is nigh. Let us lift up our heads and rejoice. We may have trials and temptations that may make us feel as though we are forsaken, yet the promise is sure, he will never leave nor forsake those that put their trust in him, but when we are tried we shall receive a crown of life. Yours in love of the truth.

"God the Spirit."

They who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth," John iv. 24, i. e., we must worship him as revealed in his word.

In our version it reads, "God is a spirit." But this is only in the idiom of our language, which many do not see; for there are "many spirits gone out into the world," and hence the question might be raised, which one is "he?"

Again, God is light, 1 John i. 5; not a light. Still again, "God is love," 1 John iv. 16; not a love, but "God is love." Amen.

Farther, "God is my salvation," Ex. xv. 2; Deut. x. 21. "He is thy praise!" And in 2 Sam. xxii. 32, "Who is a rock save our God? God is my strength, my power."

Now to bring the expression down to our apprehension note John vi. 47-58. "This is the bread that (in contrast with Israel's manna) cometh down from heaven—he that eateth of this bread shall live forever." "It is the spirit that quickeneth (giveth life) the flesh profiteth nothing; the words I speak unto you are spirit and life." vs. 63.

Here lies the point; those terms, "light, life, love, strength, salvation and song" are above our common language to express what "God is to us, what he does for us, and will do in bringing believers to himself.

Their evident import is clear, as in the Lord's supper service. "The bread broken" signifies, sets forth, Jesus body bruised and broken, to bear our sins, the just for the unjust, and save us. We need reverence to accept divine revelation as given for our salvation, "comparing Scripture with Scripture," and devoutly doing our best to let our light shine and bring others to believe and be saved.

"We now see and know in part," 1 Cor. xiii., but we are yet to see and know as we are known. Here our faith and hope find repose resting in the Lord as loving children. Amen.

J. B. COOK.

Roman Catholic Intolerance.

The relentless determination of the Romish Church to force her own people to support her parochial schools received illustrations lately in the immediate vicinity of Philadelphia. In St. Agnes Roman Catholic Church, Westchester, the Rev. Father Spaulding announced from the altar that William S Bowen and Phillip Maguire would hereafter be forbidden a seat in the church and that they would be refused the sacraments, living or dead. This action on the part of the priest was caused by the two gentlemen named refusing to send their children to the parochial school. Mr. Maguire sends his son to the State Normal School here, and Mr. Bowen's son attends the public High School. Father Spaulding some weeks ago told Mr. Maguire and Mr. Bowen that this action would be taken if they did not take their children from the public schools and send them to the parochial school. The parents refused and wrote to Archbishop Ryan, asking if Father Spaulding had this power. The archbishop wrote back that the head of the church there could do as he thought proper. B th the gentlemen stand well in the community. Mr. Bowen is assistant manager of the West Chester Gas Company, and Mr. Maguire is one of the editors of the Daily News.

The programme of the Jesuits is very plain. They exclaim against a "godless education;" to give more color to the charge they join hands with infidels in driving the Bible out of our public schools; then they found parochial schools, and compel their people to support and attend them; then they demand a share of the public money for the support of these schools, which are not public schools at all but engines for advancing the interests of the Papacy. These are well planned successive steps towards the subjugation of the United States under the Roman Pontiff. Americans will be wise if they resist them in season.—Christian Statesman.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Westbee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of its coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern invention, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar topics, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Uncomprehensible Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign, who guides and governs all.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GRUTER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or embalmed the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost rent the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS { One Year . . $2.00. Six Months . . 1.00. Three Months . .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. II.

BY DR. J. H. THOMPSON.

THE GLACIAL PERIOD.

The age-work of the previous ages has brought the earth from chaos to stable completeness, and thoroughly established the continental outlines and relief. Siluria mollusks, radiates and articulates had yielded the precedence to Devonian Fishes and these in their turn succumbed to Mesozoic lizards, and the birds of Cretaceous notoriety; these in their turn giving place to the unwieldy mammalia of the Cenozoic, with man as their cotemporary, their protector and their ruler. The earth for ages had been a vast hot bed, from the time of the original division of the waters by land areas in the Devonian Age, and had developed and perfected the flora peculiar to each succeeding age,—a flora which during the Carboniferous Era had, by its stratification and fossilization, formed the immense coal deposits of the world, and which had, in later ages, given place to plants and trees bearing beautifully sculptured leaves, attractive and brilliant flowers, and abundant fruit. A tropical climate even yet prevailed over the surface of the earth, but with the close of the Tertiary ago, and under the judgment ora of it, a new phenomenon appears. Says Mr. Steele, "The Arctic regions are elevated. The climate of the whole continent feels the change. The cold creeps down every valley. Each northern blast brings a frost. The verdure of forest and plain withers and falls. The sun loses part of its heat. The sea becomes cold. Tertiary life perishes in this frigid temperature. Arctic vegetation covers the land where tropical flowers have so lately bloomed in beauty..... Rivers are stopped and turned to ice. Snow gathers in the wintry air, and wraps in its mantle of white all the desolation that has been wrought. Glaciers, born in the icy north, invade the land. Sullenly they move southward along every great river valley, plowing the rock, paring down acclivities, filling up ancient river-channels, burying forests under masses of debris, scoring and polishing the surface, grinding up stones into soil, and strewing rocks, gravel and sand over southern fields. Reaching the coast of New England, they fringe the ocean with an ice-wall for hundreds of miles. Mighty icebergs, breaking loose, float southward and grinding their way through river-channel and strait, deposit their rocky burdens in long trains over the sea-bottom, or, grounding on its shore, drop them in promiscuous piles."

The immense bowlders scattered broadcast over the continent, no less than pebble-stones bear witness to the severity of this period. The waters of the Arctic ocean, overlapping the barriers of the north, rushed in as irresistable flood, a prolonged wave, over the south-country, bearing with it icebergs, bowlders, etc., and its stupendous force of waters, destroying in its course, the life of nearly the entire fauna and flora of the globe. "Bowlders are more or less rounded, as if water-worn, and their structure and mineral composition are different from those of the rocks on which they rest. They have evidently been transported to the places they occupy." Steele's Geology. The striæ or grooves run parallel across the worn surface of the rock, and vary from the size of a pin's scratch to a foot or more in width. "On Hoosic Mountain is a bowlder of 500 tons weight, which has been carried from a ledge across an intervening valley 1800 feet deep, and at the same time elevated 1000 feet above its course." "The streets of Cincinnati, Ohio, are paved with stones quarried by the hand of nature in the region of the upper lakes." Winchell. "Arctic rocks are found," says Mr. Steele, "on the western prairies, from 400 to 500 miles distant from their homes," and again, "They are often found perched on points of the Alps, far above existing glaciers, or dispersed over distant plains."

"The northernmost part of Norway and Sweden is at this day," writes the late Louis Agassiz, in his Geological Sketches," the southern limit of the reindeer in Europe; but their fossil remains are found in large quantities in the drift about the neighborhood of Paris, and quite recently they have been traced even to the foot of the Pyrenees."

During the preceding ages a tropical climate had yielded an abundance of rank vegetation, and a large number of gigantic animals. That the polar condition was favorable to their subsistance is evidenced by the remains of a mammoth that floated down from thence, so securely locked in and preserved by one of the immense northern ice bergs that its skin was found to be covered with wool, and the dogs partook of its flesh. The earth, at the inception of the Glacial Period, had not yet been visited by rain, ("for the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth," but, "there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground," Gen. ii. 5, 6) yet it had yielded abundantly of the fauna and flora of the ago. Now, however, at the close of the Tertiary age and the beginning of another, adding to the discomfiture and destruction of ago-life,—the rains, generated by the condensation of an Arctic air-current, and Arctic floods, bearing on their bosom whole fields of ice and ice-berge, acting on the warm strata with they came in contact in their southward course, induced general floods and hurricanes, which swept the continental areas as with the besom of destruction. The boulder-laden ice-rafts could never have extended as high, or as far southward as did the waters that bore them, and, yet, these witness-marks appear as far south as the 39th degree of latitude in America, and perched on elevated points of the Alps of Europe while the fossil evidences of the Drift reach to the foot of the Pyrenees. Scratched and scarred, the boulders testify truly to the formidable character of the flood that bore them from their native resting-places to foreign homes. The immense oceans of Colorado are thought to have been cut by the Glacial flood. Gorges a mile in depth, through masses of solid rock, making some of the most massive, grandest scenery in the world, proclaim its lengthened severity.

It will be remembered that in the Eozoic Age, in which was wrought the separation of "the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament," a large mass of water was held in suspension in the aerial canopy and there is no record of its having been precipitated to the earth prior to this epoch. In fact, the humid air of the intervening periods, as well as the superior warmth of the earth itself would indicate that it was still retained in suspension, ready to fall upon the earth by condensation as rain, or snow, or hail; and that such a rapid condensation would be produced by an Arctic overflow, precipitating it on the earth in a prolonged rain-storm, is easily seen. Truly, "the foundations of the great deep" would be broken up and a universal flood would result. God's word proclaims its universality, and scientific research affirms it.

Whether this theory of the flood, (on whose bosom was borne the ark that held sight specimens of the human species, and that bore them over from the old-age world, to the new, and types of the world's fauna with them) be accepted as the true one or not, it is certain that during the Glacial and Drift Period, the most formidable destruction of animal life resulted from it. Very many of the types of life became entirely extinct and can only be found and known by their fossil remains. The massive megatherium, mesplotherium, palæotherium, and their gigantic cotemporaries failed to be found afterwards roaming over the green earth, or in the thick woods of the new creation, while others, such as the elephant, the rhinoceros and the hippopotamus are found in the countries of the inter-tropics. Man passed over into the new creation, through the judgment ordeal of Tertiary time ready to develop into the nations and kindreds and people and tongues of a new heavens and a new earth, only eight in number, out of an immensely dense population with which the Tertiary heavens and earth began its judgment scenes. And the testimony is recorded of tertiary time and of the tertiary creation that "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day." Gen. i. 31. Man was created in the wane of the cenozoic age, was adjudged "very good" along with the other cenozoic forms of life, yet he fell, by disobeying God's law; sin abounded, and only a remnant of the race was left by the Cenozoic execution to begin the subjugation of the earth.

The theory of the flood here given is not the generally accepted one. Volumes have been written on the universality of the flood, and perhaps as many against it. Some have deemed man's existence on the earth too brief to extend back to the Glacial Period, others claim that his advent on the earth antedates the latter, or even the middle portion of Tertiary time. According to the chronology of the Bible man had been an inhabitant of the earth only 1656 years when the flood came, which would run but a short distance into the tertiaries, while it is true, that with the advance of the ages towards their finality, the Divine Mind seems to become more conservative of the duration required for completeness. Thus the estimate has been carefully made that the time of Paleozoic, Mesozoic and Tertiary duration, were relatively as is 1, 2, 3 and 1, yet each continued long enough to complete the designs of creative wisdom, and prepare the way for its successor. Near 6000 years have supervened of the present age; its prophetic type for the future age has been revealed, and its lengthening shadows proclaim the approach of its evening cadence, yet no one, well-informed, can believe its duration will equal that of its immediate predecessor. Each age becomes shorter and more incisive as we approach the perfection of the Divine plan.

Arguments innumerable have been brought to bear against the Bible history of the flood; and against the possibility that an ark of the size of that built by Noah, holding two and two, or sevens, of all the fauna of the earth, as described, would have been large enough to contain them, but when it is remembered that the dry land areas were less than one-third of the earth's surface, and that the Arctic Ocean overflowed the continents from the north, and that these waters were augmented by all the waters above the canopy in aerial suspension, thrown down in the short space of forty days, credulity is not over-wrought to admit the truth of a universal deluge. When, too, we recollect that, not two and two, or by sevens, of all the subdivisions of species, were saved with Noah in the ark, but that a typical pair representing an entire class, and mayhap an entire branch, of the animal kingdom, and that the subdivisions into Orders, Families, Genera and Species have since in a great measure occurred, in relation to the present age fauna, incredulity is weakened, and God's word stands vindicated in the mind of the most skeptical. Space forbids further consideration of this interesting question at present.

"THE LAST DAYS." No. 4.

And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come. Matt. xxiv. 14.

From previous articles the reader will have learned that we do not regard "the last days" as the end of probation, or as some think the end of the world. The Bible does not teach such a doctrine. We read in God's word that "the earth abideth for ever," Eccl. i. 4; and that God "has established the earth, and it abideth," Psa. cxix 90. It has been given to the sons of men for a dwellingplace; and though "evil doers shall be cut off, yet those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth;" "the righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever," Psa. xxxvii. 9, 29. "The last days," then, do not refer to the literal burning up of the earth, and the destruction of this planet, but rather to the closing days of the present dispensation, and the introduction of a new era, called "a new heavens and a new earth." This will be a new order of things which will obtain on the earth—the heavens (Christ and the saints) ruling in righteousness the nations upon earth. Psa. lxvii. 4; Acts xvii. 31. Thus all the nations will be blessed in Abraham and his seed. The last days are not the last or end of all earthly things, but of this old order or state of things in which evil men have had the rule and governed the world according to their own wicked lusts. And we witness rejoices at the prospect of the end of evil, and the exaltation of truth and justice in the earth? And though the end of wicked governments may involve much distress, misery, and calamity among the people, yet the era of blessedness beyond will far overbalance the evils of the present.

We have assumed while writing on this subject that "the last days" refer not only to the end of Gentile rule and dominion, but also to the last end of the indignation or tribulation of the Jews; and we might add the close of the Christian dispensation. Some are curious to know when these days will commence, if not already begun; and ask whether there are any data given in prophecy on which we can rely for a correct answer. Some expositors of the prophetic word finding certain dates given, especially in the prophecies of Daniel and John, have endeavored to set the time for the Lord's second advent. We all know how miserably they have failed. These interpretations have all been founded upon the year-day theory. We never had much confidence in this method of reckoning, and now have less than ever. When the disciples inquired of Jesus—"When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the age?" Matt. xxiv. 3; he did not give them dates, but rather what we call signs of the time. They were told to "watch, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come;" and to be "ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." We are not aware that there is any time given for the beginning of the last days, or of "the time of the end." Consequently none for the parousia, or secret presence of the Lord, when he will take both dead and living saints to himself; and no set time for his apocalypse in power and great glory.

Let us look at our Lord's reply to his disciples, as to when these things will be. The answer given we regard as having a two-fold application—first to the destruction of Jerusalem, the temple, and the captivity of the people, within about forty years after the prophecy was given; and second, to another destruction at the end of the age, when "all nations will be gathered against Jerusalem to battle," Zech. xiv. 2. There was great tribulation at the time when Titus, the Roman general, besieged the city, etc., and we read that there will be also in the future a time of great trouble, when Michael shall stand up for a deliverance of Daniel's people. Dan. xii. 1. This last unparalleled trouble will be at "the last end of the indignation," Dan. viii. 19. "The gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come," Matt. xxiv. 14. Paul testifies that the gospel had been preached to every creature, when he wrote to the church at Colosse, from Rome in A. D. 64. This was before the end of the Mosaic order of things, which then waxed old, and was ready to pass away. The full end has not yet come. There are intimations given that before this is reached, that this gospel of the kingdom will be preached to all nations. Those called Christian nations have a gospel preached to them was but it is a spurious gospel. It is necessary that the gospel in its purity and simplicity should once more be proclaimed authoritatively. See Rev. xiv. 6, 7. This gospel is to be preached after the firstfruits unto God and the Lamb have been gathered, and before the fall of Babylon, and the pouring out of the vials of wrath upon the beast, his throne, dominion, and worshipers. Then the harvest will be reaped by the Son of Man, at his coming. "The hour of judgment" will be announced in connection with the good news of the kingdom. That it is called in Isa. lxi. 2, the "day of vengeance of our God." When Jesus read this prophecy in the synagogue at Nazareth, he only read as far as "to preach the acceptable year of the Lord," then he closed the book, and sat down. But he was anointed to proclaim the gospel and the day of vengeance. He left the proclamation of "the hour of judgment," till the last times. The result of this angelic proclamation, as given in Rev. xiv., will be, that many will be gathered together by the reaper, (called the harvest of the earth,) of those who have heard this message, and received the good news concerning the kingdom, and who also have refused fealty to the beast and his image. See Rev. xiii. 16–17. Some of these who have sealed the testimony with their blood, are called "Blessed," by a voice from heaven; "Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them," Rev. xiv. 12. And why are these blessed? Because they will have a share, lot, or portion in the first resurrection—they will be among the blessed and holy, who will live and reign with Christ for a thousand years. On such, the second death has no power. Rev. xx. 4–6. While others of this harvest, both Jew and Gentile will be blessed as the invited guests to the marriage supper of the Lamb, those will have the privilege to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God. See Rev. xix. 8; Isa. xxv. 6–8. Then the vine of the earth will also be reaped and cast into the wine-press of the wrath of God. Joel iii. 13, 14; Rev. xiv. 16–18; Isa. lxiii. 1–6. The pouring out of the seven vials of wrath symbolize also this "hour of judgment" upon the wicked.

In our opinion the proclamation of the three angelic messages of Rev. xiv. are placed between the coming of the Savior for his bride, and his coming with her. This is truly "the time of the end," "the last days"—the last week of Daniel's seventy weeks—when Jewish affairs under the old order will cease, when Gentile times will end, and Gentile feet no longer tread Jerusalem in the dust—and when human governments will fall before the rising empire of the Son of Man. The question still forces itself upon us as to the time when these things shall be. We have no evidence yet that the Lord has come, even secretly, and taken away his people; consequently, according to our view, we have not yet entered upon the last times. The indications are, however, that we are closely verging upon them. The Jewish fig-tree is beginning to bud. The Jews are taking greater interest in their fatherland than they did only a few years ago. The persecutions they have experienced in Russia and other countries have driven thousands of them into Palestine, and they are now establishing colonies in different parts of the land. The great interest being taken by various nations in visiting Bible countries, and especially the Holy Land, as it is called, is an indication of some great change in the near future. We read in Psa. cii. 13–16. "Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion, for the time to favor her, yea, the set time is come. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof.... When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory." No expositor can be safe to follow who ignores the Jews, or what pertains to them, or who appropriates what belongs to them, and applies it to what they call spiritual Israel. Our Lord's prophecy in Matt. xxiv is Jewish from beginning to end. Yet some have taken "the tribulation of those days" to be the persecutions of the little horn of Daniel vii. against Christians; and the darkening of the sun and moon, and the falling of the stars, phenomena which occurred in the United States a long time ago, as signs for Christians to tell them of the coming of the Lord. These signs were to occur "after the tribulation of those days." "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth (land) mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Those who will see this coming will be in the land of Israel, (not in the United States,) where he will appear the second time. "And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east," Zech. xiv. 4. Natural phenomena will accompany his advent. Christ will feel his electric tread and divided into two parts, opening up a large valley eastward from Jerusalem; the heavens and the earth shall shake, Joel iii. 16; Hag. ii. 6, 21; Heb. xii. 26; Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xvi. 26; flaming and devouring fire, tempest, hail, overflowing rain, thunders and lightnings will also attend his coming, Psa. l. 3; xcvii. 3; Isa. xxx. 30; 2 Thess. i. 7, 9; also the darkening of the sun and moon, and a fall of stars (or meteors), Joel iii. 15; ii. 30, 31; Matt. xxiv. 29. The sun was darkened without an eclipse when Christ hung upon the cross, and another literal darkening may take place at his coming; but we must look for all these things to occur at the proper time, and in the right place. Because an unmeasurable dark day occurred in New England over 100 years ago, and a shower of meteors was seen in some parts of America in 1833, it does not follow that they fulfil the predictions of Jesus. They are out of time and place, and could not be signs for the people intended. The facts only serve to show, that it is possible that a dark day, and a meteoric shower may be attendant phenomena at the coming of the Lord to deliver his people, the Jews, who are waiting for him to deliver them from all their enemies. It is at this time that Michael stands up for the political and literal resurrection of Daniel's people; this time is "the last end of the indignation"—the termination of "the time of the end." Then will the Son of Man "send his messengers with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather his elect from the four winds, from the one end of heaven to the other," Matt. xxiv. 31. The elect here spoken of are the Jews, not the church,—for when Christ comes, the church will be with him, and will not need any gathering. Then when the Jews are gathered, that is, such of them as are willing to receive the Crucified One as their Messiah, they will form the nucleus of the kingdom of God.

In closing these articles on "the last days," we desire the reader to read carefully what we have written, and if we have advanced anything not supported by the word of God, to reject it as unworthy of attention; but do not hastily reject a doctrine or an idea, because it may be out of the common range of thought, or not agreeable to the usual mode of interpretation. "Prove all things; and hold fast that which is good." And we leave this subject with this parting advice to both writers and speakers, copied from Paul's letter to Timothy—"Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth," 2 Tim. ii. 15.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 38.

HUMAN WILL AS OPPOSED TO THE DIVINE WILL.

GOLDEN TEXTS: "Then said one unto him, Lord are there few that be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able." Luke 13: 23, 24. "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." John 5: 40. See John 3: 16–19.

Q. What is human will power?

A. His purpose to do, or not to do, as he may deem proper.

Q. Is man free to act or not to act as he sees fit, or is his will under the control of the divine will?

A. It is free in its choice, for without freedom there can be no accountability; for the power that governs an act is the only responsible author of the act.

Q. What element may be said to constitute the basis of personal character?

A. Freedom of the will-power, since the power that controls the will, shapes the action and decides its character. If God exercises supreme power over the human will he makes the acts so resulting therefrom his own acts, since he thus reduces man to a simple machine.

Q. If God wills the salvation of all men, and his will is absolute, does it not follow that all men must and will be saved?

A. Such would be the result, as certainly as the return of a stone to the earth would result from gravitation.

Q. Has a stone any will?

A. It has none, it not being in itself an agent; it only acts as it is acted upon.

Q. Is a stone capable of any moral action?

A. It is not, since all its acts are caused by power belonging to other agents.

Q. Without will power can there be any moral action?

A. There can be none, since a moral act must be by an agent that can discern right and wrong, and be free to act out its own will.

Q. Do courts of justice act upon this principle?

A. They do, and it is the fundamental principle of criminal law. Let us illustrate. A murder is committed by shooting, with a gun, powder, ball and fire. Here are four things that were engaged in the murder, and yet neither of these is accused of any criminality in their acts. If the ball could answer, it would say, I was forced onward by the powder; the powder would reply, I was ignited by the fire and explosion is the law of my nature. The spark would reply, the friction of another object set me in motion, driving me into the powder; the finger is under the resistless control of the attribute of its own personality, called the will. If that will can shift all responsibility by being under the absolute control of another, and higher, that of the Almighty, then that higher agent is the author of the murder, and the only responsible agent. But as sin is the violation of law, and the will of God is the supreme law, then murder ceases to be a crime. In the illustration above given, have the ball, the powder, the fire or the gun any moral characters? They have none, since they have no will nor voluntary power of action, nor can they determine between right and wrong.

Q. Has the first will evolved any moral character?

A. No; since it was under the supreme control of a higher will.

Q. Can man be a moral agent, responsible for his actions, if his will is under the supreme control of a higher will?

A. No.

Q. Who possesses the only moral and responsible character here developed?

A. God himself.

Q. How can the salvation of all men be reconciled with the freedom of the will?

A. Only on the condition that all men desire, purpose, and will their salvation, which is not true. Few persons will or purpose to be saved, and if their salvation turns upon their own purpose and will, they cannot all be saved. Without man's own free will there can be no salvation, for in no other way is he a moral agent.

Q. Is Jesus the only giver of eternal life?

A. Jesus said, I am the way, the truth and the life, I am the resurrection and the life? Paul said, the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

Q. If Jesus is the only giver of eternal life, has he ever promised to any one an unconditional eternal life?

Q. Did Jesus promise eternal life to all mankind? If so, in what chapter and verse?

Q. Does he not offer life to all, as something that they can reject?

A. He treats man as a free moral agent, at liberty to form his own character?

Q. What does Paul mean in 1 Cor. 9:17?

A. He teaches that salvation is willingly received, not forced.

Q. What is taught in Psa. 110: 3?

A. The entire human race is not included, but "My people."

Q. What is taught in Isa. 45: 23–25.

A. Vs. 23 evidently teaches submission of Israel and not of all mankind, for in vs. 25 it is said, For in the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory.

Q. What then is taught as to salvation or eternal life?

A. Man is formed with ability to understand what God has revealed relative to eternal life. He has given him freedom of will and liberty of choice and ability to form his own character. He can choose life (eternal) or reject it. He will not be forced to have what he has rejected.

Q. If man's will is forced by one supreme will, would salvation make him happy?

A. It would not, since that state would be one of restraint and servitude?

On Thursday evening, July 5th, just before our social meeting, the Editor baptised a believer in the glorious gospel of the Son of God into the Divine name. The person was Miss Sarah Mabel Hobbins. Like Zaccheus, she is very small of stature, and though probably some taller than the celebrated Charles S. Stratton (Gen. Tom Thumb) or his little wife, Lavina Warren, she is but little higher than an ordinary chair. In the whole history of the administration of baptism here is nearly or quite an exceptional case. May she win a beautiful little gem of a crown in the future kingdom of her Lord.

THE Chicago Evening Journal of July 9th, says: "In the course of his weekly address before the Anti-poverty Society at New York last night, Dr. McGlynn said: 'Some day there will be a tremendous revolution which will eclipse the French uprising, and in which the people will rise up in their wrath at the interference of these dictators, and bayonet and club these monks and priests and archbishops, the Pope and Cardinals. This is the way the Lord will deal with them, so I leave them to his mercy.' This was wildly cheered." All we now have to add is, that the harlot city, Great Babylon, is nearing a dreadful doom. Let those that are within her pale escape for their lives, as Lot out of Sodom, and let those outside keep out of her schools, nunneries, and ecclesiastical fellowship. Do not fail to read very carefully what we are now republishing from H. Grattan Guinness' book, "Rome and the Reformation."

LIKE the question of slavery, which produced an "irrepressible conflict" that nothing short of war could settle the Roman question is becoming one of startling significance. To say the least, an agitation has commenced that is not likely to be quelled very soon. As we have alluded to the incisive strictures on Romanism by the Editor and correspondents of the Primitive Catholic we feel disposed to give our readers two short letters published in the last number of that Journal.

The first writer says:—

Bro. Walsh:

Enclosed find $2.00 to help you in the paper. Dear Bro. I want to do God's will, and if the time is nigh when Great Babylon is to come in remembrance before God to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath; I want to see the word of God fulfilled. I want to see everything brought into subjection to Christ and the remainder under his feet. For true and righteous are his judgments. I pray that we may go as far as God would have us go in 'rewarding her' and no more. The ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore and make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire;' Rev. xvii. 16. I expect to see it done as it is written. Lord, help us to do as thou would'st have us do; battling with no other weapon than the 'Word of God' in his Spirit. Amen."

The writer above writes from Suncook, N. H. The next writes from Boston, Mass., and says:—

Dear Friend:

Please find amount for subscribers for Primitive Catholic. There seems to be no stop to the Reformation Revival. Many are turning from a Pagan worship to Christ. The fire kindled against the adversaries of our land and liberty grows hotter. I am amazed at the silence of Rome. The people are turning while others are in awe, thinking on these things. The hoops are slipping from the old barrel, and its staves are tumbling. I have just written to Father Chiniquy requesting him to come on again, if it is but for a day. I opened at Cambridgeport yesterday. The very air seemed to throb with this new gospel life. The people were in a whirl of emotion. May God start another great Revival among the Roman Catholics in New York and Brooklyn, and may Everett Hall become the first torch to light up the path of our coming Lord. You have many friends here. Yours,

J. H. ARMSTRONG."

The last writer is connected with the Free Press. So it seems some are escaping from the destructive delusions of Romanism. May more see God's truth.

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUTHFUL INVALID.

To the majority of mankind the season of childhood and youth is like the bright spring morning, when every opening flower exhales its sweetest incense, when woodland and meadow are enrobed in living green, when copse and thicket echo the love-notes of the song-bird, when every drop that hangs on the spray is a shining jewel, and when all the beauties below are overarched with the stainless blue of the beautiful dome above. The present thrills the young heart with rapture, and the whole future vista seems hung with "joy behind joy in endless perspective." If a cloud gathers the Sun soon weaves its own seven-fold splendors into the falling mists—that glad prophecy of a tomorrow of cloudless sunshine. And even when maturer years have brought the burden and the heart-ache, the tears of sorrow over the graves of the loved and lost in death, how then the saddened heart of age turns back with its irrepressible longings to those swift sweet years that fleeting time so soon—too soon, alas!—stole away from us to leave us an after life through a vale of tears.

"O how those long-lost hours we mourn, Never, never to return."

But it is not to every youth and child that a short happy spring dawning of life is allotted.

To some life's morning is a morning of a gloom so deeply cloudy that it never merges into the hours of sunshine. With some life seems so reversed that the deep twilight gloom of the coming night obscures the very dawn, and the cradle itself rocks in the chill shadow of death. Such, to a great extent, was the experience of our young friend and brother who today sleeps the quiet sleep of death in the casket. In his youthful heart the pulses of health and life never beat strong and high. It is indeed sad for age to list the stealthy foot-falls of coming death; but now more than sad for the young heart to have the grim spectre for the constant every hour companion of a youthtime. Where most young persons are permitted to drink the cup of sweets it fell to the lot of our dear young brother to drain a draught of mingled gall and wormwood. In the Christian course it was his to suffer, rather than to labor in the vineyard of his Lord. While other young disciples were privileged to meet, sing, and rehearse God's goodness and the Redeemer's dying love, and, from time to time, gather round that memorial table and its emblems, with all the mingled emotions of a heart-felt sorrow and a heart-felt joy, it fell to the lot of him we mourn over today to muse in his silent loneliness—waiting and weeping apart from the gathering household of faith. But now "life's fitful fever is over," the bitterness of death is passed, and he sleeps till "the voice of the archangel and the trump of God" shall break his slumbers. O, well do we remember the gathering on the river's brink a little over two years ago when we took his emaciated hand and led him down into the flowing stream, and then placed his fragile form beneath the yielding waves of Yellow River. O, holy baptism; type and symbol of resurrection life. In blessed similitude of his own burial and emancipation from the grave the Redeeming Savior was once placed beneath old Jordan's parting waves; so faith in the once buried but now risen Jesus led the one, whose demise we weep, to express that faith in noted likeness and similitude of his own resurrection at the last day. Darker waters than the waters of Yellow River have now closed over the breathless form of the one whose narrow span of life was a life of weakness and suffering. Our feeble hands that raised him up from under the waters of Yellow River are powerless to raise him from the submerging floods of death.

But there is One coming who has said in four-fold repetition concerning the true believer, "I will raise him up at the last day." The keys of death, and of Hades—death's dark prison—are in the hands of one strong to deliver and mighty to save. Then while we commit the disease-wasted form—dust to dust—we, at the same time, commit the departed into the hands of everlasting love to sleep till the gospel day shall close—till the church shall have completed its labors in this world—that sweet sleep in Jesus from which none ever wakes to weep.

While we must hesitate to speak at all concerning an intermediate state of bliss, and be content with pointing our hearers forward to the resurrection of the dead as the time for entrance upon the immortal, incorruptible, perfect and glorified state of existence, yet we rejoice to direct the attention of all to the heart cheering assurance that, as Christians, "our life is hid with Christ in God; and that when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." Our hope causes us to aspire to be like Christ, the risen head of a body to be raised in the likeness of the glorified head—and glorified in the same way—through the resurrection. It is for that change that will transform our sin-humiliated bodies into the likeness of our Lord's most glorious body that we yearn. An eternal life is only in and through Christ, we must be created anew to secure an everlastingness of existence.

In Christ's personality our human nature has been made divine, and in him exalted to the very pinnacle of glory, and this exaltation was through the resurrection from the dead. It is in the same way that the whole family of the redeemed will become the "angel-equals." We cannot glorify the death-state. The dark shadow that death has projected across the universe once eclipsed the "Sun of Righteousness" for three gloomy days, rolling out, at the same time, the light of the great orb of day in pitchy blackness. Tiny stars, then, can never shine through a shroud that obscured the Sun of Glory itself. If the death-shade eclipsed the Sun it will eclipse the Stars. If in his death-state the Son of God did not ascend into the heavenly glory of his Father, the saints must not expect to ascend there while in their death-state. We prefer, then, to be silent about the intermediate state of the dead, and point to Christ in his resurrection glory as the high type and sample of what redeemed man is to be in his future life beyond the grave. The same of glory is to be like him.

To our living hearers we have to say that our steps are fast tending graveward, and we, too, must soon be numbered with the silent multitudes in "the land of darkness as darkness itself, and without any order; and where the light is as darkness." Before God "our days are but as a handbreadth, and our age as nothing." How important then that we apply our hearts to wisdom during those few fleeting days. If we must be brought under the power of death before the coming of the Life-giver, O, may we fall asleep in Jesus to waken in his likeness when the "voice of the archangel and the trump of God" shall call the church of God to "rise and meet the Lord in the air, and so be ever with the Lord." Should we be alive and remain, as a "left-over" part of that church, it will then be ours to be transfigured in time's briefest moment into the heavenly likeness of the glorified Lord, and ascend to him with the rejoicing from the dead.

To the bereaved relatives we have some words of consolation to offer by way of comfort. The weary sufferer is at last at rest. The headache and the heartache are done. There is no longer a call for the kind ministrations of love. Though death has placed the head upon its last pillow, it is a pillow of repose. In the long ago holy seers caught the distant glimpses of coming glory across the lengthened line of dispensations of trial, but the slow-stepping ages have passed in solemn procession away till prediction is about to become realized in wonderful fulfilment. The coming of the Lord now draweth nigh. There are only a few sad tears more to fall above the graves where hearts of love below have wasted to the dust. The soft hand of that coming Lord will wipe all tears away. For the outbursts of grief we shall soon hear the shoutings of the redeemed. Glory be to God, the Church is almost home. Soon, O soon will be brought to pass the saying, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

"Fly swiftly round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day."

Note. In the above we have reproduced nearly verbatim that part of the funeral discourse delivered June 10, 1888, in Plymouth, on the occasion of the death of Israel S. Taber, which was in manuscript, and which related more particularly to the personal history of the departed brother. As the latter part of our discourse was delivered extempore we can only reproduce the ideas and line of thought in somewhat different language. In this form we present the discourse to our readers as well as to some who desired to see it in print.

We acknowledge the receipt, from the management of the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley, of a complimentary press season ticket. It opened July 4th and closes on October 27th, 1888. Nothing has been omitted that will contribute to the interest of the affair, and the occasion will be a memorable one in the history of the country.

IS THE BIBLE A SUFFICIENT GUIDE TO SALVATION.

While it shall be the effort of the writer to sustain the affirmative of this question, he is well aware that at the very beginning there are those who are ready to present an opposite view, and insist that unless aided by an Omnipotent Power, it is a matter impossibility to arrive at just conclusions in this matter. The object of taking this stand, is to prove to those who too readily accept the current run of thought and conviction, to consider if they will, in the light of God's word, what is true in this, as well as all other questions. To the shame of the Christian world, it can be said, that a following after what men, in and out of council have said, has led to the sad spectacle before us,—infidelity rampant! Why should it be a matter of wonderment, that a love of ease, having forms of faith and a liturgy, with well paid clergy, and the State in favor; that it should lull men into security, and do for them that which really is theirs to do?

The ever seeming thought is, to those who think, "To whom shall we go?" Some, evidently answer this by going to Rome, or the "Established" Church; some are content to accept the "settled question" of less pretensions Bodies, but all these agreeing that a thought out and a wrought out system, saves a great deal of trouble, and besides all this, it is pleasant to be on the side of the majority!

The Potentates of earth have called around them such as shall do their bidding; and if not, then "off with their heads!" In matters of government as well as religion, there has always been those who for place and "brief authority" have willingly lent themselves! If the king has said, bread is not bread, and wine is not wine, his minions in church matters have endorsed the declaration, and woe, or loss of head to such as shall dare to differ therefrom!

Setting aside all human, and of necessity, fallible conclusions, what and where is our remedy as to a settlement of the question, not so much as to authenticity, this being admitted, but as to the authority of the Book of the Protestant, the Bible?

Is the Bible then, a significant guide? or in order to an understanding of the same must some extraordinary influence come to bear upon us, thus enabling to a correct view to an infallible understanding? If the Bible as it is, and read as it should be, a revealing of the mind of God, admitting, as we must, that in its translated form, we have the embodiment of the Divine mind, why search further, or wait on extraordinary influxus? In a word, the Bible is it is not, the expression of the full and determined mind of God! Taking the book as it is, and the religious world as it is, I cannot but see a want of consistency on the part of those whose creed is the Bible, when about to discourse in an orderly manner, having pondered on the "things written," when invoking the blessing of God on the preached word, which is all right, that they should ask for "the Holy Spirit" as an added factor. It seems to me, if they purpose telling over that which God has already made known, they are but echoing the will and mind of God, and this is the Holy Spirit's teaching. I hear this request for the "Holy Spirit" come from those who claim to speak, not "after the traditions of men," not in accordance with a body of divinity formulated and subscribed to, but as simple believers in God's word "a sufficient guide" into the truth!

If scholarship, in a proper use of good Saxon English, shall enable the preacher to make plain, or by ornate diction, give refinements, as shall meet the taste of those, whose cultivated ears are better pleased, than to this there should be no objection! But let us not mistake good scholarship, or a natural use of convincing language, and call it "The power of the Holy Spirit."

The Mormon, Salvationist, Baptist, Methodist, Quaker and "Adventist," all alike are waiting on the "Holy Spirit" for extraordinary enlightenment, neglecting too often, alas too often, "the word of faith," the faith. Rom. x. 8-11. The question with me is, not what any man, however eloquent or lacking in eloquence he may be, shall say, even though he may claim "inspiration," but what has God said, and what are his proposals!

Permit a homely illustration: I receive a letter from a friend; every letter is plain, every word equally so, every sentence formed in accordance with the latest and best form of grammar; as a composition it is faultless! I read this letter to one who knows the writer as well as myself; but before reading the letter, I say, Now in order that we, or you shall understand this letter, let us pray for enlightenment! I will not say what he might say, but with the mutual knowledge we have of the writer, both believing him a man of truth, I should think I had made a great mistake in the proposal!

Has God inspired holy men of old? Is the canon of inspiration open or closed? Can we know more of God as to his plans and purposes? Are we at loose ends, waiting extraordinary enlightenment, not, by our own admissions, living up to the light (information) given?

Thus far I have hardly made the attempt to prove the position taken, by holy Scripture proof!

Had I thought the Scriptures stood opposed, I should not have dared what I have; and were it not to correct an error, it may be of education, it may be of sympathy in expression, (for we imitate more than we think we do!) these thoughts never would have been penned for other eyes than my own.

As, for many years in the past, so now and ever shall be, I give heed only to that which is written—the Bible. I will not have any man, however brilliant in elocution, fertile in his reasonings, erudite in scholarly attainments, whatever name he may bear or position hold, come between this book and me!

God has spoken, hear O Earth, and tremble at that word, for it is "living and energetic; it discerns the thoughts and the intents of the heart." Heb. iv. 12, 13. Do we need instruction? It is given in "Whatsoever things were written aforetime." Rom. xv. 4. The "Voice," and manifestation has come! Can we now hear that "Voice"? We can! Do we believe God has been manifested in flesh? it is on record. See 2 Peter i. 16-20; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 John iv. 2-3. Do we want to know who Christ is? See Math. xxii. 42-46; Matt. i. 18-25; Mark xii. 35, 36; Acts ii. 22-36. What converts? "The testimonies of the Lord." Psa. xix. 7-14; cxix. 97-104.

Just a word or two on 1 Cor. xii. 3. "No man speaking by the spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed," marg. anathema. Of course not, how could he, seeing this fountain did not send forth two kinds of water! "And no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Spirit." Those to whom the apostle Paul addressed himself, understood Paul better than he is now understood in this. All we can say in our day is, Yes, we also know Jesus to be the Lord, because he has proven himself such by his resurrection from the dead; and we ask no further proof; for he of whom David spake fills the requirements in the case. Therefore for us to say, in order to know Jesus as the Lord, we must have some "spirit" come upon us! The truth is, we need the childlikeness of children, and when the Father speaks, as he has, it is for us to hear. "Yes, Lord, thy servant heareth."

This subject is susceptible of great extension, taking the Bible as it is, drinking in the spirit of its testimonies, obeying its requirements, walking worthily, then the "Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Rom. i. 16. Which testimony is corroborated by the same writer to his son Timothy, 2 Tim. iii. 15-17, as also to the church at Corinth. 1 Cor. i. 17, 18.

Seeing then, that every available means is afforded us, do not let any who may read this, encourage "anxious benchism," there to wait on some undefined "influence" which is called the "Holy Ghost" in order to having sins forgiven! Simply accept Christ, and when this is done, you cannot fail, if you "Believe with the heart" to know all the Scriptures revealed concerning him. "With him we have to do."

Dear Restitution:

I am in receipt of a private letter from Brother N. B. Bandy, who resides at El Paso, Texas, and I think some thoughts therein presented are worthy of a wider circulation than they can get by remaining private. I have therefore had them copied out, and enclose them herewith. If you think them worthy of a place in THE RESTITUTION they are at your disposal. Yours in the hope,

SOLOMON T. BLESSING.

I have been giving some thought and study to Christ, and as to how he was always with the Father, as stated in John i., viz: "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God." "I came down from heaven." "Before Abraham was, I am." And many Scriptures conveying like ideas as to his eternity. In Heb. vii. 8, 10, it is stated that Levi paid tithes in Abraham; this was before his grandfather, Jesus, was born, and as stated, he was yet in the loins of Abraham. Now in Scripture language he is shown to have acted through Abraham. In the same way we were present and ate of the forbidden fruit, and were condemned in Adam, we being in the loins of Adam. (You understand that the father is the progenitor of the children), so all the world was in Adam's loins when he was made as he is, the father of the world; but Jesus had his paternity in God and not in Adam, therefore he did not eat of the forbidden fruit, and was not condemned in Adam. He was of the spirit begotten, and had not his in the earth as Adam had. If I may so speak without being thought irreverent, Jesus was in the loins of his Father from all eternity, just as we were in the loins of Adam when he ate of the forbidden tree, but had no more actual existence than we had. He said, "Ye are from beneath, I am from above; ye are of this world, I am not of this world." "Before Abraham was I am." "All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made." "He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not." "He came unto his own, and his own received him not." So Jesus being of the spirit origin and not earthly, he was with the Father when he made the world and all things in it, and just as Levi paid tithes in Abraham, he, Jesus made the world and all things therein. Just so he and the Father are one, and, "My Father is greater than I." So he could ascend up where he was before. So he had glory with the Father before the world was. So he was rich, yet became poor. So he took on the seed of Abraham. But at the same time that he was present with the Father when all these things were done, he had no more actual existence at the time than Levi had when he paid the tithes in Abraham, or we, when we ate the fruit in Adam and were condemned in him.

Orthodoxy can see from the Scriptures that Jesus existed in spirit anterior to his birth, and they made that spirit existence the Christ, while Paul showed that Jesus, who was born of Mary, was the Christ. They claim that the spirit with which Jesus was anointed was the Savior, and that Jesus, the one anointed, was simply the body that the Savior dwelt in, thus nullifying the word. When Jesus was anointed with the spirit he became the Christ. He had no power until he was anointed with the spirit at his baptism. If he had not, the filling him with the spirit at that time was a work of supererogation. The spirit was given to him without measure. It is the spirit of God that gives life to all animated nature, so when the spirit is withdrawn they die and return to their dust; but this spirit is only sufficient to sustain the life in the creature, therefore it is by measure. But when Jesus received the Holy Ghost he received it without measure, thus he received the power of God which is the Holy Spirit, and thus he could perform miracles. So could the apostles when they received the Holy Ghost or power of God. Thus we see that the Holy Spirit was a gift and could not descend from the apostles.

Well brother I think this will give you some food for thought, and may be you can bring out the ideas more clearly than I have done. It appears to my mind to be a reasonable solution of the many Scriptures which have always presented some difficulty in getting a clear understanding of how Jesus could have come down from heaven, and of his going back to where he was before. May the Lord guide us into all truth.

Great Flood in Mexico.

An extraordinary flood has occurred along the line of the Mexican Central Railroad, involving a loss of probably 700 lives and a large amount of property. A telegram dated June 26 says, telegraphic communication has been interrupted for several days by the flood. During the past ten days the tablelands between the city of Mexico and Encantoza, have been visited by unprecedented rains. Every mountain rivulet along the Central Railway for more than two hundred miles has been converted into a destructive torrent, and the valleys present the appearance of lakes. Many cities and towns are inundated, and Leon and Silao have been partially destroyed. It began raining heavily at Silao June 17 and continued for some days. The Silao river broke into the north end of the town and passed through the streets with irresistible force. Most of the houses being of adobe, as soon as they were saturated with water began to collapse; about 300 were destroyed. The floods were most destructive in Leon. June 18, the river broke over the dikes and flooded the city. The houses crumbled away. On the night of June 18, in parts of the city apparently safe, people went to bed; the water increased so rapidly that it caught many in bed. Houses tumbled in rapidly, and the loss of life began, unparalleled in the history of any of the great inundations of modern times. As the buildings fell the unfortunate sleepers were either crushed to death or drowned. The rain continued, and the next day as far as the eye could reach was a mammoth lake, its waters surging in flight to the lower level. The site of the city could not be distinguished. On the afternoon of June 20, the rain ceased and the waters began to recede. It was estimated that 700 persons perished. Hundreds of bodies were recovered without counting any of the houses, under the ruins of which it is supposed there are many more. Many other towns are badly damaged, but loss of life is only reported from Leon and Silao. The state of Guanajuato and the Federal Government are aiding and succoring the victims of the flood. Nearly everybody in the towns named has lost friends or relatives and seen his earthly possessions disappear in a night. Telegrams received June 27 indicate that at least seven people in Leon alone were drowned; over 1,000 bodies had been recovered. It is said that in "some districts the drifting water is full of dead bodies." Measures are being taken all over Mexico to raise funds for the sufferers.

The attitude of the four great Powers of Europe has suddenly become invested with a new interest. France and Germany, armed to the teeth, stand growling at each other like two bulldogs, the bone of contention being the rich territory of Alsace-Lorraine. The diplomats of both countries are trying to form an alliance with Russia, and the latter power, anxious to push her armies still farther Indiaward without actual conflict with England, is negotiating with them with a view to ascertaining which is in the best position to help her. Meanwhile England, with almost an open revolution to watch in Ireland, and rumors of trouble with her channel neighbors to meet at home, is unable to do more than make a feint of heading off Russia, while casting about for a warlike and desirable ally, of which there are but few open to engagement. The outlook is not encouraging to the lovers of peace. —Chicago Evening Journal.

An exquisite portrait of Helen Keller, the wonderful little deaf and dumb blind girl of Alabama, is the frontispiece of July Wide Awake; and Sallie Joy White, in an illustrated article, "The Story of Helen Keller," gives details about this marvelous child that will interest old and young, schoolchildren and metaphysicians. Another very delightful piece of biography is the Monroe chapter in "The Children of the White House," the fine Presidential series which has been so long preparing for Wide Awake. Susan Coolidge has a fine old-world story, "Stella's Choice." John Burroughs, in "How To Observe Nature," tells some of his charming secrets. Geraldine Butts has a beautiful illustrated four-page ballad, "The Little Princess." Edward Everett Hale in "The Story of Boston Common" gives an account of "The Artillery Elections" when he was a boy. There is a capital coin collector's story, "The Red, Red Copper." Mrs. Humphrey tells "How To Keep Mosquitoes Away." Oscar Fay Adams writes the biography of the great French fairy-story-teller and politician, Laboulaye. Mrs. Leonowens describes "The Tsong Tsing Tsoo." In "Double Roses" Mrs. Sherwood draws a good picture of a fashionable New York rector and his parishioners, while Mrs. Crowninshield, in her serial, "Plucky Smalls; His Story," gives a rollicking experience among the boys on a training-ship and tells "how they executed Charlie Noble." Other delightful things "too numerous to mention." All for 20 cents. $2.40 a year. D. Lothrop Company, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

WAYELAND, ARK.

Dear Restitution:

We are going to have a camp meeting near this place, beginning on Friday night before the third Sunday in August. We want all the preaching brethren who love the appearing of our blessed Lord, and who are looking for his soon personal coming, to meet with us. The sole object of this meeting is to serve the Lord and preach the gospel of the soon coming King and kingdom. Therefore we want no debating or controversy during said meeting, and all who cannot meet with us for the sole purpose of worshipping the Lord, and preaching the gospel, and let others alone, will please stay at home. But to all those whose hearts are filled with love for God and his cause, we throw wide the door and bid you welcome. Come praying that the Lord may wonderfully bless our meeting. If any of the brethren have any tracts they can spare, please send them to us. We want to give every person one who comes to our meeting. Yours in the blessed hope,

T. J. DANIEL.

THE DANIEL FORVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 5.

It is claimed that the chair of St. Peter, the See of Rome, is made the head of the world; that it is not to be subject to any man, "since by the Divine mouth it is exalted above all." In the canon laws the Roman Pontiff is described as "Our Lord God the Pope," and said to be "neither God nor man, but both." But the climax of assumption, the key-stone of the arch of Papal pretension, is probably to be found in the celebrated "Extravagant" of Boniface VIII, the Unam Sanctam, which runs thus: "All the faithful of Christ by necessity of salvation are subject to the Roman Pontiff, who judges all men, but is judged by no one." "This authority is not human, but rather Divine.... Therefore we declare, assert, define, and pronounce, that to be subject to the Roman Pontiff is to every human creature altogether necessary for salvation." All these claims were incessantly and universally urged all down the centuries by the popes of Rome, and are still advanced, as boldly as ever, in official decretals, bulls, extravagants, decisions of canonists, sentences of judges, books, catechisms, sermons, and treatises of all kinds. There is no mistaking what they amount to. The pope claims Divine inspiration, his words are to be received as the words of God; no law can bind him, he is supreme over all; the very Scriptures derive their authority from him; implicit obedience to him is the only way of salvation. He is exalted above all, supreme over all nations, kings, emperors, princes, bishops, archbishops, churches, over all the world; he is as God on earth, and as such to be worshiped and obeyed. Let me quote from his own lips some of the great words of the little horn. The following language affords a mere sample of thousands of such Papal blasphemies.

"The greatness of priesthood began in Melchisedek, was solemnized in Aaron, continued in the children of Aaron, perfected in Christ, represented in Peter, exalted in the universal jurisdiction, and manifested in the pope. So that through this pre-eminence of my priesthood, having all things subject to me, it may well seem verified in me, that was spoken of Christ, 'Thou hast subdued all things under his feet, sheep and oxen, and all cattle of the field, the birds of heaven, and fish of the sea,' etc.; where it is to be noted that by oxen, Jews and heretics, by cattle of the field, pagans be signified; ... by sheep and all cattle are meant all Christian men, both great and less, whether they be emperors, princes, prelates, or others; by birds of the air you may understand angels and potentates of the heaven, who be all subject to me, in that I am greater than the angels, and that in four things, as afore declared, and have power to bind and loose in heaven, and to give heaven to them that fight in my wars; lastly, by fishes of the sea, are signified the souls departed, in pain or in purgatory. All the earth is my diocese, and I am the ordinary of all men, having the authority of the King of all kings upon subjects. I am all in all and above all, so that God himself and I, the vicar of God, have but one consistory, and I am able to do almost all that God can do. In all things that I list, my will is to stand for reason; for I am able by the law to dispense above the law, and of wrong to make justice in correcting laws and changing them. Wherefore if these things that I do be said not to be done of man, but of God, what can you make of me but God? Again, if prelates of the church be called and counted of Constantine for gods, I then, being above all prelates, seem by this reason to be above all gods. Wherefore no marvel if it be in my power to change times, to alter and abrogate laws, to dispense with all things, yea, with the precepts of Christ; for where Christ biddeth Peter to put up his sword, and admonishes his disciples not to use any outward force in revenging themselves, do not I Pope Nicholas, writing to the bishops of France, exhort them to draw out their material swords? And whereas Christ was present himself at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, do not I, Pope Martin, in my distinction, inhibit the spiritual clergy to be present at marriage feasts, and also to marry? Moreover where Christ biddeth us lend without hope of gain, do not I, Pope Martin, give dispensation for the same? What should I speak of murder, making it to be no murder, or homicide to slay them that be excommunicated? Likewise against the law of nature, item, against the apostles, also against the canons of the apostles, I can and do dispense; for where they in their canon command a priest for fornication to be deposed, I, through the authority of Sylvester, do alter the rigor of that constitution, considering the whole and bodies also of men to be weaker than they were then. After that I have now sufficiently declared my power in earth, in heaven, in purgatory, how great it is, and what is the fulness thereof in binding, loosing, commanding, permitting, electing, disposing, dispensing, doing, and undoing, etc. I will now speak a little of my riches and of my great possessions, that every man may see by my wealth, my purple mitres, crowns, gold, silver, pearls, and gems, lands and lord-ships. For to me pertaineth first the imperial city of Rome, the palace of the Lateran; the kingdom of Sicily is proper to me; Apudia and Capua be mine. Also the kingdom of England and Ireland, be they not, or ought they not to be, tributaries to me? To these I adjoin also, besides other provinces and countries, both in the occident and orient from the north to the south, those dominions by name. [Here follows a long list.] What should I speak here of my daily revenues, of my firstfruits, annats, palls, indulgences, bulls, confessionals, indults and rescripts, testaments, dispensations, privileges, elections, prebends, religious houses, and such like, which come to no small mass of money?.... Whereby what vantage cometh to my coffers it may partly be conjectured.... But what should I speak of Germany, when the whole world is my diocese, as my canonists do say, and all men are bound to believe; except they will imagine (as the Manichees do) two beginnings, which is false and heretical? For Moses saith, In the beginning God made heaven and earth; and not, in the beginnings.

Wherefore, as I began, so I conclude, commanding, declaring, and pronouncing, to stand upon necessity of salvation, for every human creature to be subject to me." (Fox; "Acts and Monuments," Vol. IV., P. 250). It is futile to allege that the Papacy does not make these claims and speak these great words against God, but in his name and as his representative. The answer is patent. This prophecy foretells what the power predicted would do, not what it would profess to do. Does the Papacy give God the glory, or does it glorify itself? Facts cannot be set aside by false pretenses. Satan disguises himself as an angel of light. The head of a Christian church would not overtly array himself against Christ; if he does so, it will be under semblance of serving him. (See Note 1).

The Papacy has abundantly branded on her own brow this particular of the prophecy—The boastful blasphemous claim to Divine authority and absolute dominion. It has assumed divine attributes, and even the very name of God, and on the strength of that name claimed to be above all human judgment.

5. Lawlessness was the next feature we noted in the little horn. We have given above some specimens of the Papal claims to set aside all laws Divine and human. "The pope has also annulled the only surviving law of paradise, confirmed by the words of Christ. The Lord ordained, 'What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.'

The pope ordains, 'We decide also that according to the second canons, the marriages contracted by priests and deacons be dissolved, and the parties brought to do penance.' The Papacy has further annulled the second commandment, given on the mount by the lips of God—in theory, by the childish and false distinction between heathen idols and Christian images; and in practice, by hiding it from the people, and blotting it out from the catechisms of general instruction. The Pope has further annulled the main laws of the gospel. He forbids the cup to the laity, although the Lord himself has commanded, 'Drink ye all of it.' He forbids the people of Christ, in general, to use the word of God in their own tongue; though Christ himself has charged them, 'Search the Scriptures.' He forbids the laity to reason or converse on the doctrines of the gospel; though St. Peter has commanded them, 'Be ye ready to give a reason of the hope that is in you.' The pope finally, sanctions the invocation of saints and angels; though St. Paul has warned us, 'Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshiping of angels;' though St. John has renewed the charge to the disciples of Christ, 'Little children keep yourselves from idols;' and an angel from heaven renews the caution, in his words to the same holy apostle, 'See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow servant, worship God.'" (Note 2)

6. Systematic and long continued persecution of the saints is one of the most marked features of the little horn of prophecy.

It is predicted that he should "wear out the saints of the Most High." His first great characteristic is blasphemous opposition to God; his next salient feature is oppressive cruelty towards men: and just as Christ allowed his people to suffer ten persecutions under the Pagan Emperors of Rome, so he allowed his faithful witnesses to be worn out by the cruelties of Papal Rome. "They shall be given into his hand." The church has to tread in the footsteps of Christ himself, who realized unto blood striving against sin, and was put to death by the power of Rome. She is called to the fellowship of his sufferings; and while they secured the salvation of our race, hers have not been unfruitful, for the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. But we must compare the facts of history with the prediction of prophecy on this point, to see how deeply this mark is engraved on the Papacy as on no other power that has ever existed in the earth. That the church of Rome and her Papal head have persecuted largely and long, none can pretend to deny; in fact, so far from denying it, Rome glories in it, and regards it as one of her great merits. Other nations have now abandoned as unsound "the bloody tenet of persecution." Rome retains it still, approves it theoretically, and would carry it out as vigorously as ever practically, if she could. Other powers have persecuted to a small extent and occasionally, in the past, but never systematically and by law throughout ages. All but Rome now hold religious liberty to be an inherent right of man. Rome has, on the other hand, persecuted on principle, and steadily from the seventh century right on to the French Revolution and to some extent almost to the present time. She does so still in the secret recesses of her nunneries and monasteries, under the name of penance. Why else does she require shops for the sale of instruments of bodily torture, such as exist this day in London? Rome's contention is, not that she does not persecute, but only that she does not persecute saints. She punishes heretics—a very different thing. The first would be wicked, the last she esteems laudable. In the Rhemish New Testament there is a note on the words "drunken with the blood of saints," which runs as follows: "Protestants foolishly expound this of Rome, because heretics are there put to death. But their blood is not called the blood of saints, any more than the blood of thieves or man-killers, or other malefactors; and for shedding of it no commonwealth shall give account." This is clear. Rome approves the murder of "heretics," and fully admits that she practices her principles. The question therefore becomes this, Are those whom Rome calls "heretics" the same as those whom Daniel calls "Saints?" If so, the identification of the Papacy is as complete in this respect as in all the previous points. In order to arrive to an answer to this question, let us take Rome's own definition of a heretic. The following statements are from authorized documents, laws, and decrees of the Papacy, dating from the time of Pope Pelagius in the sixth century, twelve hundred years ago. "Schism is an evil. Whoever is separated from the apostolic See is doubtless in schism. Do then what we often exhort. Take pains that they who presume to commit this sin be brought into custody.....not hesitate to compress men of this kind, and if he despise this, let him be crushed by the public powers." This, it will be observed, makes a want of perfect submission to the pope, even though no false doctrine or evil practice be alleged, a ground for persecution. Pope Damasus, whose election to the pontificate was secured by a hundred and thirty-seven murders, authorizes persecution of those who speak against the holy canons, and adds, "It is permitted neither to think nor to speak differently from the Roman church." This is one of the canons which it is blasphemy to violate; and he who ventures to differ, even in thought, on any point whatever from the Roman Church is therefore a heretic. Hundreds of decisions or detailed examples of heresy are all summed up in this one.

The Roman decrees everywhere supply similar definitions. Whatever is short of absolute, unconditional surrender of all freedom of act or word, or even of thought or conscience, is heresy. Every evangelical Christian in the world is therefore, according to Romanist canons, a heretic, and as such liable to "punishment." And moreover Rome frankly admits that it is only where she cannot in the nature of things carry out her ecclesiastical discipline that she is justified in refraining from persecution. The Papacy teaches all her adherents that it is a sacred duty to exterminate heresy. From age to age it has sought to crush out all opposition to its own [illegible] Papal Bible for persecution [illegible] humble. The fourth Lateran Council issued a canon on the subject, which subsequently became an official statement of cruelty.

Note 1. "Let us suppose a rebel in some distant province to forge the royal seal and handwriting, and pretend to act in the name of the sovereign. He then claims to himself entire and unreserved allegiance. He abrogates whatever laws he pleases, and enacts contrary ones in their room; he enforces his own statutes by the severest punishments against those who still adhere to the old laws of the kingdom. He clothes himself with the robes of state, applies to himself the royal titles, claims immunity from the laws, even of his own enacting; and pretends that all the statutes derive their sole force from his sanction, and must borrow their meaning from his interpretation. Last of all he banishes, strips of their goods, imprisons, and puts to death all those subjects who abide by the laws of the king and reject his usurpation. Surely, in this case, the pretence of [illegible] in the monarch's name [illegible] excuse, but aggravates the rebellion." It lessens greatly, it is true, the guilt of the deceived subjects, but increases, in the same proportion, the crime of the deceiver."

PRESENT PALESTINE.

The report of Mr. Gillman, the American Consul at Jerusalem, has recently reached the State Department, and the Time's correspondent has been allowed to take the following extracts from the document:

Palestine contains 257 villages. The population, in round numbers, would amount to 500,000 people, of whom four-fifths are poor fellahin or peasants, who have but simple and few wants. Even now within a few miles of Jerusalem men (Arabs) may be found dwelling in tents and caves; and the wild tent dwelling Bedouins still range the valley of the Jordan, the Government not being able to bring them completely into subjection or to drive them out.

The present population of Jerusalem is placed at 50,000, divided as follows: Hebrews 25,000; Christians, (native) 12,000; Mohammedans, 10,000; foreigners 3,000. On almost any day in Jerusalem may be seen 30 or more different nationalities represented on the streets, including Syrians, Hebrews, Bedouins, and other Arabs, Armenians, Copts, East Indians, Chinese, Turks, Samaritans, Egyptians, Abyssinians, Nubians, Algerians, Soudanese, Circassians, Albanians, Americans, English, Irish, Scotch, Germans, Russians, Austrians, Italians, Greeks, Dutch, Spaniards, Portuguese, Bulgarians, and Poles. These are not only found among the temporary visitors, but are permanent residents.

The grain harvest, except a few localities, has been good throughout Palestine—the best in ten years. But the fruit of the olive tree failed to a great extent. It is the characteristic of this tree to be more prolific in wet seasons. The Orange tree yielded only about one half the usual crop. The following table exhibits the prices paid in the Jerusalem market at the present date for grain, the higher prices indicates superior qualities: Wheat 70s to $1 per measure; barley 40s to 60s per measure; doura, 40s to 60s per measure; lentils, 60s to 80s per measure; sesame, $1 60 to $1.80 per measure. The measure of wheat would weigh about 48 pounds. Other products of the soil, such as the ordinary vegetables, have been abundant, and are in general of fair quality. The potato and turnip of the country are decidedly inferior. This occasions the transportation of the former from France, though it must be admitted that the substitute is far from what would be accepted in the United States as a good article, being heavy and of a poor flavor. It seems to me that shipments of American potatoes and apples to this country would prove remunerative.

The value of the harvest for the past year is about $2,740,000. There is a large variety of fruit cultivated, affording an important article of food. The poor laborer may be seen sitting on the street or the dusty roadside making his noonday meal on a cake of bread and a bunch of grapes and a handful of figs. The fruit, except apples and pears is generally of fair, if not excellent quality. The oranges and grapes are exceptionally fine.

There are about five hundred shops and stores in Jerusalem. The character of the business done is generally moderate, and, so far as large transactions are concerned, quite generally ever be said to be very brisk. Except for mechanics wages of workmen are remarkably low, being about the same as paid in Italy and other parts of Europe, as show by the accompanying statement: Wages of skilled workmen per diem, $1,80 to $2,40; wages of unskilled mechanics, 60 cents to $1.00; wages of farm laborers, 30 to 60 cents; wages of common laborers, 20 to 30 cents. These all find their food and every thing else required at this price.

The Drought Broken.

In the Herald of May 16 we spoke of there being great suffering in Jerusalem for want of water—"the latter rain" either having failed entirely, or been greatly delayed. Later advices represent the drought broken. In the May number of the Age to Come Herald Mrs. Alice E. Davis, writing from Jerusalem under date of April 11, says:

"The long-desired and prayed for rain came last Saturday, and never were poor people more rejoiced. It is a relief for a season. If no more falls, this, of course, will soon become exhausted; but there is still an appearance of more rain. This has truly been a hard experience for Jerusalem, such as her present inhabitants have never before witnessed. Speculators are as ready here to take advantage of every opportunity to make money at the expense of the poor and distressed, as in any other place. Flour and some other articles of food went up to fabulous prices.... The most affecting incident of the last two weeks has been to see the poor women take their young children to the sacred place, and lay them naked upon the bare stones, beseeching Almighty God to hear their cries for the sake of their innocent children, if not for their own sakes. There has been great distress in the land, as a famine was imminent."

Under date of April 26 she writes again:—"We have had quite refreshing rains. The hail-stones have injured the fruit in the city, but not in the valleys. Tourists are still coming, and the weather was never better for traveling. Vegetation is looking well, and the clouds are still heavy. More rain is expected."—Messiah's Herald.

Seeing the Holy Land.

Whether a visit to the Holy Land is pleasant or profitable, or otherwise, we believe depends in some measure on the expectations of the traveler. If he thinks only of the land as it must have been when God's ancient covenant people occupied it, and when for even their partial obedience they were receiving the favors of Heaven, he will be disappointed. But if he realizes that it is now a land consigned to Gentile down-treading and oppression because of sin; and expects to see there existing ancient customs, illustrative of Bible texts, and prophecy fulfilling in blasting instead of blessing, he may be greatly profited. That very much depends upon the standpoint one occupies in looking at a thing is well illustrated by a traveler's correspondence in the London Christian Commonwealth. He says:—

"From Bethany we went to Mount Olivet—the place our Savior seemed to love, the place where he wept over Jerusalem, the place from which he ascended into heaven. I spoke some time ago of my disappointment when I first saw Jerusalem. Had I first seen it from this point I should not have had those feelings. From here Jerusalem is grand, magnificent; I cannot find words to express what I felt as I stood on that historic mountain and gazed upon the City of God. I will make a digression here, and advise anyone who takes a journey through the Holy Land not to enter Jerusalem by the Jaffa Gate. Enter any way but that, for from any other road Jerusalem is imposing and beautiful. I wish I could describe it, but it passes my power to do so. Let the reader fancy, first of all, high massive stone walls encircling the summit and part of the slope of a hill, and then within that wall fancy houses of dazzling brightness, glowing beneath a burning sun; let him picture nearly all the house-roofs dome-like in shape, and all appearing of snowy whiteness, as they catch the bright rays of the sun. Then let him fancy two stupendous domes, dark in color, but likewise grand, towering above the surrounding buildings, even as Mount Hermon towers above Tabor. Let him think of this, and then remember the history of Jerusalem, its glory, its former greatness. Let him remember that here David was king, that here Solomon built his temple, that here God spoke to men, that here the Son of God taught, lived, died, and rose again, and then he will catch some idea as to how Jerusalem presented itself to me as I stood on Mount Olivet, bareheaded, almost entranced by the sight. How beautiful it looked as it lay there bathed in that enchanted atmosphere! How the Mosque of Omar shone in that exquisitely tinted mist! I shall never forget it; I do not wish to, for Jerusalem thus seen is more beautiful than my most extravagant idea.

"No wonder Christ wept over it; no wonder the Jews of old loved it, and sung its praises far and wide; no wonder they fought for it in the olden days, for then it must have been more beautiful than it is now; but evil shall slay the wicked and the wages of sin is death. This is true of cities as well as of men, and Jerusalem was in the olden days, even as now, 'outside clean, but within full of dead men's bones.'"

The Watkins' Wells Meeting.

The meeting at Watkins' Wells, Story Co., Ia., was a good one. There were between 40 and 45 of the brethren and sisters from different parts of the State present, while the outside attendance was fair considering the cold, rainy weather. On the last Sunday there were perhaps six hundred people present.

One brethren are waking up to the fact that we need more purity of life, more zeal for the truth, and more co-operation and system in its proclamation. We shall try to crystallize our forces and we hope you will hear of better work, more effective work in the future in Iowa.

Four persons were baptized into the body of Christ, all of them young; Miss Nancy Watkins, Miss Belle Watkins, Miss Lulu Cole, and Arthur Zench. Brother Watkins in a feeling prayer, dedicated his daughters to the Lord, and presented each of them with a silver dollar desiring that they should give it as their first offering into the Lord's treasury, which they did.

Brother R. J. Hill was with us and though unable to do much preaching, helped much in our social meetings, and on the last evening administered the communion after a feeling address on the scenes of our Lord's death and resurrection. Brothers Myers and Whitesitt and myself did the public speaking on the things of the kingdom and the name of Jesus Christ and the observance of all things Jesus commanded, so far as time and opportunity and our knowledge of the same permitted.

We were surprised to find many there whom we did not expect. And to those who were not there we say you missed a good meeting. There are always ripples upon the bosom of the lake, so to in our meeting there were ripples of difference upon surface thought, but the deep undercurrent of the way to the divine life and our duty flowed on in one channel. We will cherish none but the tenderest remembrances of the meeting as the years go by. May we all meet around the Flowing Well of Life in the paradise of God.

TO THE CHURCH OF GOD IN IOWA.

Dear brethren and sisters: we desire to call your attention once more to the letter and plan of work addressed you by the committee of evangelistic work for the State of Iowa, as published in THE RESTITUTION of June 27.

The action of the brethren at the Watkins meeting is fully set forth in the article referred to. Cut it out and preserve it, or save the number of June 27 for future reference. It is headed, "To the Brethren and Sisters of the Church of God in Iowa, Greeting."

The reason we wrote you this letter is this. There are many brethren and sisters scattered over the State who could not attend, and many others who never heard of the meeting, whose hearts are in the work and who would contribute to the fund if they are only assured that something would be done and that it would not all end in talk. We can assure you that the brethren are in earnest and determined that something shall be done. As an evidence that this is so we need only state that there is already pledged $108.66 of which $83.66 has been paid and is in the hands of the State Finance Committee.

Now if those who were not at the meeting will assist in sending the gospel over the State and subscribe as liberally as those who were there, we can raise at least two or three hundred dollars more. Brethren will you help? We are God's agents and must give an account of his money sometime.

The plan is a simple one. The committee will incur no debt. When the money is all used up the evangelist must stop work. Another feature of the plan is, none of the funds thus subscribed will be used for R. R. expenses. The evangelist will do but little travelling, and his travelling expenses must be paid by those who desire his services. This fund is used to pay his time alone, and when once in a locality he must remain there as long as there is a prospect of doing good. Heretofore we have done much travelling and but little work; we now propose to do but little travelling and much work, to canvass thoroughly the ground over which we pass. Experience has demonstrated the folly of the former methods.

Another point upon which the brethren were unanimous and agreed was that no one ought to expect that the preaching should be done in his locality. A spirit of philanthropy prevailed. We ought to sound out the word of life to others. Subscribe to the fund whether you are to hear the preaching or not. Subscribe, knowing that some one will get the benefit of it. Let us be liberal enough to say, and act upon it too, if my money shall be the means of placing a stone upon some one's brow I shall not be particular that he shall live even in my county, if by withholding that money the gospel is not preached to any. The committee will do the very best they can with the means in hand, and send the evangelist where the call is the most imperative.

Now dear brethren and sisters we appeal to you once more in behalf of the cause we represent, that you ought to help us. Give as God has prospered you, and do it willingly. And if those words come to those outside of our State lines, and you are not permitted to help spread the gospel where you are and feel that you ought to do something, remember it is a common cause, not confined by State lines, and all that you donate will be used for the spread of the gospel and will be thankfully received.

Don't lay this aside until you have determined that you will do something. Remember,

If you cannot give your thousands,
You can give the widow's mite,
And the least you do for Jesus
Will be precious in his sight.

And you will in no case lose your reward. Paul has written, "God loveth a cheerful giver." Anything given in a grudging, selfish spirit will accomplish no good. Read 2 Cor. ix. 6.

One more point. You can keep the work along by sending us a letter telling your needs, your prospects, and whether you want meetings held in your place. Those who want the evangelist during the fall or winter write us early, that we may arrange the evangelist's route with the least possible expense. Write now. Write of your whereabouts and send us the names and addresses of all the brethren within the State that you may know of. This is important to us in the sending of tracts, notices, papers and arranging for work. All donations, whether subscriptions or money, should be addressed to A. J. Eychaner, 103 W. State St., Marshalltown, Iowa, who is the treasurer of the committee. Letters concerning the work, letters of encouragement and brotherly love, letters containing information for the committee or our needs in any locality, desires for meeting, etc., will be welcomed and receive attention whether directed as above or to the Pres. or Sec. of the committee. Let us all work while it is called day. Shall we have your co-operation and help in the work before us? Yours in the hope, A. J. EYCHANER.

Poetry.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

Our Father, thou hast taught us thus to pray,
And as we lift our longing hearts to thee, our God,
At morning, noon, and evening of each day,
We come to thee, low bending with life's heavy load.

Thou knowest, Father, we so long to see
Thy kingdom come in all its power and glory,
That it is filled with all plans and dreams,
And is the burden of each prayer and song and story.

Till then we bear each cross, endure each pain;
Till then we suffer scoffs and jeers;
Till then come scalding tears and grief and shame;
Till then we bear it all, for then comes our reward.

And then the bitter cross shall be no more;
And then the New Jerusalem from heaven descends,
And then God dwells with men as never before;
And then tears, sorrow, pain and aches forever end.

Then, instant, in the twinkling of an eye,
At the sounding of the last mighty trump of God,
This mortal puts on immortality;
And death, the last enemy, is then destroyed!

Yea, we will daily wait, and watch, and pray
For thy coming and thy kingdom, our blessed Lord,
When thou shalt dwell with us for aye and aye,
And we shall reign with thee according to thy word.

Youth's Column.

THE GOOD WOMAN.

Dear Youthful Workers:

Did you ever see the pretty red stone they call a ruby? It is used to set in rings, sometimes whole necklaces are made of rubies.

But these pretty stones are so scarce that they cost ever so much money, maybe none of you have enough to buy one.

But you can all be rubies yourselves, that is you can be something a great deal better than a little stone; you can be good children. And then those who love you will think you are worth more than all the precious stones that they ever saw or heard tell of.

Would you not like to begin right now to grow good and wise and sweet?

King Lemuel's mother told him about a woman who was thought a great deal more of than rubies. You will find it in the last chapter of Proverbs. Her husband trusted in her because she was so true and good, and she knew so much that she was always pretty sure to say just the right words, and to do just the right things.

She was never ashamed of work, but was always busy at something. She helped poor, needy people, and was kind and pleasant to every body. Her home was filled with joy and peace and plenty.

I wonder how she came to be such a good woman?

I think it was because she learned to love and fear the Lord when she was a little child.

You will find the story of another good woman in Acts ix. 36. Her name was Dorcas, she spent her time in doing good. She loved to make clothes for poor people, and to help poor widowed women.

I want all you little girls to be good like these women, so that you will be more precious in God's eyes than rubies.

MANY CALLED BUT FEW CHOSEN.

One of those very cold mornings such as we have in Minnesota during the winter months, I was on my way to visit a family in H——where there had been sickness.

During their hours of recovery, they had enjoyed many of God's precious promises, made to them from his word. But doubts and fears troubled them when they saw their failures.

Mr. M. said to his wife, "You look distressed, what have you found in God's word, that makes you look so sad?" She said, "Did you ever notice the 14 verse of the 22 chap. of Matt.?" "No" he said, "I do not remember: will you please read it?"

So she took up her Bible and read, "For many are called but few are chosen." "Oh husband; what makes me sad is, I am afraid I have not been one of the chosen."

When I went in that evening they were silent and sad and I said "Are you not feeling as well as when I saw you last?"

"Oh yes, we are still mending," said Mr. M. but mother has been reading a little in the Bible today." His wife then said "Oh Mr. L. can you explain this verse pointing to Matt. xxii. 14.

I saw it a moment that doubts had crept in, so I took the book and read "For many are called but few are chosen."

I lifted a prayer in silence to God that the doubts might be cleared away.

I said to her, Mrs. M. supposing there were one hundred desperadoes, about ten miles from the place, and they were coming this way, and they had come many miles, killing and destroying everything in their path. It had come to such a pass that the whole country were in fright, and were coming to H. by scores, seeking protection, and to find ways and means to stop the dreadful work.

A citizen dispatches a message to the governor, stating our fears, the governor comes in a special train and all crowd around to hear what he will say. Some one provides a horse, and the crowd are told to form on the south side of the street. The governor tells of the desperate character of those who are coming with revolvers and knives and Winchester rifles that they carry; he keeps back nothing as he spreads the danger before them, and then he says "Now all those who will go and bring these men to justice, step out thirty paces." For a few moments all are silent as death, but there is a man to the right, stepping with measured steps, a very small and weakly man.

Some might smile and say "What can he do?" but he has heard the call and comprehended the danger, it is evident that he understands what he is doing.

Now they begin to step out thicker and faster, until 250, 260, 280, are out, then they come slower; but at last they number 300 and it seems that out of that vast multitude no more will come.

Now Mrs. M. which will the governor choose to bring those desperate men to justice, the 300 on the one side, or the large crowd on the other?"

"Why" she said, "he would choose the 300."

I said Mrs. M. are you sure he would take the 300? See what a crowd of fine large men and so many more on the other side."

"Yes, but I am sure he would take the 300."

"Why?"

"Because, when the governor called them, they came."

"But Mrs. M. did he not call those on the other side?"

"Yes, but they did not choose to go."

"Then Mrs. M. those whom the governor chose were those who chose to go."

"Certainly."

"Now Mrs. M. when God through his mercy brought you to see your lost condition, when Christ cried 'Come unto me,' did you surrender all and go?"

"O yes and I will remember it."

"And you chose to go under his leadership?"

"O yes I see it all, I see it all!"

"Now Mrs. M. let us look at it again. In God's precious word, John vi. 37, All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. Also I Pet. i. 3-5. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time."—J. E. L., in Glad Tidings.

Obituaries.

Coffin.—At his residence in Center Township, Starke Co., Ind., May 22, 1888, M. L. Coffin, aged 54 years, 5 months, and 8 days.

M. L. Coffin was born in Clark Co., O., Dec. 14, 1833. Emigrated with his parents to Starke Co., Ind., in the year 1847, where he spent his youthful days in the advantages and disadvantages of a pioneer life of Starke. He was married to Miss Mary McComber, July 14, 1857. In the year 1876, under the labors of Father Logan, he and his wife became converts to the soon coming of the Lord and life only through Christ. He lived a consistent Christian, and died in the full assurance of faith in a glorious resurrection when Jesus comes. His deeds of hospitality will not soon be forgotten by his friends nor by the wayside traveller. He leaves a wife, four sons, three daughters, three brothers, three sisters and many friends to mourn his loss. A large concourse of people conveyed his remains to the Fletcher Cemetery where they laid him away to rest till Jesus comes to awake the sleeping dead. Owing to circumstances, the funeral services were postponed till June 24th, when the writer spoke words of comfort to the friends and a full congregation from 1 Cor. xv. 21.

Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep.

BOOKS.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

The Coming King—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Wetherbee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphy and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many other tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming King is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in Biblical history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells in concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the facts of current events. It discloses the never-resting hand of God in the history of the world, and shows that the same hand is at present at work shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that the supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the acts of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty, and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for the work.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has come to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will obtain them like the dragon. Politicians are already alluced or subsidized the Press. The pulpit and the platform are to follow. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party came to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost took the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional.

—BY—

FATHER CHINIQUY.

ITS REVELATIONS ARE APPALLING.

Painful and horrible are words too weak to express the things which he relates — things enough to cause the planet to cry out against a system which brings forth such apples of Sodom and deadly poison to the Church, the family and society.

Cloth, 16mo, 326 pages, with Portrait and Biographical Notice of the Author; Price $1.00.

FIFTY YEARS —IN— THE CHURCH OF ROME.

—BY—

CHARLES CHINIQUY.

A handsome volume of 382 pages, printed in clear type, on fine tinted paper. It is bound in strong cloth, marbled edges, and gilt stamp on side and back. Contains two portraits (one representing him in priestly robes) of the author.

There is no book upon the Roman controversy so comprehensive as this. It is a complete review of the inner workings, aims and objects of Popery. It is from the experience of a living witness, and challenges contradiction. It is a large but very valuable work, and is fast becoming a standard authority. Six editions were sold in one year, and large orders are being daily received for the present and 8th edition. The book commends itself to the American people, and colporters of liberty everywhere.

The book contains, among other startling revelations, thrilling chapters on, The Bible and the Priests of Rome; the Confession of Children; Testimonies in a Parsonage; Protestant Children in Convents; the Trade in Married Nuns and Education; the Miracles of Rome; Murders and Trades in Quebec; Pajineau and the Poisons; Perversion of Dr. Newman; Grand Dinner of the Priests; the Abomination of Auricular Confessions; Some of the Thousand Acts of Folly and Idolatry which form the Life of a Monk; the Vow of Celibacy; the Impurities of the Theology of Rome.

We have secured a supply of this book, and can fill orders direct. If you wish to inform yourselves as to the inside working of Romanism, send us $2.25 and you will receive the book postpaid at once.

We can also furnish Mr. Chiniquy's other work, "The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional." A cloth bound book of 326 pages; price $1.00 postpaid.

Also "Romanism—the Danger Ahead," by A. J. Grover; contains 198 pages; cloth binding, 75 cts., postpaid.

The three ordered together we will send for $2.50.

THE DANIEL PREVIEW OF ROMANISM, No. 6.

For long ages it was held and taught universally that whoever fell fighting against heretics had merited heaven. Urban II. issued a decree, acted on, alas! to this day in Ireland, that the murder of heretics was excusable. "We do not count them murderers who, burning with the zeal of their Catholic mother against the excommunicate, may happen to have slain some of them." If not absolutely murdered heretics might be ill treated ad libitum, according to an ordinance of Gregory IX., who writes to the Archbishop of Milan: "Let those understand themselves to be absolved the debt of fidelity, homage, and all manner of service, who were bound by any compact, however firmly ratified, to those who have fallen into heresy." Systematic persecution and extermination of heretics among their subjects was constantly enjoined on kings and emperors; such were required solemnly to swear on their coronation that they would, according to their power, faithfully render their service to the pope If they neglected to do it the sovereign pontiff would declare the vassals free and give their realms to rigid Papists who would more effectually persecute. If monarchs became heretics themselves, they were to be deposed and anathematized. Thus Pius V. "issued a bull for the damnation and excommunication of Queen Elizabeth and her adherents," cutting her off from "the unity of the body of Christ," depriving her of her crown and kingdom, and pronouncing a curse on her and on all who continued to obey her.

The laws of the Papacy on this subject increase in malignity from the beginning down to the modern times. Bellarmine argues for the necessity of burning heretics, a practice which Luther had asserted to be contrary to the Spirit of God. He says: "Experience teaches that there is no other remedy; for the Church has proceeded by slow steps, and tried all remedies. First, she only excommunicated. Then she added a fine of money, and afterwards exile. Lastly, she was compelled to come to the punishment of death. For heretics despise excommunication, and say that those lightnings are cold. If you threaten a fine of money, they neither fear God nor regard men, knowing that fools will not be wanting to believe in them, and by whom they may be sustained. If you shut them in prison, or send them into exile, they corrupt those near to them in their words, and those at a distance with their books. Therefore the only remedy is to send them bothmes into their own place."

"Under those bloody maxims those persecutions were carried on, from the eleventh and twelfth centuries almost to the present day which stand out on the page of history. After a signal of open martyrdom had been given in the canons of Orleans, there followed the extirpation of the Albigenses under the form of a crusade, the establishment of the Inquisition, the cruel attempts to extinguish the Waldenses, the martyrdom of the Lollards, the cruel wars to exterminate the Bohemians, the burning of Huss and Jerome, and multitudes of other confessors, before the Reformation; and afterwards the ferocious cruelties practised in the Netherlands, the martyrdoms of Queen Mary's reign, the extinction, by fire and sword, of the Reformation in Spain and Italy, by fraud and open persecution in Poland, the massacre of Bartholomew, the persecutions of the Huguenots by the League, the extirpation of the Vaudois, and all the cruelties and prejudices connected with the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. These are the more open and conspicuous facts which explain the prophecy, besides the slow and secret murders of the holy tribunal of the Inquisition."

A Romanist writer, who deplored the persecuting policy of the Church—Professor Rossetti—writes: "It makes the heart of the true Christian bleed to think of this fatal error of the Latin Church, which by persecuting others laid the foundation of her own irreparable ruin. That the opinions held by these so called heretics were most injurious to the Church of Rome cannot be denied, but the means taken to destroy them were, of all others, the most likely to strengthen them, and render them more deeply rooted. Daniel and St. John foretold that Satan's delegate would use horrid cruelties, and inundate Babylon with the blood of Christ's martyrs; and the pope, to prove that he was not that delegate, did use horrid cruelties, and caused Rome to overflow with the purest of Christian blood!"

So Sismondi, the historian, writes: "To maintain unity of belief the Church had recourse to the expedient of burning all those who separated themselves from her; but although for two hundred years the fires were never quenched, still every day saw Romanists abjuring the faith of their fathers and embracing the religion which often guided them to the stake. In vain Gregory IX., in A. D. 1231, put to death every heretic whom he found concealed in Rome. His own letters show that the heretics only increased in numbers."

It must never be forgotten that all Rome's ordinances against heresy, all its statutes of persecution, remain in its canon law unrepealed, unchanged, and—as the Papacy is infallible in its own esteem—unchangeable, "irreformable." Its present disuse of persecution practically is the result of the heavy judgments which have, since the Reformation, and especially since the French Revolution, overtaken it. It has now no army and no Inquisition of its own, nor is any single kingdom in Europe willing any longer to act as its executioner. It lacks the power,—it utterly lacks the power—to persecute directly or indirectly. It can only stir up sedition and revolt in Protestant countries, and thus endeavor to injure and weaken Protestant powers, as it is doing today in Ireland and in the United States. It is too weak politically to defy modern society by reintroducing medieval tortures, massacres, religious crusades, and the auto de fe. But it is as willing as ever, and awaits the opportunity only. As a drunkard may retain his vicious appetite when he has no longer the means of gratifying it, so Rome—long drunken with the blood of saints—is restrained from further maddening and debasing draughts of her dreadful beverage by nothing but inability to procure them. The Papacy, by justifying as righteous all the horrible persecutions of the past, attests her readiness to renew them whenever the opportunity may serve.

As I shall have to recur to this subject when treating of St. John's foreview of Romanism, I will add nothing further on this point. I have said enough to show that this sixth mark of the little horn attaches most distinctly to the Papacy, and indicates it alone among all powers that have ever held sway on the Roman earth. It has martyred by millions the saints of God, the best and holiest of men. Its persecuting edicts range over the entire period of its existence; the present pope has endorsed them by his approval of the syllabus of Pius IX., and he threw over them the mantle of infallibility.

7. Its duration. A certain definite period is assigned to the rule of the little horn. That period is expressed in symbolic language, harmonious with the symbolic or hieroglyphic character of the whole prophecy. It is "time, times, and a half," or 1,260 days." This is a miniature symbol of the true period, just as the beast is a miniature symbol of the empire, and the little horn of the Papacy of Rome. Scripture elsewhere gives us the scale on which it is to be enlarged, "a year for a day." It means therefore 1,260 years. The political supremacy and the persecuting power of the "see of Rome were to last for this period and no longer. We have shown you that the popedom dates from the beginning of the seventh century. Twelve and a half centuries added brings us to the end of the nineteenth century—in other words, to the days we live in, and in which Rome has ceased to be governed by its popes and has become the capital of the kings of Italy. I have no time to expound this chronologic point fully to you this evening. If you wish to study it, you will find it carefully and exactly treated in my recent work, "Light for the Last Days." But it leads me to the final point in the identification.

8. The doom of the prepicted power. What is the end of this symbolic little horn? "They shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end." "The beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame." This last clause of the prophecy is of course not yet fully accomplished, as it is the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven that brings about the final consummation (v. 13). Speculations about the future we leave to futurists, and therefore it might at first sight seem as if we ought to say nothing on this point of the prophecy But it is not so. This doom consists clearly of two parts: first, the consuming and destroying to the end; and then the end itself symbolized by the slaughter of the beast, the committal of his body to the burning flame. Now the first part of this doom is fulfilling, and has been fulfilling over since the Reformation, and especially ever since the French Revolution; though the second part is still future. We ask, Has there not been going on for the last few centuries a process by which the once mighty power of the Papacy has been steadily consumed,—a weakening process, analogous to consumption in the human frame, —a wasting decay tending to extinction?

It must be borne in mind that this prophecy of Daniel takes up the political aspect of the great antichrist, not his religious character. It views him as a monarch of the Roman world, not as a bishop of the Christian Church. We come to that aspect of his career presently, when we take up Paul's foreview. Here it is one horn among ten, one kingdom among ten Latin kingdoms, though in some senses ruling over them all. The question is, Has there not been such a decay and diminution of Papal sovereignty, such a wasting and weakening of Papal power, such a loss of revenue, influence, and territory, as may be fairly said to fulfil this prediction?

Now I mentioned some facts at the beginning of this lecture which indicates a very considerable growth of Papal influence in England during the last fifty years. Many so fix their gaze on these facts as to get an impression that Romanism is gaining ground in the world generally. This is very far from being the case, as a glance at the comparative positions of the Papacy in the thirteenth century and the two following ones, with its position now in the nineteenth, will show. Then Rome actually exercised the "dominion" which she can now only claim. Then, with the consent of his barons, the king of England agreed to hold his kingdom as the pope's feudatory, and to pay him annually one hundred thousand marks as an acknowledgment. Can you imagine Queen Victoria and the lords and commons of England agreeing to that sort of thing now? Then the great and valiant emperor of Germany stood for three winter days and nights barefoot in the courtyard of "His Holiness," waiting for the honor of an audience, in which he might beg the pope's pardon for having acted as an independent monarch! Can you imagine the Kaiser Wilhelm, of Berlin, doing that now? Then wherever he pleased the pope could suspend all the observances of religion, even to the burial of the dead and the marriage of the living, in any country with which he was offended. In what kingdom could he do so now? Long after his absolute dominion was gone, the pope had what were called concordats with different nations, in which it was agreed that, in return for the pope's spiritual support, they would uphold him by their armies and navies. All these have come to an end; not a nation in Europe lifted a finger to help him when the last vestige of his temporal dominion was violently taken away.

Direct political power he now has none, though his position as head of the apostate Roman Church gives him still immense indirect influence. The ten kings as such have entirely shaken off his yoke, and he himself has no longer any sovereign jurisdiction. His territories are taken away, as well as his dominion. The wealth which was once enormous, is equally gone; the immense landed estates belonging to the convents are, for the most part, confiscated to secular uses. But the greatest fact of all in this connection is the number of those who have rejected his religious pretensions. At the Lateran Council, in 1513, after all the so-called heretics had been silenced by fire and the sword, an orator, addressing the pope, said, "The whole body of Christendom is now subject to one head, even to thee; no one now opposes, no one now objects." Today there are about a hundred and fifty millions of Protestants in the world! Has not the dominion of the Papacy been consumed? Can a few thousand in England weigh much against this stupendous fact, that 150,000,000 of mankind are no more subject to the Pope of Rome than to the Lama of Tibet? When we take into account all the twelve centuries of Papal history, and remember that this emancipation belongs to the last three only, we must now admit that the predicted consumption has made considerable progress. The political dominion and the temporal possessions are gone; the Papacy is no longer a kingdom, but only an ecclesiastical power, and, counting the Greek Church, there are far more so-called Christians outside than inside the pale of the apostate Latin Church, of which it is the head.

This feature of the prediction is then as clearly applicable to Romanism as all the rest.

Let me inquire, can any one suggest any other power in which all these marks, or the majority of them, meet? They are eight in number, and definite in character. The prophecy lays its finger on the place where we are to find the great enemy—Rome; on the point of time in the course of history at which we may expect to see him arise—the division of the Roman territory into a commonwealth of kingdoms; it specifies the nature of the power—political-ecclesiastical; its character—blasphemously self-exalting, lawless, and persecuting; it measures its duration—1,260 years; and specifies its doom—to have its dominion gradually consumed and taken away, and then to be suddenly destroyed for ever, because of its blasphemous assumptions, by the epiphany in glory of the Son of Man, introducing the kingdom of God on earth.

The proof that the Papacy is the power intended is strictly cumulative. If it answered to one of these indications there would be a slight presumption against it; if to several, a strong one; while if it answer to all, then the proof that it is the power intended becomes to candid minds irresistible. There is not a single clause in the prophecy that cannot be proved to fit the Roman Papacy exactly, except the last, which is not yet fulfilled.

Rome, which in her pagan phase defiled and destroyed the literal temple of God at Jerusalem, in her Papal days defiled and destroyed the antitypical spiritual temple of God—the Christian Church. Was it not worthy of God to warn that Church beforehand of the coming of this dreadful antichristian power, and to cheer her in all the sufferings she would have to endure from its tyranny by a knowledge of the issue of the great and terrible drama? Was it not right that the Roman power, Pagan and Papal, should occupy as paramount a place on the page of Scripture as it has actually done on the page of history? The eighteen Christian centuries lay open before the eye of the omniscient God, and no figure stood out so prominently in all their long course as that of the great antichrist. The pen of inspiration sketched him in a few bold, masterly strokes; and there is no mistaking the portrait. In subsequent lectures I shall have much to say to you of the antichristian doctrines and practices of the Papacy. Tonight we have but studied the broad outline drawn in the days of Belshazzar, which forms a broad foundation for what must follow.

Notice, in conclusion, the evidence of inspiration afforded by this wonderful prophecy. Could Daniel foresee the things that were coming on the earth? How should he happen to light on the nation that there would be four universal empires, and four only, and that after the fourth there would arise—what the world had never seen before—a commonwealth of ten kingdoms? How could he depict so strange and peculiar a power as the Papacy? How could he conceive it? A little weak kingdom, yet controlling all kingdoms!—a human dynasty like any other, yet exalting itself against God, and slaughtering his saints!—a power so wicked that heaven itself is moved for its destruction, and the whole Roman earth ruined on its account! Supposing for a moment this was a sketch from imagination: how comes it that history has so wonderfully realized it? The prediction did not produce its own fulfilment, for they who fulfilled it denied its application to themselves. It was not conjected to fit the events, for the events did not begin for a thousand years after it was published. The events were not arranged by men to fit the prophecy, for they extend over forty successive generations. There is no solution of the problem save the true one; "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" "He revealeth the deep and secret things: He knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth in him."

Let me then solemnly charge you, reverence this holy volume, heed its warnings, dread the judgments it denounces, believe its promises, obey its precepts, study its sacred predictions; for be ye very sure it is the inspired word of the only living and true God, who is, as Nebuchadnezzar declared of old, "a God of gods, a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets."—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

THE LITERAL RETURN OF THE JEWS.

The same prophets who predict a future reversal of the spiritual curse of hardening which has for ages rested on the Jew, no less plainly and explicitly predict the reversal of all temporal curses which were denounced, and have so literally fallen upon the nation, the land, and the Holy City. Thus, for example, we read in Jer. xxx. 3; "Lo, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave unto their forefathers, and they shall possess it." So we read again in Ezek. xxxvii. 21: "Say unto them, thus saith the Lord God, 'Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side and bring them into their own land!'" Such examples, as every Bible reader knows, might be multiplied indefinitely.

It is utterly impossible to apply all such predictions of return to the land, as some have sought to do, to the return under Ezra from the Babylonian exile. Whatever they mean, it is absolutely certain that they refer to an event which is yet in the future. This will be perfectly clear from the following considerations:

1. The Scriptures undoubtedly predicts return which is to take place "In The Latter Days." To "the latter days" is expressly referred, e. g., the prophecy of Jeremiah, in chapter 30. What this expression means, every Bible student knows. It is never used with reference to any period before the first advent of our Lord. Least of all is it ever used in any of those prophecies which by common consent refer to the restoration from Babylon. The return of "the latter days," therefore, whatever it be, cannot be understood of the restoration from Babylon, nor of any event before the first coming of our Lord. Hence, as nothing since the first advent has occurred which could be so understood, it is plain that the promised return is an event yet in the future.

2. Another proof that the Babylonian restoration cannot be intended in all those predications of a regathering of Israel in the land, is found in the fact that the restoration of the ten Tribes, under the name of Ephraim, Israel, etc., as well as that of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, is distinctly predicted. Thus, for example, in the prophecy of restoration in Jer. xxx. 31, the restoration of the house of Israel or Ephraim, as distinguished from that of Judah, is as specifically the subject of chapter xxxi. as is the restoration of Judah the subject of the chapter preceding. Very explicit is the language of the prophet Ezekiel in this matter: "Say unto them, thus saith the Lord, God, Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph which is in the hand of Ephraim and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and they shall be one in mine hand. . . . . And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all, and they shall no more be two nations, neither shall they be divided into two nations any more at all," Ezek. xxxvii. 17–22. It is very plain, again, that, whatever these words mean, they were not fulfilled in the restoration from Babylon, nor have been at any time since. They must refer to an event yet in the future.

3. In the third place, whereas the restoration from Babylon, and the rebuilding at the time of the city of Jerusalem, was followed again and again by dispersion and by a yet more complete overthrow of the city, this restoration of the latter days is uniformly represented as being absolutely final. Thus we read of a rebuilding of Jerusalem, after which "it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down, any more forever," Jer. xxxi. 40. So also, by Amos, the Lord says, "I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled out of their land which I have given them," Amos ix. 15.

These words assuredly cannot be referred to the restoration from Babylon, after which they were again pulled up out of their own land, and scattered more widely and fearfully by the armies of the Romans than they ever were by the power of Nebuchadnezzar.

4. Again, we read of a restoration which shall not only be final, but complete. Thus, the Lord said by the prophet Ezekiel, "O mountains of Israel:. . . . I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, even all of it," Ezek. xxxvi. 8–10. So also by Isaiah the Lord promised, "Ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel," Isa. xxvii. 12. Surely no one will insist that the restoration from Babylon satisfies such language as this. So far from all returning at this time, we are told that only 42,360 of the captives ever returned, Ezra ii. 1, 64. Anything approaching to a universal restoration of Israel to their own land the world has never yet seen. So, again, it is plain that whatever these predictions mean they cannot refer to the return from Babylon, but to an event which is yet in the future.

5. This is, if possible, made still more clear by what we are told of the condition of Israel thus restored. As regards their national life, they are to be in a state of independence. "Strangers shall no more serve themselves of Jacob," Jer. xxx. 8. But since the Babylonian restoration the Jews have had to wear the yoke of the Gentiles almost without interruption. The brief quasi independence of the Jews, under the Asmonean kings, was soon followed by the beginning of a more complete subjection than ever, from which they have never yet recovered. And then, in the second place, it is always added that after that future restoration to the land the long history of Israel's apostasies shall end. Thus we read in the prophecy of Ezekiel that after the final reunion of Ephraim and Judah on the mountains of Judah, they shall not "defile themselves any more with any of their transgressions." From that time on the sanctuary of God "shall be in the midst of them forevermore." It is needless to say that such words as these cannot be applied to a restoration which, if it cleansed them from idolatry, only brought them for a while into their own land, there to commit after a time the greatest crime of their whole history, in the crucifixion of the Son of God.

6. Finally, the prophets themselves recognize the fact that there shall be two restorations. In the book of Isaiah this is said in so many words thus: "It shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea. . . . And he. . . . shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth," Isa. xi. 11, 12.

But the Babylonian restoration was the first, and not the second; and as there has certainly been no restoration since, it follows, according to the explicit teaching of the prophet, a second restoration of Israel as yet in the future.

Here then we have no less than six independent proofs that the Scriptures do predict a regathering of the Jews into their own land, such as the world has never yet seen. Do the words of Scripture which foretell that this shall be, mean what they undoubtedly say, or are they, one and all, to be understood as merely figurative descriptions of the prosperity of the church in the latter days, or, at most, as poetic amplifications of the prophecies of Israel's conversion?

Strange, indeed, that such a question should ever have been raised! If such words as those which we have cited do not teach that Israel, the literal, historical, national Israel, shall yet be gathered into their own land, to be rooted out no more forever, we ask, with all earnestness, what words could possibly have been substituted which should have taught this? The very same terms are used in Jer. xxix. 10, in predicting the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, which are elsewhere employed to predict the return of the latter days. As every one knows, the event proved that these words were to be taken in their plain and evident literal sense; they meant precisely what they said, nothing more and nothing less. How, then, on any sound principles of exegesis, can any one be justified in denying that the self-same words in the same prophets, foretelling a "second" restoration, also mean exactly what they meant in the former case, namely, a literal return of the Jewish nation to their own land? We insist, on principles of interpretation which seems to us little less than axiomatic, that the presumption in this case, for the literal interpretation of these temporal promises to Israel, is wellnigh irresistible.—Samuel H. Kellogg, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

Celestial Phenomena.

The Boston Journal of June 2, says:—"A remarkable electrical display is reported to have occurred during a thunderstorm in the Catskill Mountains on Wednesday night of last week (June 6). From the clouds that circled around High Point and vicinity a large ball of fire descended, and for several seconds the surrounding country could be seen almost as plainly as in the daytime. Directly in the path of this bright light were streaks of lightning that assumed shapes like soldiers marching to battle. Flags were flying and bayonets glistening. Many reputable people saw this peculiar electrical picture, and they vouch for the correctness of the story."

Another paper has the following:—"Findlay (Ohio), May 23.—A strange spectacle was visible in the northern sky last night shortly after 11 o'clock, which caused the greatest consternation among the people. It was the representation of a human hand of immense and awe-inspiring proportions. Early in the evening the sky in the north presented a peculiar appearance. As the night wore on it took the form of flashes in light, constantly changing in color, darting up from the horizon and again subsiding, but each appearance becoming more brilliant and unnatural. The flashes continued until the observers were terrified to see the lights concentrating into a giant hand, well formed, and as distinct as if painted upon the black background of the sky. The hand appeared to be a shadowy substance through which waves of light of blood red color surged as the pulse beats in the human hand, and then seemed to fall from the ends of the fingers in drops of the same color. The first finger of the hand pointed down towards the sleeping city as if warning the people of some woe about to fall upon them. The spectacle lasted for about an hour, and was witnessed by hundreds, who, breathless with surprise and excitement, watched it until slowly it began to fade away, and finally disappeared altogether. The speculations regarding the cause and significance of the phenomena will not abate for many days."

IN the Chicago Evening Journal of July 14, we find the following note which we give our readers for what it may be worth. It is well known, however, that the Italians are beginning to look upon the Papacy as a supremely iniquitous fraud religiously, and as an intolerable pest politically.

A French newspaper publishes the statement that Papa Leo, foreseeing that his departure from Rome is inevitable, owing to the persistent hostility of the Italian Government, has opened negotiations looking to the purchase of an islet in the Mediterranean Sea, near the French coast, where he and his household may reside in peace and comfort.

WE are in receipt of No. 3, Vol. 1., of a monthly journal entitled The True Protestant. It is edited and published by P. A. Sequin, an Ex-Romish Priest. Like the Primitive Catholic,—of which we have already made notice—it is an earnest advocate of Bible Christianity and political liberty, as well as staunch in its opposition to Papal Romanism in its intolerant hatred to the Bible, free Schools, and rights of conscience. It is published at 42 Blue Island Avenue, Chicago, Ill. at $1.00 a year. We hope these papers will be instrumental in opening the eyes of many deluded Romanists before God brings the threatened destruction on the Mystical Babylon.

ROMANISM AND INDULGENCES.

We have occasion once more to advert to the persistent efforts employed by the Romish hierarchy to suppress the truth in regard to the scandalous trade in "indulgences" in that period of history just antedating the Protestant Reformation. We preface an extract from Waddington's Church History with three several extracts from as many papers. The first is from the New York Independent of June 21st, which reads as follows:

Swinton's "Outlines of History" has been removed from the Boston schools on the vote of a majority of the School Committee, of whom thirteen are Protestants and eleven liberal Catholics. The passage in the book which has caused its exclusion is the following:

"When Leo X. came to the papal chair he found the treasury of the Church exhausted by the ambitious projects of his predecessors. He therefore had recourse to every means which ingenuity could devise for recruiting his exhausted finances, and among these he adopted an extensive sale of indulgences, which in former ages had been a source of large profits to the church. The Dominican friars, having obtained a monopoly of the sale in Germany, employed as their agent Tetzel, one of their order, who carried on the traffic in a manner that was very offensive, and especially so to the Augustinian friars. The indulgences were in the early ages of the Church remissions of the penances imposed upon persons whose sins had brought scandal on the community. But in the process of time they were represented as actual pardons of guilt, and the purchaser of an indulgence was said to be delivered from all his sins." That seems to us a very fair statement of the facts of the pardoners' trade as it existed at the time, and the Protestant members of the Committee must have had other reasons than its incorrectness for displacing the book. By and by we shall have Protestants, perhaps, complaining that it is recorded that Calvin burnt Servetus.

The next quotation is made from the New York Observer of June 28th. It is, as it should be, far more pointedly outspoken on this shameful, cowardly truckling to the encroaching demands of Rome. Is the Bible to be banished from our schools and history to be mutilated, or else entirely taken away from the young because the one predicts the dire and awful wickedness of an apostasy, and the other shows that every jot and tittle of these predictions have been fulfilled to the letter in the history of Papal Rome? The Observer says:—

"A master in the English High School of Boston has been rebuked and disciplined by the School Board for an offensive definition of 'Indulgences,' and the text-book which 'misled the teacher' has been condemned and ordered to be removed. This is not astonishing in a city where the government is mainly in the hands of foreigners, and where leading city officials joined in a great public demonstration in honor of a drunken prize-fighter. But this control of the teaching of our common schools, including the exclusion of history and literature until it is adapted to the views of Romanists, is simply outrageous in view of their warfare with the entire system of public instruction. They have denounced the schools and established their own, and now they want to compel the country to teach history in such a way that its most important lessons may never be learned by the young people of this land."

Lastly we find the following in Kenrick's Herald taken from another paper which we reprint with due credit in addition to the above.

The Catholics are having their own way in the Boston School Board. At a meeting on the 12th, at which all the Catholic members were present, and from which half of the Protestant members stayed away, Fr. Metcalf's objection to Swinton's "Outlines of History" as a text-book was sustained. The book is excluded from the schools, "not because it is not the best book for the object, but because four lines in its foot-notes are distasteful to the Catholics." Do "Protestants care so little for honest teaching as compared to lessons expurgated by the priesthood that with the ballot box in their own hands they have made this situation possible?" The Rev. Dr. Duryea is charged with helping the Catholics in this matter. Says the Home Journal: "There is nothing more idle than the attempt to show that the Swinton book was judged on its merits and demerits. It was purely a religious squabble that settled the matter, and the side that had the courage to fight because it wished the truth concealed was the winning side.... Just so long as the Catholic church finds that it can carry its point so easily it will continue its efforts to obtain control of the educational system of this country. People who cannot see this are fit subjects for asylums for the feeble minded."—Morning Star.

We will now proceed to lay before our readers what an eminent Episcopalian Ecclesiastical historian has to say on the subject of indulgences. We quote from George Waddington's Church History, p. 511, and quote word for word. While it is lamentably true that the history of Papal indulgences is, and, from the nature of the case, must be very distasteful to Romanists, still no truthful chronicler of past events is at liberty to ignore the practice of iniquities that every tolerably well informed person knows led directly, as a cause, to the great Protestant Reformation. Nations and denominations are to be judged from what they have done in the past, and when the mirror of the past is held up to the face of Ecclesiastical Romanism, it is no matter of wonder that she wants the looking-glass either removed or broken. But hear what Waddington says:

"The profane and even blasphemous expressions, by which the emissaries of the Vatican recommended their treasures to the popular credulity were tacitly permitted by the authorities of the church; yet we shall not detail them here, nor impute them to others than the individuals who uttered them—they may repose in the same oblivion. But it is proper to transcribe a specimen of the indulgences which were publicly sold in the sixteenth century, because they were authorized productions of the church. The following is the translation of that which was circulated by Tetzel: 'May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee and absolve thee, by the merits of his most holy passion. And I, by his authority, that of his blessed apostles, Peter and Paul, and of the Most Holy See, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee first from all ecclesiastical censures, in whatever manner they may have been incurred; and then from all thy sins, transgressions and excesses how enormous soever they may be, even from such as are reserved for the cognisance of the Apostolical See. And as far as the keys of the Church extend, I remit to you all punishment which you deserve in purgatory on their account; and I restore you to the Holy Sacraments of the Church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity which you possessed at baptism, so that if you should die now, the gates of punishment shall be shut, and the gates of the paradise of delight shall be opened. And if you shall not die at present, this grace shall remain in full force when you are on the point of death. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' This indulgence, in spite of the ambiguity of one or two expressions, is nothing less, when fairly interpreted, than an unconditional permission to sin for the rest of life; and as such it was assuredly received by those classes of the people for which it was chiefly intended, and whose morality is peculiarly confided to the superintendence of the clergy."

Just as we finished the above we met with the following in the Chicago Evening Journal, which we are very glad to append:

EXCITEMENT IN BOSTON.

BOSTON, July 11.—Mass-meetings were held in Faneuil Hall and Tremont Temple tonight to protest against the action of the School Committee in yielding to the Roman Catholic demand for the removal of a certain text-book and the transfer of a certain high-school teacher. Not only were the halls packed, but there was an extraordinarily demonstrative patriotic fervor all through the evening, and when on the stage of Faneuil Hall Miss Caroline E. Hastings, a member of the School Committee who voted "no," advanced to the front and waved an American flag, 2,000 voices spontaneously sang the "Star Spangled Banner." The book which has created the disturbance is Swinton's "Outlines of History," a book which has been in use in the high schools for ten years, and the offending passage is one which affirms that Pope Leo X. recruited his depleted treasury by the sale of indulgences. Some Roman Catholic boys complained to Rev. Father Metcalf that the teacher, Charles B. Travis, commented of this passage in a manner which offended their conscience. Father Metcalf thereupon petitioned the School Board to abolish both book and teacher, and the board, a large number of whose members are Catholics, voted to do so. This action set in a blaze a feeling which has been growing of late among Protestants in the city that the Roman Catholic Church was assuming an undue prominence not only in the city government but in the management of the public schools, and an agitation was set on foot which culminated in tonight's demonstration. The speakers were clergymen representing all denominations. They all assumed that the attack upon Travis and the book was inspired by the Jesuits, notwithstanding the fact that the priest who instigated it is a descendant of the Mayflower Puritans and that Rev. Dr. Duryea, the noted Presbyterian, who is a member of the School Board, voted for the exclusion of the book. A set of resolutions was adopted declaring that a Jesuit can not be a citizen, denouncing the foreign element in public affairs, demanding the reinstatement of the teacher and the book, condemning parochial schools and declaring the school issue paramount to all others which divide the great political parties. Provision was made for the appointment of a committee of fifty to supervise the agitation. Taken all in all, it was the greatest popular demonstration in Boston since anti-slavery times.

FROM the World's Crisis of May 2, 1888, we give two letters written for that Journal. One is from Eld. Miles Grant reporting some incidents of his late visit to Rome. His strictures on the Romish System are given from personal observation, and important on this account. The other letter is from Eld. J. C. Smith, who went as a missionary to Monastir from which city Pastor Basil Stephenhoff has written us some letters. Eld. J. C. Smith went with the design of locating there but did not find the opening favorable for establishing a printing press, and was compelled to relinquish his design. His account of the city and its surroundings will interest our readers who have read Bro. Stephenhoff's letters.

LETTER FROM ELD. MILES GRANT

My last report closed at Rome, March 28th. This noted city is now crowded with visitors from many countries, who have come to attend the Pope's Jubilee, which is to commemorate the fiftieth year of his priesthood. There are a host of priests in the city, passing to and fro in all directions, riding in carriages, horse cars, omnibuses, or walking in clans. There are also a multitude of students for the priesthood, who throng the streets, each class having some peculiar dress, but all wear a broad-brimmed hat, having the edges somewhat rolled, and held in their place by little cords fastened to the crown. When walking on the street with a Christian friend from London, he remarked to me, referring to the priests, "I have not seen one who looks happy." It is quite evident that they all partake more or less of the sorrows of the Pope, because he is so restricted by the Italian government. The Papacy is considered a burden by the mass of the people in Rome. They wish he was out of the city. He is truly hated by those who once bowed to him with great reverence. They have lost all confidence in the Papal religion, and seem utterly stupid in relation to all things connected with the Christian religion, or any other. The less there is said about the Lord and his word, the better they are suited. As the Papacy is nothing but revised Paganism, made more cruel and corrupt, they have come to the conclusion that all this is the outgrowth of Christianity. Added to this is the fact, that since they threw off the Papal yoke in 1870 a very rapid improvement has been made in the appearance of the city, the population has about doubled, their commercial interests have been greatly increased, and Italy now ranks among the first class European powers. They have had a wonderful resurrection during the last seventeen years.

The Pope is devising all possible ways and means to regain his temporal power, but thus far he finds himself blockaded at every point, and utterly helpless. He can find no stairs where he can ascend again into the seat of temporal power. He mourns over his helplessness, but relief is continually retreating. The weaker he becomes the better the people of Rome are suited. His notorious Jubilee has served to increase their hatred. Some came with gifts from distant countries, supposing he was in needy circumstances; but when they saw him in his gorgeous apparel, and the splendor of his surroundings, they wisely concluded to keep their presents for their own necessities.

I do not see how it can be possible for any system to be more thoroughly antichristian than that of the Papacy, or how it is possible for the deeds of any class of men to be more cruel and vile than have been those of the Popes and their supporters during the past twelve hundred years. No class of robbers, pirates, adulterers, liars or hypocrites, have ever excelled the chief men in the Papal church. Their cruel torment of the disciples of Jesus outstripped the horrid persecution of pagan emperors in the first three centuries. They are too awful to be published in detail. By this antichristian church the saints were flung from precipices, dismembered, impaled on stakes, roasted alive, stretched on the rack, disemboweled, starved to death in dungeons, flayed alive, and tortured in every other way that these human demons could invent. This Papal church, whose seat is at Rome, whose supreme head is the antichrist, may most correctly be called the church of Satan, or "the whore of Babylon," as the whole system is but a copy of the Babylonian mysteries instituted by Semiramis, the Queen of ancient Babylon and wife of Nimrod. Nimrod and Semiramis were worshiped by the Jews under the titles of "Baal and Ashtaroth." Semiramis was a very remarkable woman, beautiful, brave, commanding, noted for wit, and exceedingly vile; but the supreme head of the Papal church towers above Nimrod and Semiramis, and all others in his imitation of the character of the devil and Satan.

To know Papacy one should come to Rome, where it may be seen in its true light. I had but a faint idea of its real character till I saw it with my own eyes. "This day, March 31st, I attended "High Mass" in St. Peter's Cathedral; standing in a crowd between one and two hours, witnessing the pagan performances, similar to those instituted by Semiramis. One needs to go early to a good point of observation, because of the multitude who are present at the Easter festival. Rome is now crowded with visitors. Dr. Young informed me last evening that on Easter Monday, last year, 46,000 persons left Rome by the trains that day. As this is the Jubilee year, there are many more in the city now, who will wish to leave next Monday.

I was present in season to secure a front view of the performances, a full description of which would require more room than is occupied by my whole letter. First, there came a procession from some other part of the cathedral, singing as they marched to the chapel, preceded by one carrying a candle-stick some seven feet high, having three branches at the top, each holding a lighted candle, though it was midday, and no candle light was needed. Following the candle-bearer were others with lighted candles some four feet in length, and about two inches in diameter. Next came the priests and bishops escorting the cardinal who was the chief figure of the pagan performance, as the Pope is now unwell, and not able to be present. The cardinal was dressed in a gorgeous manner. His overdress sparkled with gold and his cap with precious stones. A boy carried the long train of the underdress when walking. As he entered the chapel, facing the altar, he bowed to the cross, and was then seated by other dignitaries, and waited on by them in the most obsequious manner. During the performance very fine artistic music was furnished by the choir and organ. The exercises consisted in repeated readings by the cardinal from most elegantly bound books, with music interspersed from the choir; frequent burning of incense before the cross and Virgin Mary by the cardinal, and then the censer was passed by him to a lower dignitary, who went about the chapel burning incense to the other notables, until the smoke of the incense became quite prominent. These things were several times repeated, till finally the time was reached to elevate the Host, or their wafer God, made so by their ceremonies performed by the cardinal and his assistants. At that moment all fell prostrate on their knees, including the cardinal. I found myself standing up alone in my locality, which caused me to straighten up to my full height, and I think my countenance must have expressed unusual disgust. I felt then like making a speech to those dupes of the antichrist.

Because of the Jubilee excitement this Easter week, my friends in Rome have advised me to wait till it is past before having any special meetings. Interesting Bible readings have been held in the parlors of Dr. Young and Miss Simpson. I am gathering information that will be of special value to me in my future lectures on the Papacy.

THE MACEDONIAN MISSION.

March 8th. Today we visited the cities of the dead, where millions have been laid away in sadness. Monastir is a wonderful city. It is said that there are nearly one hundred Turkish mosques, and in all of those inclosures with high towers and walls may be found the sleeping dead. There are also extensive graveyards, where for centuries the dead have been buried, and a portion of which the city now occupies, and are building over the silent sleepers. But just out of the city one can see graves in many directions, extending a long distance. First we visited the Mohammedan cemetery, that covers over a large space, all unprotected, occupying the sides of three hills and valleys. These many many thousands of graves are marked by rough stone, varying, from six inches to ten feet in height. Many of these stones have fallen down, while the most of them are leaning and are ready to fall. We visited next the Jewish burying place, where thousands more have been laid away to wait the resurrection trump. Their cemetery is just north of the Mohammedan's, and occupies the south side of a high hill and its surroundings. The stones that mark the resting place of those sleepers are flat, and some of them very broad, which they lay upon the graves instead of setting them upright.

We then visited the Greek church, and saw fantastical pictures painted on the walls of the worshiping of saints, and of immaterial souls leaving the body, and the devil pictured out as having horns coming from the bottomless pit, with a hideous appearance, in hot pursuit after the departed soul to catch it. The most of these fanciful and hideous pictures are founded on the devil's lie. "Thou shalt not surely die," Gen. iii. 4. In more enlightened lands they have pictures beautifully drawn, representing their loved ones as being in heaven or flying away as angels; but their theology is founded on the same lie, only more pleasingly portrayed. And the more pleasingly a picture is drawn, if not founded on fact, the greater the deception. "And no marvel, for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness, whose end shall be according to their works," 2 Cor. xi. 14, 15. After entering the church and viewing the images and tapers burning, we went out into the great city of the dead. We found men digging a new grave, and while watching their work we saw them take out the skull of some one that had been buried long before. It was told us, that they often put four or five persons into one grave. At Salonica we saw two large piles of skeletons, bones of all kinds, bleaching in the sun and left to the ravages of man and beasts, that the government or some party had dug up in laying the foundation of an extensive wall. No doubt these dead ones had been slain in some battle, for this land has been the field of strife for many warriors, and on hillside and plain may be seen common stones put up to mark the resting place of the unconscious dead.

On the west side of the city we saw other graveyards, and on the south we visited three others and still there are many others that we have not visited. But we have seen enough, and should judge by the size and age of the town, that there must have been millions buried here. O, what a host will come forth in the judgment, some to everlasting life some to shame and everlasting contempt. The city of Monastir is a wonderful city. It is the second in population of the cities of Macedonia. There are very many old dilapidated houses, walls, and mosques, all showing that it has been built for centuries. It must have been a large place in the days of the Apostle Paul. It was formerly called Polegonia, and I think that the Apostle must have visited it when he "went over those parts" of Macedonia "round about Illyricum." The history of the many nationalities residing here I am not able to give at present, but will speak of a few things that will interest the readers. The people here have many fasts and are having one now that lasts seven weeks. During this time they claim to abstain from all animal food, although they eat snails, crabs, and fish eggs salted. They also have many holidays, handed down from heathen nations. On their market days, which are on Monday, the town is thronged with people coming from a long distance, twenty and thirty miles. The most of them walk. The women bring in their few eggs and curd, cheese, butter, socks, mitts and under clothing, home-made. The market places are the same as of old, where all sects and classes gether, men and women, bringing in their wheat, barley, oats, corn, wood, coal, hay and straw and many other things too numerous to mention. The heavier articles are brought in on small donkeys and ponies, while the smaller articles they carry in their hands and on their backs.

It would amuse our American ladies to see the women here with their merchandise seated all along the streets and beside the markets, selling their few eggs, beans, peppers, spice and wearing apparel, and some of them knitting and spinning as they walk along the streets, and as they are seated occupying every spare moment. I counted forty-six all seated in a row. Their wheat, grain, etc., they carry in sacks, and take from their donkeys sitting on the ground in the large market-places where hundreds gather to buy. There are many Jews and gypsies, the most deplorable, ragged specimens of humanity that I have ever seen. These poor Jews go round with their "backs bowed down always." Many times I have felt sad and been surprised to see them carry long sticks of timber on their backs, straining every nerve to stand up under the weight as they go along the streets, also large bundles of hay. These loads they carry for a few cents. The words of inspiration as found recorded in Deut. xxviii. 29 and 30, are having a wonderful fulfilment, "Oppressed and crushed always." The Greeks, Jews, Bulgarians, Wallachia, and other nationalities represented here, have long been in ignorance and superstition. Everything has been taught them in mystery. The Greek, Bulgarian and Catholic priests speak in a language that the multitudes do not understand, so there is confusion, darkness, and death all around. "They proceed from evil to evil and know not me, saith the Lord." Very many wear sandals, and dress in sheep-skins and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted and tormented, deceiving and being deceived.

We visited one prison here where they have five hundred prisoners, and we learned that there is still another where there are many more. Bro. S., who could talk some in the Turkish language, told the keepers of the prison that we are allowed to visit prisons in America and preach the gospel to the prisoners, and that many had thus been benefitted and that some had been brought out and made useful men for God. The keeper of the prison said that they should be glad to hear the gospel, but the officials of the government would not allow it. They also said that the number of prisoners was increasing more and more. This shows what a sad state of things there is existing, and that the land is full of crime. The government has caught a number of brigands since we have been here, and taken off two of their heads. We saw one at a distance set up on a stone wall near the government buildings, so that all could see it as they passed by. But this does not seem to check the tide of the crime and evil. "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof; from such turn away," 2 Tim. iii. 1–5.

It seems to me the inhabitants of the land are well described in Hosea iv. 1–3. "Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel; for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land. By swearing and lying, and killing and stealing and committing adultery, they break out and blood toucheth blood. Therefore shall the land mourn, and every one that dwelleth therein shall languish with the beasts of the field and with the fowls of heaven." "Darkness covers the earth and gross darkness the people." "Then said one unto him, Lord, are there few that be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in at the straight gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in and shall not be able. When once the Master of the house is risen up and hath shut the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are. Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence ye are; depart from me all ye workers of iniquity. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out. And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. And behold there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last," Luke xiii. 23–28. The Lord aid all in the narrow way to life.

May the blessing of God rest upon the dear brethren and sisters in America, and all the dear ones in Jesus in every land, that are sounding out the glad tidings of light and life to a lost race. And when Jesus comes to gather up the jewels, may some be brought from the dark corners of the earth as trophies for the sacrifices that you are making in America for this and other dark lands. The Lord speed the day when sin and death shall end, when this groaning state shall be exchanged for one of liberty, joy and eternal rest.

"Time's sun is fast setting, its twilight is nigh,
Its evening is falling in cloud o'er the sky.
Its shadows are stretching in ominous gloom,
Its midnight approaches—the midnight of doom.
Then haste sinner, haste, there is mercy for thee,
And wrath is preparing—flee, fugitive, flee."

Brethren and Sisters, pray for us as we seek to win a bride for our master, and hail every omen of the coming king with delight.

UNDERTONES.

When the cloudless sun of summer
Pours a flood of liquid gold
On the blue and glassy ocean,
On the green and flowery wold:
When the bee hums round the blossom,
When the bird sings by its nest,
Underneath the joyous throbbing
Breathes a smothered tone of sobbing—
Weary sobbing after rest.

For these sunny skies shall darken,
And the sea's wild billows flow,
And the leaves shall fall and moulder
In a shroud of winter's snow;
And the voice of song shall falter:
So there's sighing in the forest
Of a world in blindness praying
For a twenty undersaying,
And a true, abiding rest.

And, however well we love them,
These dear faces young and lair,
In the breath of time must wither,
At the touch of death must pale;
Soon we leave them, or they leave us;
These, our beautiful and blest!
For the doom of death has bound us
There are tombstones all around us,
And this world is not our rest.

Hark! responsive to hearts burdened
Comes a tender voice from One:
"I can meet this world-wide longing,
Change life's bitter undertone,"—
It is Christ, the nation's Healer,
And the balm for soul-distressed,
For the craving heart, perfection,
For our dead a resurrection,
For the weary spirit, rest.

And his witnesses are crying:
"Now the blood of Christ can save,
And communion with his Spirit
Is the bliss you blindly crave
On his breast for sinners bleeding,
When your aching soul is pressed,
You re-enter Eden's portal,
And regain the true Immortal,
And the rapture and the rest."

Here our skies may change and darken,
But there's cloudless light before:
Here our friends and we must sever,
But we'll meet on yonder shore.
There foundations never totter,
And no partings wring the breast:
And the beauty fadeth never,
And the song is sung forever
In the home of endless rest.

THE LEAVEN: AN EXPOSITION OF Matt. xiii, 33.

"The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till it was all leavened."

To our mind it is clear that there are two or three classes of writers who err in their exposition of this parable. From the fact that the leaven in the meal diffuses itself through the whole, brings under all its influence, many have concluded that Christianity, as leaven, will diffuse itself through, and regenerate, all mankind. They think the parable was employed to represent the universal diffusion of truth and righteousness. We shall show that this exegesis is not tenable. Then others think that the word leaven is used here to represent corruption, because there are some places in Scripture where it is so used. As when we read, "And Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees," which is explained by Matthew of "the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees." Some of their doctrines were the opposite of Christ's doctrines, and therefore, corrupt, and hence his caution to beware of them. Referring to the corruption that had got in among the Corinthians, the apostle Paul says to them, "Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, even as ye are unleavened," 1 Cor. v. 6, 7. There are other instances in which the word is used as a symbol of corruption, but that evidently is not the meaning of it here. For the nature of the kingdom of heaven, whether considered as it will exist when fully established, or in relation to what is initiatory to it, forbids such a sense in this place. The process of that which is to form a part of the kingdom, even in its initiatory stage, must be towards purity. Then there is another view, which if not so common as the above views, we have nevertheless seen advocated. It is the view "that the parable of the leaven is not given to describe the process of the establishment of the kingdom of heaven," but that when the kingdom is exhibited in mighty power, when "the work is consummated, every thing remaining in existence will be so utterly assimilated to it as the meal is to the leaven when the whole is leavened." It is thought that "this is the only possible conception which is Scriptural," that the "parable represents the state in the perfected kingdom and not prior to it." This conception, we think, is erroneous, and is positively forbidden by the plain terms of the parable, which refer to an introductory process. These terms are forced, or distorted, to make them agree with the theory that by a sudden and an overwhelming stroke, the kingdom of God gains the conquest of the world, "coupling salvation and assimilation with itself, of what is then found ready, and utter destruction of what is found at that time unlike itself, in one mighty, sudden energy of its manifestation." In a conception like this there is no room left for the Millennial kingdom, the thousand years' reign, as it is portrayed in Scripture, for every thing is not in a moment either changed into the nature of the kingdom, or destroyed by a sudden and powerful stroke.

But we will now submit for your consideration a few remarks which we hope will give the true sense of the parable.

Leavening, let it be remembered, is a means to a certain end; it is a preparatory process to something. The making of bread is the end; leavening is the first process in bread-making after obtaining the materials.

Likening the kingdom of heaven unto leaven, therefore, must, to be consistent with this refer to it in its preparatory stages, to the preparing of the materials for the kingdom, or rather, of those who are to form the rulership of the kingdom.

And just as the process of leavening the meal is introductory to the obtaining of loaves, so the Divine work of enlightening the mind, of convincing the judgment, or quickening the spirit, and of purifying the heart, is introductory to the setting up of the kingdom of heaven. We cannot have bread that is light and wholesome without this leavening of the meal, nor can we have the kingdom until those who are to inherit it are made ready by Divine leavening, by the penetration of saving truth through their spirit and soul and body, or their entire being.

This parable shows the impropriety of speaking of the kingdom as now existing. The bread is not made until the process of leavening is gone through. So this being the Gospel age—the age in which the process of leavening men with the truth, or regenerating man through the truth, is going on, the kingdom is not established until all are leavened with the truth who are to form the rulers in the kingdom.

Leaven is put into the meal; it penetrates the whole, and the whole is leavened. Truth, as leaven, is put into individuals. The Holy Spirit, applying the truth, it has a transforming influence; it operates upon the will, the heart and affections, and the life, and leavens the whole man, the inward and the outward man.

The meal leavened is a definite quantity,—three measures, or between four and five pecks. So the leaven of Divine truth—the gospel of the kingdom—leavens so much meal; that is, the definite number who shall become joint rulers with the Christ. It will not do to say that the whole human family are represented by the three measures of meal. If this definite and small number has any significance, it must represent rather a part of mankind than all mankind. Not "the whole mass of humanity," as some think, but the few out of the many who are called, the little flock gathered out of the masses, the people taken out of the Gentiles for his name, the holy nation purchased with the lamb's blood out of every nation, the elect race, the royal priesthood so constituted by their obedience to the call out of darkness into the marvellous light. The common idea of a leavening process, of a transforming power of the truth in "the whole mass of humanity," is forbidden by the language of the parable, which speaks of a definite quantity of meal. It is also forbidden by the parable of the tares of the field, which, by request, was explained by the great Teacher himself. The fact that in the end of the age there will be tares as well as wheat, absolutely forbids the idea that the entire "mass of humanity" will be leavened, or transformed with Gospel truth. In another parable there is seed sown by the wayside, which the evil one snatcheth away; there is seed sown upon the rocky places, yet lacking root, when it springs up, is withered away; and there is seed sown among the thorns, and when it springs up, the thorns choke it. And in another parable, a net was cast into the sea, and bad fishes were gathered as well as good, but the bad were cast away; and so shall it be in the consummation of the age. These parables cannot, in any sense, represent the general diffusion of truth, or the conversion of all to Christ. How then can the parable of the leaven, given in the same connection? Besides, if so interpreted, it would contradict Christ's teaching elsewhere, and also the teaching of the apostles. Instead of there being a general diffusion of truth and righteousness, there is to be an almost general diffusion of error and wickedness at the end of the age.

THE MILLENNIUM AS VIEWED BY SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS.

A friend of mine sends me certain numbers of a paper entitled "The Signs of the Times." There is much good reading matter in the paper, but I find myself unable to endorse the doctrine of the millennium as taught in it by G. P. Bollman, and am not convinced that it is my duty to keep "the Sabbath." But it is not concerning the Sabbath that I wish to write, but to examine the view of the millennium presented by this writer. It may be briefly summarized thus:

At the coming of the Lord the righteous dead are raised, the righteous living changed, and all caught up to meet him in the air, whence they go with him to heaven. They reign with him in heaven during the thousand years. After the saints are taken away, the nations are destroyed, leaving the earth desolate, in which state it remains during the millennial era. At the end of the thousand years the saints come down in the New Jerusalem whose citizens they are, and the city is located upon the earth. Then the wicked dead are raised, and Satan deceives them and brings them up around the "beloved city," and fire comes from God out of heaven and devours them, and the earth is made new.

G. P. Bollman thus describes the reign of the saints with Christ in heaven during the thousand years. But not only are the redeemed to go to heaven, there to behold its glory and bask in the sunshine, but they are to reign there with Christ a thousand years; there they are to sit down upon thrones of judgment, and with sanctified minds, and in the light of the most clear and undoubted testimony they will adjudicate the cases of the wicked. There they will judge both wicked men and fallen angels, as the apostle's words to the Corinthians clearly imply. "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?"

To this view of the judgment of the world I have a few objections:

1. God, in raising the righteous dead and changing the living righteous prior to the thousand years, seals the doom of the wicked living, and of the wicked dead, irreversibly. Therefore the saints, wherever they may be, cannot "adjudicate" their case. The Seventh Day adventists deny a future probationary state.

2. There is no sense in living saints spending a thousand years in examining "testimony" against dead men already doomed by the decision of the unerring, unchangeable God to a resurrection to eternal destruction. It is a senseless theory.

3. As none are taken to heaven but the saints, that is, those who believe in Christ and keep the commandments of God, and as all that are left upon the earth are classified with the "wicked," and as infants are left upon the earth, they must perish with the wicked. Let any one undertake to prove that the dead infants and the living infants will be changed, and caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and he will find that he has undertaken to prove that for which there is no "testimony." It is believers in Christ that are to be caught up to meet him at his coming, and to reign with him, not infants.

4. This theory locates Christ's kingdom in heaven. For, according to this writer, two things at least are essential to a kingdom, namely, "territory and subjects." Now if the saints are to be taken up to heaven it must be the territory of the kingdom for a thousand years; for he declares they reign there with Christ during that period. They cannot reign with Christ without entering the kingdom: and according to this theory they are the only subjects of the kingdom there will ever be. Consequently the kingdom is to be established in heaven, not "under" it.

5. Nay, but the subjects of a kingdom are those ruled by the king and his associates in authority. As the saints are to reign with Christ, and as he and they are to judge the world, it follows that the people of the world are to be the subjects of the kingdom, and the earth the territory. So, according to this theory under review, Christ and his associates in authority, rule, in the thousand years, dead men in the dust of the desolate earth, they, the rulers, being in heaven far from the territory of the kingdom. Surely that will be a very peaceful reign, nothing to hurt or destroy throughout all God's holy mountain. To avoid an uprising of the dead subjects of this kingdom against the rulers, all that will be necessary will be to let them remain dead. But they are not to remain dead, according to this writer, but to be raised from the state of death at the end of the thousand years in order that the devil may have subjects upon whom to exercise his powers of deception after his long confinement. And here comes in another objection.

6. According to John's vision the devil is to be confined in the abyss during the thousand years to prevent his deceiving the nations for that period; which supposes that the nations will be living during that time. For it is impossible to deceive dead men; but according to this theory the natures are dead.

This writer adds to the prophecy in saying that the wicked dead are to be raised at the end of the thousand years and be subjected to the wiles of the devil. John did not see the devil deceiving nations that had been dead and raised again.

8. To turn the devil loose among men once deceived, and by his own judgment and by the judgment of his saints doomed without mercy to eternal destruction, to turn him loose for no other purpose but to deceive them again and array them against the divine government, appears to be a procedure entirely unworthy of the King immortal, invisible, the only wise God, and a very strange course to be pursued by the Savior, especially when we consider that millions of those men died without ever hearing of him, or having the offer of salvation.

9. According to this theory there are to be two more comings of Christ, one at the beginning, the other at the end of the millennium. But the gospel tells us that Christ is to appear the "second time," but of a third coming it says nothing.

10. According to this theory Christ will never sit upon the throne of his father David and rule the house of Jacob as declared by the angel, foretold by the prophets, and preached by the apostles. For he is to reign in the New Jerusalem, a city built in heaven; and certainly David's throne was never there, and can never be, that is, allowing it to be a literal city built in heaven. David reigned over the twelve tribes of Israel dwelling in the land promised to Abraham and his seed. This kingdom was promised to David's seed, the Messiah. Either the Christ is to reign over the same nation in the same land or the promise to David is to be interpreted on the allegorical principle; that is, as David reigned as God's vicegerent over Israel, so the Christ was to reign as God's vicegerent over his people selected from among all nations to take the place of Israel. On this principle the prophecies of Israel's final restoration to the land of their fathers, must be taken as prophecies of Christ's people, the saints, the elect, being gathered into the land of the "fathers" of Israel, for the land does not typify any other land on earth; and if it typifies heaven, then heaven must be the antitypical Israel. But heaven is not the dwelling place. Therefore the land of promise is not a type of any other land or place. Therefore the Israel must dwell in that land. The Christ is to remain in heaven until the times of "restitution" foretold by all the holy prophets, that is till the times of the restoration of the kingdom of Israel, then God will send him, so Peter declares. Consequently Christ will come at the close of this age to re-establish God's kingdom on the earth, not to desolate the earth and leave it uninhabited for a thousand years.

11. According to the prophesy of Daniel and other prophets, the Christ is to reign not only over Israel but over all the nations of the earth. Daniel, in his vision, 7th chapter, saw given to "one like the Son of man, dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations and languages should serve and obey him;" and the Psalmist says, "All kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall serve him." Psa. lxxii. 11. Again, "All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee. For the kingdom is the Lord's and he is the ruler over the nations. Psa. xxii. 27, 28.

12. Finally, according to Daniel's prophecy, God's kingdom is to be set up "in the days of" earth's kingdoms, and to break them as such in pieces, not to be set up a thousand years after their destruction; and God's kingdom is to fill the earth not heaven. Dan. ii. 33, 44. God's kingdom, for which we pray, is to be set up on the earth, not in heaven, nor in the air; at Christ's coming, not a thousand years afterward. The waste cities of the land of promise are to be built up and inhabited, not desolate while the Israel of the prophets are destroyed with the nations, and as Israel not spoken of by the prophets is to heaven judging dead men already doomed. Truth is consistent.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 10.

BY DR. J. H. THOMPSON.

THE POST-TERTIARY OR QUARTERNARY AGE.

This intensely interesting division of creative energy, in its manifestations for the perfection of the earth, was ushered in by the frigid desolations of the Glacial Epoch, and its strata comprise the most recent and present deposits. Beginning with its glacial drifts, its bowlder clays and its moraines, it leads the observer through a maze of cave deposits, raised seabeaches, sub marine forests and peat bogs to the changes which are at the present time operating upon the argillaceous and arenaceous stratifications everywhere observable on the face of the earth. "The old earth is being washed away by atmospheric agency, and the abraded portions are continually carried away slowly and imperceptibly by streams and rivers, to form new deposits in the depths of inland lakes or of the ocean. Volcanoes are throwing up lava and scoria, and earthquakes are elevating portions of the earth's surface in one place, and depressing them in another; and plants and animals are, either with their living bodies or their dead exuviæ, forming, as in past ages, deposits in various places, as in the foraminiferous ooze of the deep ocean, and the enormous coral-reefs of the eastern seas, or the peat-mosses and diatomaceous earths of temperate climes. The record of all these changes, and the remains of man, and of the plants and animals which the strata produced by them contain,.....form common ground for the antiquary and geologist, and they have been diligently investigated by the students of both sciences." (Lib. Univ. Knowledge.)

In the Glacial and Drift beds are found the remains of the megatherium, the megalonyx and the mylodon, all of them gigantic representatives of the living sloth species; mammoths, mastodons and their cognates; glyptodons, weighing half a ton, the forerunner of the tortoise; the diprotodon, allied to the kangaroo, and the dicrnis a wingless percussor of the ostrich and dodo, while the human remains have not been traced back farther than "the horizon of the bowlder clay." (Lib. Univ. Knowl.) This, however, may be readily accounted for, since man's early home, the place where he began his existence, rapidly multiplied and suddenly perished, is only a mere conjecture of the present time, and as has been suggested, too, from the fact that incineration was probably the practice of the prehistoric race of men.

Be this as it may, the age becomes doubly interesting to us as the era of mind, during which the families of the earth have developed into nations; nations have been overthrown and ceased to exist; new governments have risen and soon passed from the stage of action, and have become matters of history, or the memory of them would be forgotten, until the entire continental areas and the islands of the sea teem with the testimonies of their presence and mentality. It is an age of history, an age in which God works as only a wonder-working God can work, while man assists, wonders, admires, adores, makes a record of the passing events and speculates largely as to what the end of these things shall be.

In its strata all the principal generic types of the present are represented primarily, in types to be fulfilled with the advance of the age, by the present subdivisions into species, families, groups and individuals. In this great work of propagation and subdivision man has been a prominent factor. As Hugh Miller aptly remarks, "He adds to the beauty of the flowers which he takes under his charge, to the delicacy and fertility of the fruits; the seeds of the wild grasses become corn under his care; the green herbs grow great of root or bulb, or bulky and succulent of top and leaf; the wild produce of nature sports under his hand; the rose and lily broaden their disks and multiply their petals, the harsh, green crab swells out into a delicious golden-rinded apple, streaked with crimson; the productions of his kitchen garden, strangely metamorphosed to serve the uses of his table, bear forms unknown to nature; an occult law of nature, of change and development inherent to these organisms meets in him with developing instinct and ability, and they are regenerated under his surveillance. Nor is his influence over many of the animals less marked. The habits which he imparts to the parents become nature, in his behalf, in their offspring. The dog under his tuition acquires the virtues of fidelity to a master and affection to a friend. The ox and horse learn to assist him in the labors of the fields. The udders of the cow and goat distend beneath. He cares far beyond the size necessary in the wild state, and supply him with rich milk and the other various products of the dairy. The fleece of the sheep becomes finer of texture and longer of fibre in his pens and folds; and even the indomitable silk-worm spins, in his sheltering conservatories, and among the mulberry trees which he has planted, a larger and brighter, and more glistening cocoon."

"The deputed Lord of creation, availing himself of God's natural laws, does what no mere animal of the old geologic ages ever did, or ever could have done,—he adorns and beautifies the earth, and adds tenfold to its original fertility and productiveness." Ibid.

As has been already stated, man was erected with the inate ability to obey or disobey law, according as he might elect. The law given to him for his trial was plain, distinct and imperative, yet easily obeyed, and secured to him a continuance of life, as well as the dominion over the world of animated existence, in case of his obedience.

The Tertiary man proved unequal to the self-control imposed by his Maker, disobeyed his law and thereby entailed suffering, sin and death on himself and his offspring. He thus forfeited for himself and them, life, the right to the tree of life, and the dominion over animated nature, since he had shown himself unfit to exercise universal dominion, when he could not control even himself. He became an alien from God and from his grace, and was without hope and without God in the world.

Thrown thus upon his own resources, for the suppression of evil, which was ever present with him, he soon resorted to his own arbitrary legal enactments for his protection. In the earlier days of his history this was effected by the subdivision into families, each controlled by the ipse dixit of its progenitor; later by tribal association, and at a still later period, by centralized governments, such as pertain to the present era. History became a necessity to which mankind applied itself readily.

The patriarchal and tribal forms of government under which the human family lived gradually yielded, in part at least, to the encroachments of ambition, sufficiently so, that it was only a few years after the flood before Nimrod "began to be a mighty one in the earth. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord," Gen. x. 8, 9; and he it was who established the basis of the Assyrian Empire, which existed under varying conditions of centralization and power, till it eventually became the seat of universal empire, and remained such for the space of 1931 years. The most reliable and complete history of mankind before and at this period, as well as subsequent thereto may be found in the Bible, to which the reader is referred. Through the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon in its most prosperous days, a brief history of the nations of the earth has been pre-written, enabling us to trace, historically, the later portions of the Quarternary or Post-tertiary Age.

The Scriptural account is as follows: "Thou, O king, sawest and beheld a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent stood before thee: and the form thereof was terrible. This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and thighs of brass, his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and broke them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them; and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth. This is the dream; and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king.

Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength and glory. And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into thine hand; and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold.

And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth. And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things; and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise. And whereas thou sawest the feet and the toes, part of potter's clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay. And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever.

THE IMAGE AND ITS CHRONOLOGICAL RELATIONS.

Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it broke in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver and the gold, the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure." Dan. ii. 31–45.

In this manner did the Almighty design to make known to the world his designs in relation to the future age-work of the Post-Tertiary age. First, is outlined the four great universal monarchies in order of their succession,—purely human governments carried on through their various conditions and relations, in the interests of the human race by human enactments, then follows the separation of the kingdoms, formerly confederated, each individual member assuming an independence peculiar to itself, yet retaining all the solidity, strength and vital energy of its united predecessors, and lastly, a brief description of a universal Theocracy to be instituted by God, governed by God-ordained laws, administered, not by the imperfect man of Tertiary creation, but, instead, by a perfected type of life as far superior to these as was the mammalian order of organic beings to the reptiles of the Mesozoic, or, the Devonian fishes in advance of the living forms of the Molluscan age, and it will be built up on the ruins of the kingdoms which preceded it.

These events constitute the history of the human race, and it is through them and it that we may trace the workings of the Divine Mind in the progress of the earth to its final development towards perfection.

THE CHILDHOOD OF JESUS.

In the green fields of Palestine,
By its fountains and its rills,
And by the sacred Jordan's stream,
And o'er the vine-clad hills.

Once lived and roved the Holiest Child
That ever blessed the earth;
The happiest, the holiest
That ever had human birth.

How beautiful his childhood was!
Harmless and undefiled;
Oh! dear to his young mother's heart
Was this pure, sinless Child!

Kindly in all his deeds and words,
And gentle as the dove;
Overflowing with affectionate,
His very soul was love.

Oh! is it not a blessed thought
Children of human birth,
That once the Savior was a child,
And lived upon the earth?

Dear Little Workers:

On the other side of Jordan,
Where the billows rise no more,
We shall meet to part no never
On that shore,
I am hoping in Christ to guide me over
To that shore.
Oh, hope and trust in him,
Oh hope forevermore!

OSCAR D. ROWE.

Dear Youthful Workers:

In this old home where Brother Chaplin used to live we always get out the dear Bible every morning to see what lesson God has for us for the day, and then we ask him to help us mind the lesson.

This morning we were reading in Acts, and such a nice story it was too. It was about Paul, but I think before I tell it to you, I will tell you something about him. When he was a young man he hated Christian people, and did all he could to hurt them. He went into their houses and seized them just as roughly as he could and made them go with him to prison. When Stephen was stoned to death he looked on. He did not believe in Jesus at all. His father had sent him to school to Gamaliel, in Jerusalem. There he was taught to keep the law just as God had given it to Moses, and to believe just as the Pharisees believed. He was born at Tarsus. You will find it on the map of Asia Minor.

When he was hunting up the Christians to have them put to death, he thought he was doing right, and that it would please God. But one day when he was on the road to a large city called Damascus, he found out better. It was about noon, and he had got almost to the city, when all at once a light, a great deal brighter than that of the sun, shone all around him. He was so astonished that he fell down to the ground, and while he lay there Jesus spoke to him.

What do you suppose Paul thought? He had never believed before that Jesus was alive. He knew that he had been put to death, and he thought it was all a story about his having been raised from the dead. But it could not have been a story for here Jesus was talking with him face to face!

He knew it was Jesus because he could see him with his own eyes, and if it was Jesus then it was all true that these Christians believed and taught.

But for all he could see him and knew that it was Jesus, he could hardly convince himself that it was so, for when the dear Lord asked him "what he was persecuting him for?" he answered, "Who are you sir?"

He was sure though that it was him, when the Savior said, "I am Jesus the Nazarene;" and then he wanted to know "what he must do?"

Jesus told him to go on to Damascus, and it would be told him there.

The light was so bright that it blinded him and he had to be led by the hand all the way. When he got into the city a man named Ananias called him "Brother Saul," and told him "to look up." I expect it seemed strange to Paul to be called "brother" by a man whom he would have put to death just a little while before. As soon as he was told to "look up" he could see.

Then Ananias said, "God has appointed all that he's gone to pass; he appointed that you should know his will, and that you should see Jesus and hear his voice, and now he wants you to go and tell men what you have seen and heard. Go and be baptized; don't wait a single hour. Wash yourself from your sins."

Paul believed. He did everything that Jesus told him to do. He didn't wait and wait and try to think he would be saved whether he minded or not. He went right off and began to preach in the great Jewish churches that "Jesus was the Son of God," and that "if men and women wanted to be saved they must believe in him."

After awhile Paul and a man named Silas were preaching by a river not far from Philippi. One day when they were going to the river they met some men who were the masters of a girl who could tell fortunes. The men got a great deal of money from people in this way. It was a bad spirit in the girl that made her tell fortunes. Paul knew Jesus could make the bad spirit come out of the girl if he were to ask him to do it. So he commanded the spirit in the name of Jesus to come out, and it left her, but it made the men very angry because they knew she could tell no more fortunes, and they would get no more money, so they dragged Paul and Silas up to court and had them whipped and put in jail. The jailor put them away back in the worst cells there were in the prison and fastened their feet so that there was no chance at all to get away. In the night when the old hour-glass said it was twelve o'clock, Paul and Silas got to feeling so happy that they had a little prayer meeting. When they had both prayed they went to singing. God heard them. He likes to hear men and women sing and pray when they are in earnest.

He sent an earthquake. It made the prison doors all come open.

The jailor waked up; he saw the doors open. He thought Paul and Silas had got away, and he knew if they were gone, the commanders would kill him for letting them escape, so he thought he would kill himself. But Paul called out as loud as he could that he must not hurt himself, because every one was there just as they had been when he closed the doors at nightfall.

He thought then that God must be there. He wanted to know "what he must do to be saved?" Paul and Silas told him all about Jesus, and that if he wanted to live forever he must believe in him and be baptized.

What do you think the jailor and his family did? They went that very night and were baptized; they did not even wait until morning.

And oh how glad they were to find Jesus and to know that he could save them! I thought it was such a nice story that I must tell you about it.

I wonder if God didn't let the naughty men put Paul in prison on purpose so that the jailor would hear him preach? I think he did.

Bad men never have things as they think they are going to have them do they? I suppose they never thought that there could be a meeting in a jail. But God can help us do good wherever we may be.

Will all my little friends try what they can do? You will feel happy when you are doing something for Jesus. Your loving friend,

S. ROXANA WIKOFF.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 30.

Ques. What will be the final destiny of the wicked?

Ans. Destruction. It means, according to Webster: destroy, demolition, ruin, termination of life, devastation, extirpation, extinction, extermination, annihilation.

Q. Are these terms applied to the punishment of the wicked?

A. Some of them are. We will now give some texts.

"And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." 2 Thess. i. 7–9.

"For many walk of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ, whose end is destruction." Phil. iii. 18, 19.

"But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." 2 Peter iii. 7.

In the last text we have the word perdition which is defined to be a loss of life or eternal death. We will notice Obadiah, 18th verse; speaking of all the heathen nations he says: "For as ye have drunk upon my holy mountain, so shall all the heathen drink continually; yea, they shall drink and they shall swallow down, and they shall be as though they had not been." In Psa. xxxvii. 8–10, we have this, "Cease from anger and forsake wrath, fret not thyself in any wise to do evil, for evil-doers shall be cut off, but those that wait upon the Lord they shall inherit the earth. For yet a little while and the wicked shall not be, yea thou shalt diligently consider his place and it shall not be."

At the 20th verse we have perish and consume; it reads, "But the wicked shall perish and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs, they shall consume, into smoke shall they consume away."

Mal. iv. 1 says, "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven and all the proud, yea and all that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Vs. 3: "And ye shall tread down the wicked for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet in the day that I shall do this saith the Lord of hosts."

We have now found,—

1. That God will punish the wicked.

2. He will punish them with destruction and when so destroyed that they will be as though they had not been.

We cannot believe that a just and loving Father as God represents himself to be, will eternally torture his children that he has created, for the sins of a short life. He will return them to dust again from whence they came. We know that there are those that think that the Bible teaches eternal torment. If it does it certainly contradicts itself which we do not believe. Dear friends study your Bibles closely, for nothing but the truth will stand the test in that great and coming day.

BOOKS.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weethee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of the coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar forces, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the failures of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the "Wise Men," whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand at work in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the age to come, preparatory to the dispensations put in his Scriptures and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth, Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already allowed or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is no time to be much sleeper to our free institutions from Romanism now, than there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth 12mo, 198 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional.

—BY—

FATHER CHINIQUY.

ITS REVELATIONS ARE APPALLING.

Painful and horrible are words too weak to express the things which he relates — things enough to rouse the stones to cry out against a system which brings forth such apples of Sodom and deadly poison to the Church, the family and society.

THE RESTITUTION

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Selections.

PAUL'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 1.

You will remember that in my last lecture I stated that the three foreviews of Romanism presented by Daniel, Paul, and John respectively, have three distinctive characters. Daniel gives mainly its political relations and its broad moral features; Paul presents its ecclesiastical relations and its religious features; and John, by the two compound hieroglyphs which he employs, and which we will consider in the next lecture, exhibits the combination of the two aspects—a politico-ecclesiastical power. He shows also the changing relations between its contrasted yet united elements during their long joint career, and foretells the distinctive doom of each.

It must never be forgotten that the Roman Papacy was for long ages an absolute, unlimited, tyrannical monarchy, a worldly, secular government. It had its territorial dominions, its provinces, cities, and towns; it had its court, its nobles, its ambassadors, its army, its police, its legislature, its jurisprudence, its laws, its advocates, its prisons, its revenues, its taxes, its exchequer, its mint, its arsenals, its forts, its foreign treaties, and its ambitious, selfish plans and policy, just as much as any mere secular kingdom. But it was also something very different—it was the head of the Latin Church; it was a great ecclesiastical power; it was a religion as well as a government. As such it had its dioceses and parishes, its spiritual hierarchy of archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons, its theological schools and colleges and professors, its abbots and deans, its councils and synods and chapters, its monasteries and convents, its orders of mendicant and other friars its services and sacraments, its creeds and confessions, its doctrines and discipline, and its penances and punishments. Romanism is a comprehensive term including both these widely different organizations. Both had their centre in the seven-hilled city, and both regarded the Roman pontiff as head. Just as in the old pagan times the Cæsars themselves had been both emperors and high priests of the national religion, so the popes in mediæval times were fountain-heads of authority both in the kingdom and in the Church. The ecclesiastical position of the emperors was however rather a name than a reality; while that of the popes was most real. They were practically and effectively head in both realms.

From his remote point of view, in the Babylonian era, the statesman-prophet Daniel saw mainly the political status of the Papacy. From his five-hundred-years-later standpoint, under the empire of Rome, the Christian Apostle Paul saw and foretold most clearly the ecclesiastical character of the coming antichrist; and this evening we are to consider this latter foreview of Romanism,—we are to study it as a Church system. I must ask you at your leisure to study very carefully three or four passages in the writings of the Apostle Paul, especially the third and fourth chapters of his first letter to Timothy, and the second chapter of his second Epistle to the Thessalonians. You will see that Paul's foreview consists of two parts: the first gives a general view of the great apostasy, which would in due time arise in the Church; and the second a carefully drawn portrait of the power in which that apostasy would be headed up. He had even previously predicted the apostasy in his parting address to the elders of the Church at Ephesus, recorded in Acts xx. He had told them that there would arise—not from the outside world, but from among themselves, the pastors or bishops of the Church—"grievous wolves, not sparing the flock." "Of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them; therefore watch, and remember how I ceased not to warn you." This was but a brief and passing glance into the dark future; but the momentary glimpse suffices to show the outline of the evils which time was to develop, and which Paul so fully predicted later on. Ten pagan persecutions lay before the Church; but Paul does not predict them. Myriads of Christians were to do literally what he did figuratively, to fight with wild beasts in Roman amphitheatres; but the Apostle's prophetic gaze rests not on any such spectacle. Not a worse evil by far was to befall the Church: an enemy was to arise in her midst, an apostasy was to originate in her bosom, and eat like a cancer into her vitals. Her own leaders were to mislead her; her very pastors, instead of feeding the flock, would feed on it, and devour it like ravening wolves. Perverse pastors, selfish, mercenary bishops, would draw away disciples after themselves, instead of drawing them to Christ as Paul had done. He had coveted no man's silver or gold, as he reminds them: but these apostate bishops who should be of a wholly different character, robbing and oppressing the Church as wolves the flock; they would be the direct opposites of the Good Shepherd who gave his life for the sheep, and of the apostolic ministry which follows in his steps.

This first warning prediction of the Apostle Paul was addressed, it is true, especially to the elders or bishops (episcopoi) of Ephesus; but in view of all that has happened since, it is easy to see that the Ephesian bench of bishops were at any rate representative, for the words are a prediction of the ecclesiastical corruption that culminated in the Papacy. It strikes the key-note as to the nature of the evil from which the Church was destined to suffer so long and so widely. The pagan persecutions, which threatened to exterminate the early generations of Christians, were harmless to the Church compared to the internal corruption and cruel tyranny introduced by her own bishops later on. Paul's foreview, from the first, was of an ecclesiastical evil, one arising not from the throne of the emperors but from the bench of bishops, not outside but inside the Church. You will feel the importance of this fact later on in our course more than you can do now; I urge you to take special note of it.

In the picture of the coming apostasy which Paul draws in 1 Timothy he adds many an additional and dark detail. After giving practical precepts for the organization and government of the infant Church, and specifying the qualifications essential in its bishops and deacons (one of which was that they should be married men), and after summing up the faith of Christ in a brief epitome of "the mystery of godliness," he writes—and we may well believe he did so with a heavy heart:

"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their consciences seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." Here we have, not only a prediction that there would be an "apostasy," or falling away from the faith in the Christian Church, but a description of its origin and character. Its origin was to be satanic; its doctrines were to be doctrines of devils, or demons. It was to assume authority, and to lay down laws and prohibitions. Prominent among these was to be the prohibition of marriage; that is, of the very relationship which the inspired apostle had just previously enjoined on bishops and deacons in the words, "A bishop must be blameless, the husband of one wife; ....one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity;" and in the words, "Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own house well." Marriage, although thus divinely ordained, would be prohibited, and meats, though created to be received with thanksgiving, would be forbidden. Thus the apostasy would be marked by a departure from primitive faith and pure religion, and by the authoritative insulation in its place of asceticism—the substitution of an external religiousness, and self-imposed sacrifices, for true holiness of heart. For this external self-denial was not true holiness, but a cover for the reverse. Its professors would be hypocrites and liars, men so sinful as to have lost their conscience against sin; "speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron."

This feature of false profession reappears in the corresponding prophecy in 2 Timothy concerning the "last days," in which the abettors and adherents of the apostasy are described as men "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." These men were not then to be open opponents of godliness, but, on the contrary, they would be great professors. They were to have a form of godliness: but only a form—a form covering the reality; a hollow form, a hypocritical form. Thus the two great Pauline prophecies of the apostasy in "the latter days" warn the Church, not against professed irreligionists, but against professed religionists, against covert enemies of the Gospel: men cloaked in the garment of self-denial and superior sanctity; clever imitators of the apostles, like the magicians of Egypt, who withstood Moses, not denying his miracles, but by counterfeiting them; cunning men, who should "creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts;" and withal educated men, men of letters, "ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." Mark this well: the men whom Paul described as the leaders of the apostasy which he foresaw were not low, ignorant infidels, but learned hypocrites, lying professors of religion, and self-deceived ascetics.

It is in this same strain that he writes also to the Thessalonians. The coming of Christ, he tells them, would not take place before the occurrence of an "apostasy," or falling away from the faith. This apostasy was to result from the working of that he calls "the mystery of iniquity"—a remarkable expression, in direct contrast to the "mystery of godliness;" from which the apostasy is a departure. (Comp. 1 Tim. iii. 16.) The iniquity in question was hidden. It was a "mystery." People did not recognize it as iniquity; they were deceived by it. From this "mystery of iniquity" was to spring in due time "the man of sin," whose coming was to be "after the working of Satan." The outcome and issue of this Satan-inspired apostasy would be "all deceivableness of unrighteousness," "lying wonders," and the belief of lies under the influence of "strong delusion" on the part of those who had "pleasure in unrighteousness."

All this is consistent. These Pauline prophecies teach the same thing. They warn the Church against the same danger. They predict the same sort of apostasy; an apostasy marked, not by open hostility to the gospel, not by the denunciation of godliness and the publishing profession of infidelity or atheism, but by "hypocrisy," "deceit," a "form of godliness," external religiousness, the practice of asceticism, cloaking corruption—by a beautiful garment of light covering the form of the very prince of darkness.

But this apostasy was to have a head, and the coming and character of that head are the great subject of Paul's Thessalonian prophecy. A mistaken apprehension of his first letter to them had led the Thessalonians to expect an immediate advent of Christ, and in his second epistle Paul sets himself to correct this error by further instruction as to the future. He tells them of something that was destined to precede the return of Christ, a great apostasy, which would reach its climax in the manifestation of a certain mighty power of evil; to which he gives many particulars similar to those which Daniel gave of his "little horn," such as the place and time of its origin, its nature, sphere, character, conduct, and doom.

The names which the apostle gives to this head of the apostasy in this prophecy are "that man of sin,....the son of perdition," and "that wicked" or "lawless" one. These expressions might convey to the mind of superficial readers the idea that the predicted head of the apostasy would be an individual. Careful study however shows this to be a false impression—an impression for which there is no solid foundation in the passage. The expressions themselves, when analysed grammatically, are seen to bear another signification quite as well, if not better, and the context demands that they be understood in a dynastic sense. "The man of sin," like "the man of God," has a broad, extended meaning. When we read "that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," we do not suppose it means any one individual man, although it has the definite article. It indicates a whole class of men of a certain character, a succession of similar individuals. The use of the indefinite article (analogous to the omission of the article in Greek) does indeed limit an expression of the kind. A man of sin could be only one, just as a king of England could mean only an individual. The king, on the other hand, may include a whole dynasty. A king has but the life of an individual, the king never dies. When, in speaking of the Jewish tabernacle in Hebrews, Paul says that into the holiest of all "went the high priest alone once every year," he includes the entire succession of the high priests of Israel. That a singular expression in a prophecy may find its fulfilment in a plurality of individuals is perfectly clear from John's words, "As ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even so now are there many antichrists."

Any doubt or ambiguity as to the true force of the expression "the man of sin" is however removed by a consideration of the context of this passage. Grammatically it may mean either an individual or a succession of similar individuals. The context determines that it actually does mean the latter. "The mystery of iniquity," in which this man of sin was latent, was already working in Paul's day. The apostasy out of which he was to grow was already in existence. "The mystery of iniquity doth already work." The man of sin, on the other hand, was to continue till the second advent of Christ, which is still future; for he is destroyed, as it is distinctly stated, only by the brightness of the epiphany. The interval between Paul's days and those of the still future advent was then to be filled by the great apostasy in either its incipient working as a mystery of iniquity or its open manifestation and great embodiment in the career of "the man of sin and son of perdition." That career must consequently extend over more than a thousand years, for the process of gestation is certainly briefer than the duration of life. In this case of the man of sin the two together occupy at least eighteen centuries. What a proportion of the period can we assign to the hidden, mysterious growth of this power, and what to its wonderfully active and influential life? The life must of course occupy the larger half, to say the least of it, and therefore, as no individual lives on through the ages, we may be sure that it is a succession of men, a dynasty of rulers, that is intended by the ambiguous expression. We, students of the nineteenth century, may be sure of this, though the students of early centuries could not.

THE MILLENNIAL KINGDOM, OR THE GLORIOUS REIGN OF CHRIST ON THE EARTH. No. 1.

We think it is clear from the testimony of the prophets, and from the Lord's message which was sent by the angel to Mary, that Christ must possess the "throne of his father David," and sway the sceptre over the house of Jacob, as the son and seed of David. And if that is true, it must be on the earth, for there is where David's throne is located; and we have no account of it having been removed from the earth, nor have we any intimation in the prophecies that it would ever be removed. Besides we hear the four living creatures and the four and twenty elders, who had been "redeemed unto God out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation," but who were represented as being in heaven, rejoicing over the reception of the book that was received by the Lamb from the "hand of him who sat upon the throne," Rev. v. 7, and saying, "We shall reign on the earth." ver. 10.

When we consider the fact that this scene appears in a panoramic picture that was presented to John by the Lord Jesus Christ, immediately after closing his representations of the seven churches of Asia, after saying to him, "I will show thee things that must be hereafter," Rev. iv. 1, it is very easy to understand that the scene was presented to represent something that was to take place in the future, and the fact that he had made the promise, that "to him that overcometh he would confess his name before his Father, and before his holy angels, Rev. iii. 5, would indicate that the living creatures and elders were intended to represent the raptured church with their Lord in heaven, as they will be, after they shall have been "caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." While the book that was received by the Lamb represented the title-deed of sovereignty of this world, under which the King of kings will take possession and reign as declared by the prophets. And it was perfectly natural for those who had received the promise of "sitting with their Lord on his throne," Rev. iii. 21, and of having "power over the nations," chap. ii. 26, to rejoice at seeing him invested with power and authority, under which they were to receive the fulfilment of his promise to them: and in their ecstasy we hear them say, "We shall reign on the earth," which was only giving expression to the fact that is clearly indicated elsewhere in the Scriptures, namely, that when he should reign they would reign with him, as in Dan. vii. 22, and Matt. xix. 28, also 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3.

Now as Christ has never yet reigned on the throne of David, it follows that he must hereafter return and verify the prophecies which declare that he shall thus reign. This seems to have been the understanding of Peter, who after declaring how the prophecies pertaining to the sufferings of Christ had been fulfilled, referred to what was yet to be accomplished, and said: "He shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you: whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," Acts iii. 20, 21. And again in chapt. xv. 16, after the work of taking out of the Gentiles "a people for his name," has been accomplished, the Lord says, "He will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and will build again the ruins thereof, and will set it up." This very clearly refers to the second personal coming of Christ, when, not only the tabernacle, but the throne of David which has been so long in perversion, (See Ezek. xxi. 27, margin,) will be returned and again set up in Jerusalem, and to the same that Daniel declares "the God of heaven shall set up which shall never be destroyed," Dan. ii. 44.

Upon this throne Christ the Son of David will sit in the flesh—in his resurrection body, as Peter declares the Lord promised to David saying, "Of the fruit of thy loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne: he seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ," Acts ii. 31, 32.

When the Lord comes to take possession of the throne of David which will then be his own, he will be accompanied with all his saints, Zech. xiv. 5, and Rev. xvii. 14, who shall have previously been "taken out of the Gentiles for his name," and "caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air," 1 Thess. iv. 17. They will come to occupy their place with him on his throne," Rev. iii. 21.

The subjects of this kingdom will be the saved of Judah and Israel, who being returned to the old home of their fathers will form a nucleus, toward which the nations will gravitate, and Jerusalem will be the metropolis of the world, as we learn from the following Scriptures:

"And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem," Isa. ii. 2, 3, and Mic. iv. 1, 2. "Then many people and strong nations shall come and seek the Lord in Jerusalem," Zech. viii. 20–21. "At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord: and all nations shall be gathered into it," Jer. iii. 17.

In this way "The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever," Rev. xi. 15, after which, according to Zech. xiv. 9, "The Lord shall be King over all the earth."

A very prevalent opinion is, that only a spiritual kingdom was spoken of in the prophecies, and that it has been established over the Church, and that all the millennium we should look for, is for the principles of Christianity to become universally diffused and generally accepted, so that the world shall come under its power and be subject to it away; but we cannot so understand the language used by the prophets. They speak in the most positive terms, and represent the Lord as saying, that he "will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth, * * * and this is his name whereby he shall be called, the Lord our righteousness," Jer xxiii. 5, 6, and xxxiii. 15, 16. And the angel said, "He shall reign over the house of Jacob, Luke i. 33; and in Micah iv. 7, it is said: "The Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion." Now as the house of Jacob, over whom the reign of Christ must be established, represents a literal nationality, it cannot represent the church which is never in the Scriptures called a nation; but is composed of such as "have put on Christ," of whom Paul says, "There is neither Jew nor Greek," but they "are all one in Christ Jesus," Gal. iii. 27, 29. They may be Jews or Greeks so far as relates to their connection with the world, but national distinction signifies nothing, so far as there being in Christ is concerned, which, according to the teaching of the Scriptures, is something very different from him reigning over them as king: therefore we cannot understand the prophecies which declare that he shall reign over the house of Israel, to have any reference to his church. The relation of the church to Christ, as represented by himself and the apostles is a very much nearer one than that of subjects to a king, as illustrated in John xv. 5, where Jesus says, "I am the vine, ye are the branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing." Also in Rome xii. 5, where it is said: "So we being many are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." In these, and in many other portions of God's word, the relation of the church to Christ is represented as a living one, which is essential to its existence, and to the life of its members. In a sense which is not true of the relation between a king and his subjects, from which it appears evident, that the church is not the kingdom predicted by the prophets.

We find in the Scriptures many beautiful pen-pictures, which portray the glories of the reign of Christ over his people on the earth. That of its being established in righteousness appears in the foreground. Paul in Heb. i. 8, represents the Lord as saying to the Son, "Thy throne is forever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom." And the Psalmist declares that "Righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne," Psa. xcvii. 2. And in Rev. xix. 11, it is said: "In righteousness doth he judge and make war." These Scriptures very clearly teach that by his righteous judgments he will cleanse the world of those unrighteous elements of power, which cause so much confusion and threaten the civilizations of the earth with destruction. After this, his chosen people of Israel and Judah being joined into one, shall not "defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions;" but the Lord says, "I will save them out of all their dwelling-places, wherein they have sinned, and I will cleanse them, so shall they be my people, and I will be their God: And David my servant shall be king over them," Ezek. xxxvii. 23, 24.

The reason why the Jews rejected the Lord Jesus, and would not have him for their king, was evidently, not because of the spiritual nature of his kingdom, as is generally supposed, but because they were unwilling to submit to the righteousness of his government. When he began to cleanse the temple by casting "out all them that sold and bought" therein, "and overthrew the tables of the money changers, and the seats of them that sold doves, and said unto them: It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves," Matt. xxvi. 12, 13, they discovered that it meant a revolution, and that there must come an end to all their diverse dealing and vile practices, and that it would result in their expulsion from their official positions, which caused them to become enraged, and in their anger took him, and in the most heartless manner, put him to death. And it is to be feared that multitudes who are now in the church, as well as in the world, would be as unwilling to give up their form of government, and their hope of carnal enjoyment and submit to the requirements of the righteous government of Christ, as were the Jews, who condemned him to be crucified.

In connection with this line of thought, the question very naturally arises: Will the people be any more ready to receive him when he comes again? This question is substantially of the same import as the one propounded by our Lord, as follows: "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth," Luke xviii. 8. This question, standing in the connection it does, is equal to an affirmation that there will not be faith on the earth, in any general sense, when he comes; therefore the people will generally be no more ready to receive him than they were at his first coming. But they will not have power to take him and put him away as they had upon that occasion. And those who undertake to destroy him, or hinder the setting up of his kingdom, will themselves be destroyed by his judgments, as indicated in Matt. xxiv. 37, 39, where he said: "As the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and given in marriage until the days that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be."

While Noah was building the ark, and warning the people of the consequences of their wickedness, they would not believe, but doubtless made sport of him, calling him a crazy headed fool, etc., until, very unexpectedly, the flood came and destroyed them; so in like manner will it be at "the coming of the Son of man." Zechariah, the prophet tells us that "It shall come to pass, that in the land, saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein, and I will bring the third part through the fire, and I will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried: they shall call on my name, and I will hear them; and I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The Lord is my God," Zech. xiii. 8, 9. The cutting off the wicked, and the trying and refining of those who shall be left, which is declared shall take place when Christ shall come again, very clearly corroborates the Scriptures which teach that his throne shall be established in righteousness.—*W. ## SICKNESS AND RESULTANT REFLECTIONS.

And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick, Isa. xxxiii. 24.

And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away. Rev. xxi. 4.

On the date of the issue of our last paper, the Editor was taken quite unwell, and, as a result, had to betake himself to the bed and its retirement from the busy world for most of the time since. It is in these hours of prostration and seclusion from earthly influences and worldly temptations that we are brought to know and realize the worth of God's precious book—The Bible. While ruminating on some of the precious truths contained in this wonderful volume our mind was specially drawn to the great central truth of the gospel—"The redemption that is in Christ Jesus." When feeling our utter destitution of all personal righteousness that could make us acceptable unto God, how heart-cheering was the thought that we, in all our moral bereavement and lack of holiness as a plea to urge before the Most High for the bestowment of his favor, could, nevertheless "be accepted in the Beloved;" and that "in him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace." In our meditations on this glorious theme our moving lips would often whisper over, in self-conversation, the verses of that hymn so adapted to our line of thought, of which we quote the first two:

There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins;
And sinners plunged beneath that flood,
Lose all their guilty stains.

The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day;
And there have I, though vile as he,
Washed all my sins away.

When temples were sobbing, and pulses were running hot and quick, it brought a thrill of gladness to the laboring heart to think and know that "the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin." No sun-lit drops of dew are as beautiful as truly penitential tears, but even tears of godly grief can not wash away sins. Martyr blood shed for the truth's sake is precious only as the blood of the justified, but it is not justifying. "It was not the blood they shed for Christ, but the blood that Christ shed for them, that saved them." Our few days of languishing have brought home to our heart the inestimable and priceless value of that blood that was shed on Calvary by the Lamb of God. O, yes, we said over and over:

Dear dying Lamb, thy precious blood
Shall never lose its power,
Till all the ransomed church of God
Be saved, to sin no more.

While we felt that redeeming grace and dying love had proselyted our poor heart to Jesus, our stimulated thoughts sped out over the wide wastes of our sin-ruined world; and its recorded scrolls, written within and without, and written therein and thereon—lamentations, and mourning, and woe! Sin has agonized a world! Even the melodies of saintly lips are not all melodies of unmixed transport. Every heart-harp has a string always attuned to an undertone of sorrow; and O, how often it is that, in the tensions of grief, its wailing notes alone sound out to mingle with the outbursts of woe that fill the air with the means of a groaning creation. Our blessed Redeemer was "a man of sorrows;" and it is given to the Church "in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake." The "pillar of cloud" and the "pillar of fire" were heavenly, as vehicles of a heavenly leader, but they led the followers over a desert pathway. Our feet, too, must press their imprints into hot sands, and the thorn and the briar stand close and thick on either hand. But O, we thought the outcome in the heavenly country. On those celestial shores the sun-stroke never smites. On the wideseed plains of the glory-land no tempest's fury will ever beat; its delectable mountains will never heave with earthquake-throes, nor be channeled with rivers of volcanic fiery floods. "Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains; for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will have mercy upon his afflicted." We thought if earth's girdling zone be now composed of waterless wastes, of burning sands, and barren rocks, yet God has said:—"I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valley; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water. I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil-tree; I will set in the desert the fir-tree, the pine, and the box-tree together." The frigid climes of Arctic and Antarctic rigor, where perpetual winter reigns over ago-lasting solitudes of icy desolation, shall also yet become summer lands of living green. Oh yes, yes, we thought, that this very earth, that God's corrosive curse has been resting upon and devouring for Millenniums, shall yet be the Beulah land of the universe, over which Morning Stars shall once more sing, and Sons of God in triumph shout.

O, Beulah land, sweet Beulah land,
Our heart cried out for thee.

And we too thought of him, the loving Savior, who was once here on earth, to partake of our cup of human sorrows, and then die our human death. Before he went away, we remembered, that he sent out his gospel by his chosen ones, and that the glad tidings had reached us across the lapse of centuries, bringing its joy and its peace to our fainting heart and ashing head. We then thought further that,—O he said, I will come again; I will not leave you—the children of my Father's family—comfortless orphans; I will, I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am, there ye may be also. And we said, Come Lord Jesus, come! O thou, the once crucified, the once entombed, come. Yes, come, and come crowned, and throned, and sceptered. Come with thy escorting hosts of angels. O come and send these heavenly messengers abroad on the four winds for thy redeemed Bride. Bring, O bring, resurrection, regeneration, transfiguration, and the skyward rapture. Bring the crowns, the white robes, and the golden sandals. Wipe forever away her last sad tear and bring her within the pearly gates to be ever with her Lord.

And we thought of Israel in exile, and of Palestine in desolation, and we remembered Zion in her widowhood, and that the church's Savior was Israel's Messiah, and that Palestine was Immanuel's land. Come then, our Immanuel and their Immanuel, and gather scattered Israel and make thy own land a name and a praise in the whole earth. Make its wilderneases Edens, and its vales and hill-slopes gardens of God. Yes, O Lord, thou hast said, "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." Again the enthroned One has said, "Behold, I make all things new." Welcome, thrice welcome, times of restitution. Hasten, O hasten, ages of glory, when there shall be New Heavens and a New Earth. For half a century we have been awaiting the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, and our expectant eyes look upward still. We have waited for thy salvation, O Lord.

Selections.

"THE ERROR OF THE WICKED."

"Ye, therefore, beloved, seeing ye know before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness." 2 Pet. iii. 17.

It might be well to inquire, what is this one peculiar "error of the wicked," of which the apostle Peter here speaks? He does not speak of all the errors of the wicked in general, but of some one special error of the wicked. Bible expositors in general give us but little or no light on the question—the Scriptures themselves must explain their own meaning and true sense. Doubtless it refers to a certain prevailing heresy which is to be developed and do its work of ruin, more especially in "the last days, just before the world's last great surprise by the sudden and unexpected appearance of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven." This appearing and its consequences are the themes on which the apostle had been dwelling, especially in this last chapter of his second and last letter. It is reasonable to conclude that "the error of the wicked" referred to, is the same that the apostle had before learned as connected with his theme. An error so delusive and fatal, that the natural consequence of embracing and promulgating it would be a fall from their "own steadfastness" in the gospel hope. Such being the fact, the warning was needful, and timely given, "Beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness." Surely this "error of the wicked" must be a very serious and subtle heresy, which in the "last days" would come in direct conflict with the teaching of the holy Scriptures, and be known by the faithful few who should then walk in the light of the Holy Ghost as shining on the sacred word. The origin and nature of this latter day heresy and delusion would then be known by its natural and necessary tendency, which would be general apostasy from the primitive faith, hope and practice. To those who have ears to hear, the apostle has named what this latter death-dealing heresy would be, so clear, that there is left no room for conjecture or lingering doubt. Hear it: "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts." Here are the characters—"walking after their own lusts;" and now, then, what is the error of these scoffers? "And saying, where is the promise of his (Christ's) coming? For since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." This is the point of their error and also of their scoffing; this surely must be "the error of the wicked," so fatal to all who embrace it, as the apostle designates no other. Strange, very strange that there should be a doubt of this fact on the mind of any honest inquirer after truth. It is, indeed, a fearful thing to dislike, cavil with, and reject "the truth as it is in Jesus." Such cavillers invariably lose their power of hearing with the inner ear, and seeing with the inner eye. There are not wanting such in high positions and high places, the eyes of whose understanding of spiritual things is already hopelessly darkened. On such labor is lost; they seem to have no real capacity to appreciate and feel the force of God's revealed truth when it conflicts with their preconceived notion. Hence the seven times repeated admonition, so significant and startling: "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches." This teaching is, that there is a class who have no power to hear. Such a fearful condition and want of capacity is brought on by meeting the most precious truth that was ever revealed to mortals with cold indifference, and then still worse trifling with it till the Spirit is grieved away, and all is dark. "Every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" is the soul's proper food. There can be no substitute for the Holy Ghost, or for the revealed Word of God—rejecting these, all is lost. Without these, there may be spurious conversions and many formal churches, both of them barriers to true vital godliness.

The great hinderance to the cause of true religion in our day is a mere nominal, formal religion, claiming to be the Church, though organized in numerous forms directly adverse each to the other. Such a state of things the Holy Ghost has foretold by the mouth of the holy prophets and apostles, as characterizing and distinctly marking the last days of the present dispensation. This sad state of things is brought about by the arch-deceiver, in substituting "the error of the wicked" for the truth of God. Thus he succeeded as "the father of lies" even in Paradise. The Jewish Church were so blinded and fallen that they did not discern the signs of the times, and failed to see in Christ each and every distinct characteristic of their Messiah and King, so clearly set forth by their own prophets, and daily read in their synagogues. Therefore they despised, rejected, condemned, and crucified "the Lord of life and glory." A blindness, less marvellous and ruinous in its results, is foretold as marking the last stage of the Gentile Church, in the last days of the present age. Let us take one for example from the many throughout the Scriptures. "This know, also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than God. Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof," 2 Tim. iii. 1–5. Such is the gloomy, yet unerring picture of the masses professing and having a form of godliness. Not even the form of it, but a form of their own devising, by which they "deceive" and are thus themselves "deceived." By slow and imperceptible degrees they shall drift away from "the faith once delivered to the saints," substituting for it "the error of the wicked," and, true enough, "shall be turned to fables," and thus join in the general and popular scoffing, "Where is the promise of his coming?" This scoffing is everywhere sanctioned and baptized orthodoxy, and promulgated in high places by "blind leaders of the blind." These are "deceiving and being deceived" by the great latter-day heresy, "my Lord delayeth his coming," which is either implied or expressed, in a thousand forms, in what is called "Church literature." The need of the personal return of earth's Lord and King as the Second Adam and great Restorer, is stoutly denied by multitudes of those who claim to be followers of Christ and guides to his flock. Thus his return is neither desired nor loved. The last delusive and unmistakable peace cry, so soothing and welcome to the unsaved, is all abroad. The professed church of Christ is boastful of her immense resources, in talents, influence, numbers, and wealth. Ministers and people are jubilant with the view of their bright future prospects of subjugating the world to the present type of our common Christianity by human instrumentalities. Were these expectations realized, surely the world would still need to be converted to vital godliness according to Bible standard.

What saith he who knoweth all things, and cannot be deceived, to the Laodicean Church, the type, and through her to the present Gentile Church, the antitype, the last stage of the latter-day Church? "Thus saith the Amen, the faithful and true Witness, the beginning of the creation of God: I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot. I would that thou were cold or hot. So, then, because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold or hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing, and knowest not that thou art wicked, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." Strange! "And knowest not." Thus was it in the days of Noah; they knew not what they might have known. And thus shall it be when the Son of Man is revealed, and thus it is at the present day.—J. C., in Prophetic Times.

FORTIFIED CHURCHES.

In the twelfth century, Geisa II., King of Hungary, sent heralds into German towns to invite their yeomen to settle in his scantily peopled land. Thousands hearkened to the heralds and sought in Transylvania—the land beyond the forest—the rights and prosperity denied them in their feudal home. To these Saxon immigrants the words "church" and "fortress" were synonymous. Each village church was built on rising ground and surrounded by fortified walls and a moat crossed by a drawbridge.

When threatened by an enemy the people used to retire to these fortified churches, and from the heights roll down heavy stones on the assailants.

Some of these stones may be seen among the briars and weeds which surround the ruined church of Michelsberg. They are moss-covered, and being round, resemble giant cannon-balls.

In those days of war and rumors of war it was necessary to keep a supply of these round stones, that they might be in readiness to be rolled down upon an approaching enemy. To maintain the supply a law compelled each bridegroom, before leading his bride to the altar, to roll uphill to the church door one of these large stone balls. As the hill was generally steep, and each stone weighed two hundred pounds, the rolling of it up to the church was no slight test of strength and affection.

The sieges which the Transylvanian villages were compelled to endure from Turks or Tartars gave rise to some customs which are still observed. In the belfry tower of Kaised there hangs a little bell, which has been hung since 1506. Every evening it is now rung at the curfew-hour, and the watchman, until a few years ago, was compelled to call out during the night: "Not this way, you villians! not this way! I see you well!"

"We have eaten chapels all full of bacon," said, a few years ago, a churchwarden of one of these Saxon villages to a traveller. For at that time, at least, the people still held to the ancient custom of keeping provisions stored within the fortified church walls, that a siege might be endured, without starvation.

Once when the Turks had begun to scale the walls of a fortified church, a girl's wit saved the people from capture and death.

Behind the church was a little garden, and in it a dozen bee-hives which it was the girl's duty to care for. Taking a hive she ran upon the fortress-wall and hurled it down among the enemy. Again and again she repeated the process until ten or more swarms of maddened bees were stinging the Turks. They were blinded and dismayed, and, unable to cope with the insect foe, beat a hasty retreat. They had been discomfited by a girl's device.

PALESTINE NOTES.

RESETTLEMENT OF PALESTINE.

CHICAGO, July 6.—Dr. Sievartha, a well known resident of this city, left yesterday for England, where he expects to spend some months in organizing an extensive movement for the re-settlement of Palestine. A number of families in this city are preparing to leave in the autumn, and Dr. Sievartha expects a large colony to leave England for Palestine next spring.

A SALT MOUNTAIN.

Palestine possesses a remarkable salt mountain, situated at the south end of the Dead Sea. The length of the ridge is six miles, with an average width of three-quarters of a mile; and the height is not far from six hundred feet. There are places where the overlying earthy deposits are many feet in thickness; but the mass of the mountain is composed of solid rock-salt, some of which is as clear as crystal. How far this deposit of salt extends below the surface of the ground no one at present knows. At some points this ridge, which is on the shore of the Dead Sea, approaches very closely to the water, and at others it recedes until it is fifty or more yards from it. Just here the water of the Dead Sea is much more salt than it is at the north end, where the Jordan enters the lake.

The salt is a government monopoly. The same is true of the salt that is contained in solution in the Dead Sea itself. If Arabs or the natives of the country were found getting salt from the shores of the Dead Sea or from this salt mountain they would be arrested at once. Most of the salt used in Hebron, Jerusalem, and elsewhere in this part of Palestine, comes from these sources; but it is gathered under the direction of Government officers, and the revenue is supposed to go to the Government.

TRAVELS IN THE HOLY LAND.

As the traveller in Jerusalem walks on he perceives that his footsteps are not upon the original ground of Jerusalem, but upon a mass of superimposed matter which has been strewn over the whole site. History enumerates seventeen captures of the Holy City, eleven of which were attended by sieges more or less destructive. After many of these events the houses then standing were razed to the earth. These were in time succeeded by new houses, which in their turn were overthrown at the next siege, and so on, each capture adding to the accumulation of rubbish. Thus the traveller learns that a compact layer or solid coating, from 30 to 50 feet in thickness, has been by degrees spread over the entire space. Even the valleys and ravines between the several hills on which the city was built have been so far filled up as to have partly lost their special character. The Tyropœon brook is, perhaps, the most particular instance. The traveller will have heard of this brook, or read of it in Josephus as a landmark in the interior of this city, but he will not find it. Nevertheless it was so deep that at its exit from the city of Moriah the bridge-span was more than 100 feet above its bed. Its course has been traced by the discovery of the arch, and by deep excavations here and there which have exposed the bed now overlaid with ruins.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

The solution of the Eastern question, whenever it comes, will be the overthrow of Turkey. The overthrow of Turkey will be the liberation of Judea. The liberation of Judea will mean its colonization by its own people. And the restoration of the Jews will mean the imminent nearness of the Second Advent! "This," says Hirsh Ben Pinchas (a modern Jew), referring to the restoration, "is the golden age in the womb of futurity, which constantly upholds the desponding Israelite under the bitterest tribulations; this is the goal of his dearest and fondest hopes. Awake or asleep, at the altar or at the mart, in prosperity of misfortune, Jerusalem,—dearly, fondly-cherished Jerusalem!—is engraved in the innermost recesses of his heart; never, never to be erased. The Israelite, with unfading hope and undying faith, still beholds in perspective that glorious vision of a golden age to come." Is this golden age approaching? The following are answers:

Mr. William Knighton writes to the Times: "During the early part of the year 1888, I was in the Holy Land. Everywhere, from Dan to Beersheba, I saw evidences of the renewed energy and activity of the Jewish race. As a people, the Jews are flocking back to the land of their forefathers in great numbers, from all the countries in Europe. In Jerusalem and its neighborhood, particularly, every plot of ground for sale is eagerly bought by them." Says Rev. A. C. Tris: "This people is only waiting for the downfall of the Turkish Empire. The day of Israel's deliverance is dawning." The cry, "Their King, the King of Zion, is coming," is heard; and although many Israelites do not care for Palestine, yet the orthodox Jews have an inherent desire and respect for the graves of their fathers. Israel cannot return as long as Islam keeps the dominion at Canaan. Says The Christian Observer: "The city of the great King must be made free. Christ and Mohammed cannot have the dominion together, every day the cry is heard from the mosque of Omar, on Mount Zion, that 'Mohammedan is the prophet of God.' It is a daily desecration and treading down of the name and prerogatives of the Son of God; and if the followers of Islam can remain in open rebellion against the Anointed of God, then the cause of Christ is lost, and the gates of hell have prevailed against the truth of the Gospel. The Eastern Question is, in reality, a question belonging to the whole Christian Church. The times of the Gentiles are drawing near to a close, the sound of the wheels of the chariot of the great King is heard."—Watchword.

The Pope cannot, though he greatly desires it, again bring the world under his sway. The Free Press says: "Never, never, can the Papacy bear universal rule over mankind. Its day has gone by. Prophecy has declared that it would pass its meridian and enter the period of decay. Consumption—destruction—desolation, are the words of inspiration telling her end. She has been foredoomed to hatred and burning. Everybody knows this has come true, and that Rome is being destroyed to the end. Frantic struggles may be made in certain countries to subject the nation—as in America today; but world-wide supremacy is impossible, God being true. With lamentations, the Papal organs tell the abject condition of Leo XIII. The following is an example:

The Pope once more protests before the world against the oppression of the Holy See by the civil power in Italy. His position is intolerable. The Church is robbed, restricted and reviled by the Government, and he is expected to look on at the persecution helpless and unmoved. He is not allowed to exercise the duties of his divinely founded office with the freedom and independence indispensable to their full performance, and even the semblance of liberty left to him is within reach of the Revolution to destroy. The Catholics of the whole world view his situation with indignation and alarm. A change must come and come soon.

Yes, 'a change must come,' and it may be nearer than most think. That change, however, will be for the worse. Have our Catholic contemporaries ever read what the fire of the Lord did at the sacrifice of Elijah upon Mt. Carmel? 'It consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench.' Even so, shall every vestige of antichrist be consumed at the Advent of The Christ; the destruction being visited upon her in destruction to the end, destruction beyond repair."—Watchword.

Dear Restitution:

When I renewed my subscription for THE RESTITUTION six months ago by sending one dollar, I expressed my hope that at the end of another six months I should have another dollar to send for the same purpose. This hope I now enjoy in its fullest fruition, for I hold it in my possession, and therefore am in possession of it; then why should I any longer hope for that which I hoped for, and which I now realize that I have come in possession of. For what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it. Rom. viii. 24, 25. So likewise according to the apostle Paul's argument, we are saved by hope. But hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? And now while it is true that at the time I hoped for that dollar I held and owned its equivalent value in the way of land and stock, but in order that I might have just what would pass anywhere in the kingdom as genuine currency, there had to be a change made from one condition to another in order that I might come in possession of that which I hoped for, and now realizing fully that I have come in possession of that for which I had hoped, I need no longer hope for it.

So likewise we may in a spiritual sense while hoping for immortality and eternal life have its equivalent value by a hope in God and faith in the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, but in order that we may come in full possession of that for which we hoped there must be a change made, for this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality. Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory," and we will then be enabled to sing the victor's song, "O death where is thy sting, O grave where is thy victory."

My brother, my sister, have you this saving hope which will insure to you immortality? If so hope on to the end, and you shall be rewarded, for faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. Heb. xi. 1. Then hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end. Heb. iii. 6. Yes, fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called; laying up in store for yourselves a good foundation against the time to come, that ye may lay hold on eternal life. 1 Tim. vi. 12, 19. Therefore my beloved brethren and sisters, be ye steadfast, unmovable; always abounding in the work of the Lord. Forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord. 1 Cor. xv. 58. No, glory to God, for the victory shall be yours through our Lord Jesus Christ; praise his holy name for ever and ever. Yours in the hope of a blessed immortality when Jesus comes.

COMPLETE IN JESUS.

"Complete in him." Col. ii. 10.

Complete in Jesus! O how full
Of heavenly peace the thought,
Our souls redeemed—our pardon sealed!
Since Jesus' blood hath bought.

Complete in Jesus! leave our souls
In bitter anguish cries?
'Tis Jesus hears and gives relief,
'Twas for our souls he died.

Complete in Jesus! blissful thought!
'Tis ours, whate'er befall;
Our Jesus is our Savior, Friend,
Our Life, our Hope—our All.

O let us place our hand in his—
As on through life we go,
Like little children, trusting all
To him, come weal or woe.

Thus shall our trembling hearts be filled
With love which grows not dim,
If "Jesus only" be our peace
And this—"Complete in him."

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 11.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE POST-TERTIARY OR QUARTERNARY AGE.—CONTIN. 3D.

"Babylonia was the name given in ancient times to the flat country about the lower course of the Euphrates. In the Old Testament it is called Shinar, Babel, and also the land of the Chaldees; and by the later Greek and Roman writers, occasionally Chaldea. Its proper boundaries were: on the north, towards Mesopotamia, the Euphrates and the Median Wall; on the east towards Assyria and Susiana, the Tigris; on the south the gulf of Persia: and on the west the desert of Arabia. During the wider extension of the Babylonian dominion, the name comprehended also Assyria and Mesopotamia." Library of Universal Knowledge.

Its polity was the earliest attained by the human race for social and political purposes; older, in fact, than any other political confederation.

Babylon, its capital city, far surpassed in splendor any of the cities of modern times. Its palaces, its walls, its brazen gates, its hanging gardens were world renowned. Its architecture was of a high order of excellence. And though its inhabitants were effeminate, licentious and given over to wanton luxury, they represented a high grade of civilization; commerce and the arts flourished, and literature seems not to have been ignored. The monumental writings (cuneiform letters), throw much light upon the early history of this people confirmatory of that contained in the Bible, and of the validity of the Bible itself. Herodotus gives a description of the city, probably from personal inspection. "It stood," says he, "on both sides of the river Euphrates, in the form of a square, the length of whose sides is 120 stadia, making its circumference 60 miles. It was surrounded by a wall 200 cubits high and 50 cubits thick, and was furnished with 100 brazen gates." It had broad, straight streets, with rectangular crossings, and the two parts of the city were joined by a roofed bridge built of hewn stones, and strengthened by iron clamps. On the east side of the city stood the famous "hanging gardens," supposed to have been erected during the reign of Semiramis, and which have been accounted one of the seven wonders of the world. With the tragic death of Belshazzar, 539 years B. C., the Babylonian empire was overthrown, its dominion being transferred to Cyrus the Great, from which time Babylonia is represented on the monuments as a satrapy of the Persian power. Babylon, conquered, lost much of its original grandeur though it still remained the chief seat of empire.

The prophet's explanation of that portion of the dream which pertains to Babylon is clear and concise: "Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power and strength and glory, and wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and fowls of the air hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold."

MEDO PERSIA.

Cyrus the Great, in conjunction with Cyaxares II., the Median king, subjugated Babylonia. Under his reign the throne of universal empire became very powerful and extensive—the most powerful on the globe—comprising Persia, Media, Parthia, Assyria, Syria, and Asia Minor, to which Egypt was afterwards added by Cambyses the son and successor of Cyrus. The conjoined conquest gave the name, Medo-Persia, to the succession; but Cyaxares dying soon afterwards, left Cyrus the Great sole and undisputed monarch over the united kingdoms. It was during the early part of his reign that the famous edict for the return of the Jews from their Babylonian captivity to their own land, and for the rebuilding of Jerusalem, was issued. Darius Codomanus was the last sovereign of ancient Persia. He was defeated and slain by the victorious troops of Alexander, and with his death the ancient Persia, or Medo-Persian empire, terminated, after a lapse of 206 years. Large additions were made to its original territory by the ambition and warlike spirit of the Medo-Persian monarchs, and their brave and heroic troops. Babylon remained the seat of empire, though Ecbatana, the capital of Media, was the accepted summer residence of the Persian rulers. Of this, the second universal empire of the world, the prophet said in the interpretation of the dream, "and after thee shall rise another kingdom inferior to thee."

GRECIA.

Through the conquests of Alexander the Great and his invincible army, the Macedonians became masters of the territory of Persia and its tributary provinces, by the defeat of Darius at Arabela, 331 B. C. Penetrating into India and defeating Porus, an illustrious sovereign of that country, he added largely to the boundaries of that quarter of the Persian conquest, besides opening up to the western Europeans a highway to the rich trade of the East Indies. The Persian power was completely broken by the defeat, discomfiture and death of Darius, and the throne of universal dominion passed from it to the Macedonian conqueror, and has since been recognized as the Grecian Power. Alexander afterwards proceeded to Babylon, which he made his imperial (metropolitan) city, and where he was met by ambassadors from all parts of the known world—representatives of his conquests—and occupied himself in maturing plans for future conquests, and for the advancement of civilization and refinement in the extensive domain already acquired, and in the games and banquets inseparable from Grecian manners and customs.

Grecia held universal sway over the nations 301 years, succumbing at length to the iron yoke of the Cæsars, after which the whole of Greece proper was reduced to a Roman province, under the name of Achaia. It was noted during its prosperity for its schools of learning and philosophy; for its poets, its artists, and its historians. Says Worcester, "In reviewing the history of this extraordinary people, we see much to admire and much to condemn. With regard to genius, learning, patriotism, love of liberty and heroism, they were unrivaled among the nations of antiquity." The names of Demosthenes, Cicero, Lycurgus, Lionides, Miltiades, Socrates, and a host of others from among the ancient Grecians, will always remain household words. It had its gymnasiums for the training and physical culture of its athletes, its private schools for the youth, and its rigid home training for the children. The instruction from childhood was calculated to encourage bodily strength and military prowess, instead of mental excellence.

Of this, the third universal power of ancient times, Daniel briefly tells the king, in the interpretation of his dream, "and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over the whole earth." Dan. ii. 39.

ROME.

Rome, the last of the four great empires of antiquity, rose from insignificant beginnings to almost universal authority, exceeding in its national military achievements, its stability and governmental power, as well as in the extent of its dominion, either of its predecessors.

The history of no other country is more noted for its illustrious personages, or more prolific of notable events. Its annals include, in its rise, progress and decline, an account of each of the nations preceding it.

The Grecians surrendered their last vestige of power to the Romans with the siege and fall of Corinth, and, as the dominant power, continued to sway the sceptre of universal empire 669 years, when by the invasion of the barbarians, (The violent irruption of the Goths, Vandals, Huns, and other barbarians, hastened this event — the downfall of the barbaric Roman power —and precipitated the downfall of the empire. New nations seemed to rise, and to rush from unknown regions in order to take vengeance on the Romans for the calamities which they had inflicted on mankind. These fierce tribes either inhabited the various provinces of Germany, which had been subdued by the Romans, or were scattered over the vast countries in the north of Europe and northwest of Asia, which are now occupied by the Danes, the Swedes, the Poles, the subjects of the Russian Empire and the Tartars. In less than two centuries from their first irruption, barbarians of various names and lineage plundered and took possession of Thrace, Pannonia, Gaul, Spain, Africa, and at last of Italy, and Rome itself. The vast fabric of the Pagan Roman power, which it had been the work of ages to perfect, was in that short time overturned from the foundation.....The Saxons became masters of Britain, the Franks of Gaul, the Huns of Pannonia, the Goths and Lombards of Italy and the adjacent provinces.—From Wm. Robertson's history of the Middle Ages) and the abandonment of Italy by her rulers, the temporal power was transferred to the head of the papal church, who assumed the reins of government and sovereignty of the world. This cause, and the social disorganization of Europe, aided, too, by the spiritual status of Roman bishops, brought about the recognition of his authority throughout the European countries as an arbiter in their relations to each other, and of the sovereigns of each to their respective sovereignties.

"The mode of worship among the ancient Romans was analogous to that of the Greeks. Votive offerings, prayers, vows, sacrifices, libations, purifications, banquets, lays, songs, dances and games made up the sum of their divine service." Lib. Univ. Knowl. "It looked, however, the fanciful extravagances of the latter and was, consequently, free from the abominations that are the natural offspring of the unbounded sway of fancy." Ibid. "A code of moral and ethical rules, furthering and preserving civil order, and the pious relations within state and family, were the palpable results of this religion, which in its barrenness of metaphysical notions, did nothing for the furtherance of art." Ibid. With the change from the exclusively temporal power to combined temporal and ecclesiastical rule, very many of the rites and ceremonies of the ancient Roman worship were adopted and engrafted into the ritual of the dominant church. Thus prayer to the immortal gods was transmuted into adoration of the saints; votive offerings to the sale of indulgences, etc., etc. Not a few of them have found their way, too, through the reformation of the 16th century to become a part and parcel of the Protestant offshoot from Romanism, either unchanged, or so modified as to be less repulsive than they were under the ancient Pagan mode of worship.

"The extraordinary temporal authority of the pope was at once the consequence and the support of his acknowledged spiritual power: (In the primitive church the jurisdiction of bishops was equal and co-ordinate. They derived perhaps some degree of consideration from the dignity of the See in which they resided. They possessed, however, no real authority or pre-eminence but what they acquired by superior abilities, or superior sanctity. As Rome had so long been the seat of empire and capital of the world, its bishops were upon that account, entitled to respect; they received it; but during several ages they claimed and received nothing more. From these humble beginnings they advanced with such an adventurous and well-directed ambition that they established a spiritual dominion over the minds and sentiments of man, to which all Europe submitted with implicit obedience. Their claim to universal jurisdiction, as the heads of the church, and their pretensions to infallibility in their decisions, as successors to St. Peter, are as chimerical as they are repugnant to the genius of the Christian religion. But on these foundations the superstition and credulity of mankind enabled them to erect an amazing superstructure. In all ecclesiastical controversies their decisions were received as the infallible oracles of truth. From Progress of Society in Europe during the Middle Ages, by Wm. Robertson.) and even Protestants have recognized the Roman church of the mediæval period as absorbing into itself almost the whole of European christendom, and as the only public (even though they believe it degenerate and corrupt) representative of the church in the West." Lib. Univ. Knowl.

For the period of 1260 years the union of church and state gave Papal Rome the chief authority. Its dominion extended over the whole of the Alexandrian conquest, and notably farther, by the wonderful influence of the Vatican through its proselyting evangelists scattering broadcast throughout countries which were then unknown, and others that were only partially under papal authority.

At the zenith of his power the Roman Pontiff made and deposed kings, or led them captives at his will: controlled the entire affairs of church and state, and held almost unlimited sway over the minds and consciences of united christendom. The domestic relations as well as the mental characteristics of papists were conformed to the model planned by the clergy of the people. The rich and the poor alike bowed at his bidding, the old and the young equally paid him homage and divine honors. The king on his throne, not less than the peasant in his cot, implicitly yielded obedience to his mandates. This domination of the pope and servile submission to his almost unlimited power was one of the main causes that led eventually to the non-acceptance of his temporal supremacy.

"The natural result of this wide-spread supremacy of the Roman church was, that the spiritual aspects of the church became gradually more and more merged into its mere machinery of external government. Everything that could give power and efficiency to it as an institute was carefully watched and nursed; but, when, in the course of the 15th century, and even earlier, spiritual life began to die out in the center of this vast system of ecclesiastical government in Rome itself, the baleful effects of such spiritual decay speedily began to tell through all its borders. The growing corruption showed itself in many forms,—in a prevailing ignorance among the monks and higher clergy; in the perversion of ecclesiastical offices, and especially in the grossly materialistic abuse of spiritual privileges and censures. The great impetus which the friars had given to the papal power in the 13th century had died out. They had sunk from being zealous and active preachers into bigots and mendicants, cumbering the ground. The secular clergy were hardly less corrupted; in many cases the higher dignitaries of the church had no interest in the spiritual duties of their office, and gave themselves up entirely to the pleasures of a worldly life, or, at best, to the duties of political and military activity. The revival of the old classical literature of Italy,—the spirit of what is called renaissance,—accelerated this movement of spiritual decay. The papacy itself became half Pagan. The church was little cared for even as an organ of government; it was used as an engine of self-aggrandizement and the most extravagant luxury." Lib. Univ. Knowl.

The main cause of its loss of temporal power and authority was to be found directly within its own bosom. Ambitions of retaining its political influence among the nations over which its political as well as theological mantle had been thrown for a long series of years, it gradually lost its theological prestige. Its abuses became so flagrant as to induce active thinkers and devout men, such as Wycklife of England, Huss and Jerome of Prague, Reuchlin of Germany and Erasmus of Holland, to denounce the clergy in the most decided terms, whenever an opportunity was afforded.

The spirit of persecution employed by the Papal See to overthrow and eradicate the movement inaugurated by these reformers gave strength and solidity, rather than diminished, the force of their denunciations. This reformatory movement became stronger and more energetic daily and yearly. Luther and his cotemporaries carried on the work until finally it received the sanction, support and co-operation of some of the German states. After a long and severe struggle, and a failure to effect a compromise between the papal power and the reformatory parties, (Protestants they were now called), at the diet which assembled at Augsburg in 1555, articles were framed for the pacification of both parties, by which the Protestants "were freed from papal domination," and were permitted to enjoy the exercise of their religious rights and practices; as they please., both parties binding themselves, however, to respect each other's convictions, and not to injure or persecute one another on account of their religious views. Sweden and Denmark had already given a formal sanction to the plan of doctrine, discipline and worship of the reforming party. Other countries rapidly seconded their labors and efforts for the promulgation of the Scriptures, for a higher grade of religious culture, and for a better standard of education and purity of character among the clergy, until the complete separation of church and state was generally acknowledged, a result naturally following the exclusion from the mother church.

The doctrine of the separation of the temporal and ecclesiastical authority seemed to follow almost mechanically, or as a natural output of the reform movement, and, adjoined to the pope's loss of unlimited power over his religious subjects in the different states and among the several powers, culminated, eventually, in the destruction also of his political control. Governments began thinking and acting for themselves; making their own laws; confirming their own treaties; and establishing their own governmental relations, both between each other and between themselves and their subjects, without the sanction of the Vatican,—until in about the year 1798 A. D., nearly the whole of the civilized world was politically free from the domination of Papal Rome. Left free to act without the interference of a controlling head, each government, today, stands separate and distinct from each and every other one; with common commercial interests, yet politically distinct, separate and entire. How aptly does the language of the prophet in his interpretation, depict the present status of the world's powers, politically and nationally. Is it not surprising that his prescience could raise the veil of futurity, penetrate through the mists of national rise and downfall, and paint with such exact fidelity the present national relations? Could such prescience have existed had there been no established, well-matured plan of the ages, or, had that plan remained undeveloped to him? If not, by whom was the panorama of futurity unrolled like a mighty canvas displaying mesh after mesh of the network of national succession to the end of Post-tertiary time?

After describing the reign of the Iron (Roman) power in its pagan and papal (two legs) forms, he says, "and whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potter's clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided: but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mingled with miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong and partly broken. (Marg. or brittle.) And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with the miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay." Dan. ii. 41–43.

We may observe in this language a prophecy of the same governmental strength and power that characterized each of the governments in the palmiest days of pagan rule, yet he indicates complete political isolation, and independence in their domestic relations. How complete and perfect the description! What symbol or form of speech could have better conveyed the idea of the present history of the earth's nations' American institutions, internal resources and policies are peculiarly her own; European national politics equally as much, inhere in the bosom of each separate subdivision, or state, yet the whole of Europe and America are firmly bound together for the purposes of commerce, barter and exchange, by international law and equity. Innately strong as iron for individual state interest; intensely jealous of the encroachments of others, all the nations are now watching each other, mutually repellent, except as far as each is covered and guarded by treaty stipulations,—and unwittingly waiting for the ample fulfilment of every event necessary to complete the perfect image of the Babylonian king's vision, even to the end of the toe divisions, and for the closing scenes required to finish the history of the Post-tertiary Age.

Note. No radical change was made in the formation of the successive universal dominions except in the heads of the government. The subjects of the Medo-Persian power were the late subjects of the Babylonian kingdom subordinated by the conquest of Babylonia and increased, afterwards, by conquests of other and insubordinate principalities. The same remark is true of the accessions of Grecia and Rome, at the inception of their supreme domination; the subjects of each being composed of those who had lived under and borne allegiance to the dominant power immediately preceding it.

Dear Restitution:

For the benefit of the dear ones of like precious faith, I will pen a few lines. I am all the time in the field at work. I am in a part of the country where there is a great amount of opposition, but nevertheless one dear sister was added to our number by baptism one week ago last Sunday; one of our intelligent women. My work here in Clinton Co., Ind., will close the 15th of September; then I go to northern Illinois to preach as an evangelist for awhile and maybe for a year. And I do hope and pray that my work will not be in vain in the Lord. Oh how much need there is of work to be done and there are but few to do it.

DIED.

McLELLAND.—At his home in Clinton Co., Ind., July 13, 1888, Alvin McLelland, aged 78 years, 10 months, and 28 days.

Brother McLelland was born in 1809 and has lived for over forty years on the farm where his family now resides. He was one of the oldest members of the church of God in this part of the country, being one of the first that came out and accepted the doctrine of the sleep of the dead, the reign of Christ on earth, the destruction of the wicked, and kindred subjects. He has taken our religious paper under its different names ever since Brother Marsh's time. He was a man that stood high in the estimation of his neighbors, and as a member of the church of God there was none that stood higher than he. The writer has known him for over twenty-three years. He and his companion have always taken an active part in entertaining the dear brethren that have labored in word and doctrine, and he has given of his means for the support of the word of God. The little band here have lost a good brother, and the community a good citizen, but our belief is that he sleeps in Jesus. He died when all of the family were asleep, some time between two o'clock and five, in the morning. At five his wife called him two or three times, but receiving no answer she raised up and found him dead. The day before he had been as well as common, and had worked in his garden in the evening. Had eaten a hearty supper and went to bed as usual. He was up at two in the morning but made no complaint at that time. His children and grandchildren were all present except one grandchild at his funeral. The services were conducted by Brother E. C. Andros and the writer. I have been with him several times during the past winter. He has been feeble and said to me twice this summer, "Brother Hatch I want you to spend all the time you can and talk with me, for I wont be able to go out to your meetings much any more." There was a large concourse of people out at the funeral.

J. S. HATCH.

MORROW.—At her home near Modoc, Mo., Nov. 23, 1887, of pneumonia fever, Sister, wife of Hiram Morrow, aged 48 years.

Sister Morrow was born in Mason Co., Mo. She united with the Campbellite church in an early day. In October, 1887, she was baptized into the all-saving name of Jesus, the Christ of the Bible. She did not live long after she was baptized, but she thanked God that she did obey from the heart that form of doctrine, and then fell asleep in Jesus. Oh how sweet that sleep will be to all the weary pilgrims. She left a husband, three girls and two boys to mourn her loss; also a host of friends as she had no enemies except death, and that enemy holds her now. But thank God he will soon be destroyed, as he that holds the keys of death and of hell will soon come to our rescue and will destroy him that had the power of death. And he will release every son and daughter of Adam that are held in consequence of Adam's sin. Comforting words were spoken by the writer at Modoc, Mo., in the Catholic church on the second Sunday in June, 1888. Subject: "But man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost and where is he?" The man not the ghost. The house was crowded full and a number outside. All seemed interested very much. Let us so live that whether awake or asleep when Jesus comes we may be found at our posts.

After the meeting was over we continued meeting till Wednesday night. Two souls put on Christ by baptism during the meeting. One of them had been baptized in the Campbellite faith, but both are now sisters in the Lord. Well I am also an evangelist; I go forth to proclaim the word of life to a dying race, wheresoever there is a way opened. The calls are many but the money is scarce, as it now is hoarded up by the money kings of this earth. The brethren in the west are generally poor, and that is the class that James says God has chosen. I have now more calls than no man could fill, even if it is an off year as some of the brethren said the world say. Well off or not off I must work for the King of kings and Lord of lords, so I may be found at my post when he comes, is my prayer.

JOHN MOORE.

DUNMORE, Pa., July 9, '88.

Dear Restitution:

Another has fallen from the ranks of those who have long fought the good fight of faith, one who for twenty-eight years out of sixty-two, has been zealous in defense of the truth as it came to him.

Brother Truman Finn, of this place, was called to surrender his life on July 1st, and was buried on the 3d. For weeks before his death he suffered more than any other than himself knew; his disease was cancer of the stomach. His regard for those surrounding him was so great that he disliked to have them know how much he suffered. He was blessed by the loving ministrations of a devoted wife, who, in this hour of her trial, knows what it is to lean on the arm of Omnipotence. Having visited here ten months ago, I for the first time then made the acquaintance, little thinking when we parted, so soon to be summoned by telegram to speak at the funeral. All I could do was to offer words of comfort to those bereaved, and point others to the word of God he so greatly prized, as the only foundation on which a solid hope could be built. He did not shrink in the trying hour, assured as he was that his Redeemer liveth. His last counsel to two adopted children was that they aim for the narrow way of life.

Announcements.

The Annual State Conference of the Church of God will meet at Clayville, Bracken P. O., Huntington Co., Ind., beginning on Friday, August 31, 1888, at 2:30 p. m., and last over Sunday. Those coming by the Nickle Plate R. R., will stop at South Whitley. Those coming on the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific R. R., or the Cincinnati, Wabash & Michigan R. R., will stop at North Manchester, where they will be met and conveyed to the place of meeting. At our meeting at Antioch last June the subject of having the churches represented at Conference by delegates was discussed, and a motion was made that each local church appoint, at a meeting of the church held previous to the Conference, delegates who can attend the Conference, and that the Church officers send the names of such delegates to the Conference Secretary, that they may be known as the authorized representatives of such church. It was also urged that at the same meeting the local churches collect such amounts as they can, to send to the conference for purposes of evangelizing. Brethren, this work is important. Business is business, and the work of spending the money the good Lord has placed in our hands to the best advantage, requires just as much attention as any worldly affair, and a little more care. So I urge it upon every Church of God in Indiana, to have a meeting soon, and appoint your delegates and make a generous collection, and report the action, and come to the meeting prepared to make a grand good effort to do more this year than last, and do it better, for the time to work is getting very short.

The brethren and sisters at Clayville are able and willing to accommodate all who will attend. Any one intending to attend this meeting, who is not acquainted with the route, etc., will do well to write to A. G. Brookover, or Dr. G. W. Fry, Bracken, Ind., stating what time they expect to get there, and they will be cared for.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

The second quarterly meeting of the A. C. Conference of Michigan will be held with the church at Hesperia, Oceana Co., commencing Friday evening, August 17th, 1888, and holding over Sunday. Teams will meet the morning trains at Fremont, Friday, the day the meeting commences. Fremont is twelve miles from Hesperia situated on the Chicago & West Mich. R. R. between Big Rapids and Muskegon. Those going by way of Big Rapids will have to stay in Big Rapids or Fremont Thursday night. Let us all come to the meeting with hearts full to overflowing with the love of God and make this meeting one long to be remembered on account of the power of God with us.

A. L. FOX, Pres.
PETER L. SCOTT, Sec.

THE WALK OF FAITH.

My child, I send thee far upon a journey,
A journey very desolate and lone,
Go forth, believing, though thou canst not see me,
That I am watching and will guard my own.

Father, it seems so very dark and stormy—
The clouds are gathering thickly in the sky—
I dare not venture out into the darkness,
Unless thou'lt promise I shall see thee nigh.

My child, how is it that thou can'st not trust me?
Have I not kept thee all the days of old?
Have I not loved thee when thy heart was failing,
At times when other hearts proved false and cold?

Father, I know it all, and my own weakness;
But oh! I long to feel thee at my side,
To clearly see thee 'mid the stormy darkness—
Then should I never fear my steps should slide.

My child, if thou beheld my actual presence,
Thy walk would merely be a walk of sight;
'Tis nobler far to venture forth, believing
That, as I send thee, everything is right.

Father, I go; fulfil in me thy pleasure,
Do what thou will, but give me faith to know
That all things for my good shall work together,
Though tempests rage around and fierce winds blow.

My child, I will; and often 'mid the darkness
Thou'lt hear the accents of a still, small voice Saying, in tones of gentlest consolation,
"Lo, I am with thee! trust me and rejoice."

FALL OF A FIRE BALL.

NEW YORK, June 27.—A flying ball of fire struck the ground, exploded, and scattered sparks and stones for 50 feet in every direction in East Twenty-fifth street, between Second and Third avenues yesterday. Workmen engaged on the new building, 219, were paralyzed with fear, and would not return to work for some hours. Dwellers in the neighborhood rushed with blanched faces to windows and doors, and pedestrians, who were blinded by the flash of the meteor and stunned by the explosion, fled to shelter. No lives were lost. The skies had rapidly cleared after the first severe thunder shower, and about 1:05 p. m. the sun appeared. Almost simultaneously a dazzling brilliant sphere about two feet in diameter and emitting countless white sparks, was seen in the air descending rapidly. In its train was a streak of livid fire, like the tail of a comet. The flying fire-ball came in a southeasterly direction and was first noticed at about the height of the house tops. It struck in a heap of gravel, brick, planks and other building material in the gutter facing 219, and a sharp report like that of a thousand pistol shots followed. There was a strong smell like that accompanying lightening strokes, and several persons near received severe electric shocks. Big sparks flew out and the gravel and bricks were scattered. The first of the astounded witnesses of the phenomenon to recover his wits was Engineer Barrett of Engine Company 16, who had been standing in the doorway of the engine house a few feet away. He ran to the spot where the fire-ball had struck and found a two-inch plank, burned and twisted, with a hole as clean as if made with an auger bored completely through it. A half brick was afterward picked up which had been bored in the same way as the plank, and probably received the first stroke. Mrs. Gorman, Mrs. Riley and two other women who were at the dinner-table in the basement of 221, saw the ball descending, and ever after that after it struck they saw it rebound past their window and up into the air again. Little four-year-old Edwin Gorman who was leaning from the window was frightened almost to death and ran under the table where he remained sobbing and crying for many minutes after. John Simpson, a plumber at work a few doors up the street dropped his wrench and ran around the corner into Third avenue. John Marsh, a stonemason, saw the blinding flash of the fire-ball and simultaneously his mallet and chisel fell to the ground. His arms tingled as if from an electric shock for hours. The noise of the explosion was heard as far as East Twenty-ninth street and Fourth avenue. Five minutes later West Twenty-fifth street was filled with a crowd of people that came running from all directions, and were astonished that no great damage had been done by the bolt. Mrs. Gorman, who was badly frightened by the shock, was given the half brick that showed a cleanly-bored hole an inch and a half in diameter, and this and the bored plank were shown to hundreds of people during the afternoon.

The Last Man on the Wreck.

A few years ago a homeward bound vessel was wrecked on the southwest coast of England. The lifeboat was launched, and away the men went, and were a long while at sea. Darkness set in, but the people on the coast lighted great fires so that the lifeboat might be guided on its return to shore. After awhile they saw it returning, and a great strong man, of the name of John Holden, who was on the coast, cried aloud to the captain of the lifeboat, 'Hil hil have you saved the men?' The captain answered, 'Ay, ay, I have saved the men;' and all hearts were filled with gladness. But when they reached the coast it was found that one man was left clinging to the mast. 'Why did not you save him?' said Holden—'why did you not save him?' 'Because we were exhausted,' said the captain, 'and we should all have perished if we had remained another five minutes attempting to save one man.' 'But you will go back—you will go back to the rescue?' They said they had not the strength, the storm was so fierce. Holden threw himself on the shingle, and lifted up a prayer to God louder than the storm, that God would put it into the hearts of some of those people to go to the rescue of this one man, just as Jesus Christ came to rescue one lost world. When he ceased praying six men volunteered to accompany him, and John Holden, with his six men, were prepared to go and rescue that one man. They were preparing to start, when the good old mother of John Holden threw her arms around his neck and said, 'John, you must not go.' What can I do if you perish? You know your father was drowned at sea, and it is just two years since your brother William left; we have never heard a word from him since. No doubt he, too, has perished. John what shall I do if you perish?' John said, 'Mother, God has put it into my heart to go, and if I perish he will take care of you.' And away he went; and after awhile the lifeboat returned, and when he neared the coast a loud voice was raised, 'Hil hil John have you saved the man?' John answered, in a trumpet voice, 'Yes, we have saved the man; and tell my mother it is my brother William we have saved.' Now, there is your brother man the wide world over; haste to the rescue even if you perish in the attempt."

ROME AS AN "ALLY."

During the last few months there has been some discussion among Protestants as to their relation to Romanism, in view of the moral dangers of the age and nation. In the latest numbers of two missionary periodicals, several writers from regions where Romanism is powerful contribute the results of their experience in regard to the question as to whether Rome is to be welcomed and encouraged? They do this, not at all in concert, but merely in the course of the ordinary records of their work. How many Americans visit the home of the hero and martyr, John Huss, and have no conception of its spiritual condition. Of a recent religious service in Prague, Rev. Mr. Clark says in The Missionary Herald: "An intelligent woman who had been well educated was present for the first time, coming out of curiosity to see the sect that the priests rail against so vehemently. The ignorance of this educated Romanist is revealed by the question she asked: 'What book was that from which the preacher read?' Well informed is many books, and speaking several languages, she did not recognize the one Book." Of a procession of several hundred poor pilgrims, he adds: "They were on their way to the so-called holy mountain, twenty miles from Prague. It was a sad sight, and saddest still to think that not one of them had the words of Jesus. To go out upon the streets and give them New Testaments would secure prompt arrest."

Rev. Dr. Greene, in The Church at Home and Abroad, describes his visit to Guerrero, the scene of the recent martyrdom of three evangelical teachers in Mexico. He says: "Who could blame me if I laughed a bitter, sarcastic laugh when I remembered those who, despite such scenes enacted in all Romish lands, originated and executed by the Romish priesthood, still puzzle their brains and give slight to their eloquence in hypothetical reasoning to prove that the Romish church is our 'ally,' and not our foe? I do not believe it for a moment."

In the same periodical, Rev. Dr. Blackford writes from Nabla, Brazil of a monk's mission that developed much popular hostility to evangelical work with the following characteristic features: "During the 'mission' of the monks they had an auto de fe, and burned in a public square, before a huge cross, a number of Bibles and other books and tracts. They had the rabble all their own way, but the better portion of the people were thoroughly disgusted, and the affair will no doubt turn out for the furtherance of the cause.

"Here all abides in the same torpor of indifference. For a month to come a series of pagan festivals will afford amusement for the people of this great city, to the incalculable detriment of morals, religion and even their temporal interests; and all in the name of the religion of Jesus. Popery is Satan's masterpiece."

It is not necessary for us to add any opinions of our own to these decided views of educated, consecrated men, who know by closest contact with the "ally" just what the alliance will accomplish.—N. Y. Observer.

The Martyrdom in Mexico.

It will be remembered that last August three Protestant teachers in Guerrero, Mexico, were assassinated in a riot stirred up by a Roman Catholic priest, named Vergara. The Rev. J. Milton Greene, D. D., has recently visited the scene of martyrdom, and sends an account of his journey to the Church. In the course of it, he says: "Passing the cemetery where the precious dust of the three martyrs reposes, we were met at the entrance to the town by several brethren, who, with open arms and tearful eyes, welcomed us with a heavy Mexican embrace, and accompanied us to the residence of the widow Zaragoza, where Abraham and Felipe were murdered. Touching as was my reception, it did not absorb my attention, which was rather fixed upon the battered and broken doors, and the blood-stained walls, which remained as most impressive reminders of the awful tragedy which had occurred seven months before. There on the wall hung the bookshelves from which the murderers snatched one of the largest volumes, tore off the covers, seated himself on the helpless form, and beat it with the book, which he afterward placed in mockery under the bleeding head as a pillow, then left his poor victim, still in the agony of death, to rush with his comrades to the house of Miguel Cipriano, and complete the bloody, sickening task. Oh! as I looked at the mutilated book, which I preserve as a sacred relic still stained with that consecrated blood, and as I lay down at night on that bed where the summons to a martyr's death reached my poor boy, I realized as never before what martyrdom is in all its hideous reality, not as we paint it to ourselves afar from all shadow of danger, not as we sing of it in our moments of Christian ecstacy, not as we imagine to ourselves the white-robed blessed ones around the throne, but as it came to our dear brethren, mocking at the love of life and blasting the hopes of continued existence and usefulness in the world, breaking the hearts of loving wife and children, accompanied by physical agony and blood, nervous torture and bodily dissolution, the shrieks and groans of the dying mingling with the heart-piercing lamentations of wife and children, and the pitiless, diabolical butchery of demonized, infuriated religious fanaticism. I have never seen elsewhere such a pall of desolation as rests on the village. Scarcely a house exists, apart from those occupied by our brethren, from which the husband or the sons, or both, are not absent. Twenty-two of those who took part in the massacre have been consigned to the army and sent to Yucatan—most of them to die on its burning sands; fifteen are in the district jail at Teloloapan, one league away, of whom 'four at least,' says Governor Arce, 'will be shot,' while another fifteen are fugitives from justice, and among them the priest, Vergara, whose photograph, a hundred in number, with a circular urging his arrest, have been sent all over the republic."—Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By F. F. Wentworth.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. Illumes with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It declares the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hope is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the Act of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of American statements of facts and figures which they will do well to ponder upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the support of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 1, 1888. NO. 29.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS | One Year . . $2.00; Six Months . . 1.00; Three Months . . .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 12.

BY DR. J. H. THOMPSON.

"And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter." Dan. ii. 44, 45.

With this explanation and prophecy Daniel closes the interpretation of the king's dream, and they lead to the consideration of a new class of phenomena directly connected with, and pertaining to the close of the Past tertiary age. It is a noteworthy fact that the crushing blow of the stone that was cut out without hands, fell, not on the head of gold, (it is sometimes urged that the imperial sceptre of either of the four universal empires of antiquity failed to embrace in their respective jurisdictions either the Chinese empire or the western hemisphere. While it may be conceded that neither China nor North or South America were overrun by the conquering hosts of either of these powers, no one can truthfully assert that, in case subjugation had become a necessity, they were not given into the hand of the power of these kingdoms, and that they were not made subservient to them, yet strictly in accordance with the terms stated by the prophet,) nor on the breast and arms of silver, nor on the belly and thighs of brass, nor on the legs of iron, but upon the feet of the image which was part of iron and part of clay,—on the intermingled yet uncombined subdivisions of the kingdoms, at their lowest part, and in their independent, self-dependant and isolated forms of national government.

Another thought is, that this, the fifth universal monarchy of the earth is not a government of the people, for the people, by the people; not a human government instituted by human rulers for the control and well-being of humanity, but, instead, a God-ordained kingdom, "set up" by God himself, endless in duration, unchanging and unchangable either as to its federal head, or its associated rulers, and that its mission, at least in part will be, to destroy all human theories of political economy, and all the opposite, conflicting and pernicious influences, teachings and tendencies that have been brought to bear on humanity during the long previous periods of history, in which the imperfect, law-breaking, death-doomed man of the Tertiary Age creations, by his legislation, utterly failed to enact laws by which crime could be effectually suppressed, criminals brought to justice and adequately punished, or under which law and order could be enforced for the good of all.

Such a kingdom, so ordered, so arranged, "set up," established, ruled and kept, by the God of heaven, could scarcely be called by any other name than "The Kingdom of God," or, "The Kingdom of heaven," which terms are used interchangeably as applicable to the same object, and similar conditions in the Scriptures of truth. It is true, too, that every literary, historical and scientific work published, has a nucleus, or central idea, around which all the facts narrated, and all the conclusions drawn, cluster, affording to it support, steadfastness and permanence as a basis of consistence, a central dome, as it were, to which each item recorded acts as a post, or girder, or keystone, for the perfection and completion of the architectural structure. The Biblical writings are no exception to this rule. They in common with every other record, sacred or profane, have one central thought, one topic around which all the historical events, and all the chronologies, and the prophecies, the biographies and the promises, revolve in constant procession, like satellites around a central luminary; giving strength and receiving vitality. Like a grand river this one thought passes onward through the sacred narrative, beginning with its beginning and ending with its close, and connects itself with all the history of the historical or Post-tertiary age; receiving their contributions, as springs, and rivulets, and brooks, and deep-flowing tributaries, to feed the main stream, which eventually becomes lost in the vast ocean of God's creative wonders and goodness, in the completion of the master-work of the ages.

This nucleus, this one idea, this central thought of the Almighty as revealed in the volume of inspiration is "The kingdom of God."

It seems to have been the burden of God's plan when the foundations of the earth were laid, and of the work of the ages that precede the present. All history but records the events necessary to its development; even the wrath and evil doings of the vilest conforming to that grand consummation. It is the aim and end to which the combined labors of God and man, during the present age, working in unison, directly lead.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

For it was created subject to law.
For a promise was made to Eve's seed after the fall.
For it the Abrahamic promise was given.
For it the promise was confirmed to the fathers.
For it the Jewish nation existed.
For it the prophets prophesied.
For it the Christ was born, taught, suffered, died and was resurrected.
For it he ascended on high, promising to come again.
It comprises the entire gospel.
For it the resurrection is promised.
It is the basis of Christian faith and practice.
For it the ages were constituted.

The diagram illustrates the relation of Scriptural events, prophecies, etc., to this "one central thought" of the Creator, as expressed by the summary of age-work in all the ages. (See Classification of Creative Periods, in No. 1. It will be noticed that each separate topic centralizes in and forms a part of the labor necessary to the unfoldment and full development of the central fact; and this will be more thoroughly discussed in the consideration of the future judgment and the future age, (age to come), and of the things that are revealed as pertaining thereto.

OF AGE WORK.

With the work of the ages to the present historical part of the Post-tertiary, we have somewhat familiarized ourselves in the preceding papers. We have seen how the formless chaos of molten matter, cast off from its solar parent in obedience to co-related, God-governed forces, termed natural law, and enveloped in a shroud of thick, impenetrable cloud-mist, existed, water-enveloped, during the extended period of the chaotic age; assuming form, and rock-encased stability, yet giving little promise of future utility or adornment. We have traced its advance to the succeeding age, in the firmness of its rocky coating and in its increased solidity of the surface crust, and in the cloud-lift, discovering an interstratum of atmosphere, surcharged with noxious vapors, interposed between the waters above and those below the firmament, as well as the low form of animal life introduced near its close, prophetic of future living organisms to inhabit it. This age was followed by another, noted for the separation of the enveloping waters into seas covering vastly greater extents of territory than do those of the present, and by the establishing of continental outlines; for its advance in the types of its fauna, and for its vast deposits of arenaceous and argillaceous hot-beds, composed of the metamorphic disintegrations of primitive strata, for the generation and development of a powerfully developed flora—thallogens and zorogens,—peculiarly adapted to the conditions of the land areas, which furnished them secure subsistence, and a rock-encased sarcophagus. As the atoms rolled on the bursting of the aerial water stratum, revealed the sun, the moon and the stars, set to give light upon the earth; and vast multitudes of fishes, pursuing the few simple ends of animal existence,—the enjoyment of life, the securing of food for their daily wants and necessities, and the propagation of their species. They lived and sported in the Devonian seas, only to receive a sepulture in the "Old Red Sandstone" strata, which, quarried, becomes the tell-tale of their species, of their existence and of their wonderful fecundity, among the gymnogens that formed the flora of the age, to the period of its carboniferous era close. The profusion and uniqueness of its dense flora, and not any change in its fauna, is the characteristic of this (the Carboniferous) era. To the flora of its precursors was added Monocotyledons,—the grasses, palms, orchids, etc., that by fossilization has yielded the world an abundance of fuel, of good quality and inexhaustible supply. Close upon the retirement of this came the age of mammoth reptiles; reptiles unsouth in appearance, disgusting in their habits, and awe-inspiring in their uniqueness, which nevertheless filled the plan fostered in the Divine Mind,—a link between the low forms of animal life that had gone before, and the grand types to follow them. Birds, too, of enormous size and swift of foot and wing, or mayhap, of sweetest song, waded along the shallow waters of the lagoons, or soared on level wing in the upper air, ready to pounce upon and destroy some of their weaker reptilian or ichthyo cotemporaries, or perched at evening time upon the outstretched branch of dicotyledinous plants, or trees, for their repose. With its departure a new era soon dawned, yielding quadrupeds enormous in bulk, and varied in kind; closing with a large per centum of existing life-forms. In its evening cadence man was created, at once creation's lord and God's co-worker for the completion of succeeding ages. Its eventful close gave place to the historical era, with its ever-changing national conditions, to the waiting, watching time of the present, which is, undoubtedly, near its close, and of which it is proposed to treat at greater length before it is merged into the great, crowning work of all the ages, to-wit: The Kingdom of God.

Of these age-labors Paul writes to his Hebrew brethren thus: "God having anciently spoken in many portions and by various methods to the fathers by the prophets, in the last of these days spoke to us by a Son whom he appointed heir of all things, on account of whom also he constituted the ages." Emphatic Diaglott.

OF MAN'S CREATION.

It has already been observed that man was created like the rest of the fauna peculiar to the Tertiary age, of the dust of the ground, and subject to law; and that to him was given "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." Gen. i. 26. It has also been noted that, by his disobedience of the law which was given him for his trial, man lost his ability to exercise universal dominion, successfully, but it is equally true that God's plan for the ages might not be thwarted by the non-fealty of one man. Hence we find a hint of restoration, (vague and occult though it seems) entwined in God's words to the serpent, before the guilty pair were thrust forth from the garden of Eden to populate the earth.

The law having been broken, its penalty must need be carried into effect; but, afterwards, it has nothing more that it can do with the culprit. God had said, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," and God's veracity claimed their death when they ate of the fruit of the forbidden tree; yet when dead the law was satisfied, justice was justified, and the man was placed outside the law. Should God, in his wisdom, and in the workings of his plan of the ages, see fit to restore man to life after his death, such an act on his part would not interfere in the least with the law or its penalty. The law is fulfilled and the penalty fully satisfied when man dies, but the power of God does not end there; he who could mould man, the inanimate dust of the Tertiary ground, and quicken him into life and conscious activity could surely reorganize and give life again to dead individuals, if he were so disposed, even though the dust of ages might rest on his mortal remains, or though he might have lain in the death state from time immemorial. The arm of God is not shortened that he cannot save to the uttermost, those who may be en rapport with the Creator and with his plan, and work of the ages. Hence we see the great beauty and significance of such words of inspiration as, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord," Rom. vi. 23; and of, "For if, by the trespass of one death reigned through the one; much more shall they that receive the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness reign in life through one, even Jesus Christ. So then, as through one trespass the judgment came unto all men to condemnation; even so, through one act of righteousness the free gift came unto all men to justification of life." Rom. v. 17, 18. R. V. So, then, full satisfaction having been made to the law of sin and death, the free gift of God came upon all men through the obedience of faith, and, to "those who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, honor and immortality, eternal life is freely offered, even though the seeker may long have rested in the hadean darkness, and mouldering corruption of the tomb.

To man, when first placed upon the earth, life was given as a free gift by the Architect of the universe without his knowledge or consent. His wishes, desires, feelings and aspirations were not consulted in the matter, but, in the prolongation of that life in the present, or as to its perpetuation for the future age, or, as to the physical conditions attending its materialistic manifestations, now and then, his free moral agency enters largely as a factor. Thousands of channels are open at his command, for abbreviating his present life; only one, the strict observance of physical law, affords him longevity. Innumerable paths lead away from the blessings of an existence in the age to come. Only the obedience of faith and the practical observance of the law of God, will engender any true hope of that life, so that, God's justice and allied attributes remain vindicated and man's free moral agency is left unimpaired, whatever may be man's course of life.

THE MILLENNIAL KINGDOM, OR THE GLORIOUS REIGN OF CHRIST ON THE EARTH.—No. 2.

The conditions of the physical heavens and earth will be changed in a manner to adapt them to the glorious reign of our Lord, and make them, in the highest degree, conducive to the happiness of his people. We are very clearly taught that the earth will be exceedingly fruitful, and bring forth in great abundance. In Ezek. xxxvi. 33–35, we read: "Thus saith the Lord God; In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities I will also cause you to dwell in the cities, and the wastes shall be builded. And the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become as the garden of Eden." Also in Isa. xxxv. 1, it is said, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."

Again, in the second chapter of Joel, beginning with the 21st verse, we find the following: "Fear not, O land; be glad and rejoice: for the Lord will do great things. Be not afraid, ye beasts of the field; for the pastures of the wilderness do spring, for the tree beareth her fruit, the fig-tree and the vine do yield their strength. Be glad then, ye children of Zion, and rejoice in the Lord your God: for he hath given you the former rain moderately, and he will cause to come down for you the rain, the former rain, and the latter rain in the first month. And the floors shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil. And I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the canker-worm and the caterpiller, and the palmer-worm, my great army which I sent among you. And ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied, and praise the name of the Lord your God, that hath dealt wondrously with you: and my people shall never be ashamed."

Again, The Lord hath spoken by the mouth of Ezekiel, saying: "I will make with them a covenant of peace, and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land, and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods. And I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be showers of blessing. And the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in the land, and shall know that I am the Lord, when I have broken the bands of their yoke," Ezek. xxxiv. 25, 27.

"They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer: and while they are yet speaking, I will hear. The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock: and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain saith the Lord," Isa. lxv. 23–25.

These are pictures of Millennial glory; for according to the context, they are to be enjoyed by God's chosen people after they have been delivered from their enemies, and returned from their captivity, and made to dwell safely in their own land, with the Branch that shall grow unto David reigning over them. See Jer. xxiii. 5, and xxxiii. 15.

In these pictures we have a magnificent view of the glories that will make the world joyous under the illustrious reign of Christ. Then the powers of the heavens and earth will be subject to his control, as when he stilled the tempest on the sea of Galilee, or with a word caused the fig-tree to wither; or as when he healed "all manner of disease among the people," or with the voice of authority called the dead to life, as in the case of Lazarus and of the widow's son.

At this time the elements of nature will all be made subservient to the interests of his people, and they shall no more be subjected to endure, or even fear the raging storms, the furious cyclones or the mighty floods, such as have so frequently left wide-spread ruin and desolation in their track. Nor will they fear the great army of destroying insects, or the withering drouths, which have so often cut off the productions of the land, and brought famine, pestilence and devastation: for the promise is that they shall be removed, and what they have destroyed shall be given back.

It is also taught in these beautiful representations of Christ's reign on the earth, that he "will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land," and those which shall remain will be perfectly docile and harmless, so that people who desire may "dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods" without any fear of being harmed or molested.

It is very easy to conceive, that under such a condition of things as is here brought to view, the productions and resources of the world will be very largely increased, with much less labor than is now required. And as they will all be controlled by the pure principles of righteousness, they will not be destroyed or wasted by intemperance or through the influence of vile and perverse habits of indolence and dissipation. Nor will they be collected and held by great monopolies, such as oppress and afflict the common people of the present time; but will be adjusted in such a manner as will make all alike sharers in the blessings; for where perfect righteousness reigns, there will be perfect adjustment and equity, and no such thing will be known as one seeking to get the advantage of another.

The glory of Christ's kingdom will be greatly augmented by the fact that his people will be exempted from disease, and their life increased in duration to that of the antediluvians. The Lord says, "I will settle you after your former estate, and will do better for you than at your beginnings," Ezek. xxxvi. 11. And in one of his beautiful millennial pictures, Isaiah says: "The inhabitant shall not say I am sick." Isa. xxxiii. 24. And the Lord Jesus, by promptly healing all that came to him gave us plainly to understand that the subjects of his kingdom should not suffer from disease. And we are informed by the prophet, that "They shall build houses and inhabit them: and they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build and another inhabit; they shall not plant and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands." This will certainly be a very great change from the condition of things now prevalent on the earth—one that will be hailed with joy.

Another glory of the reign of Christ on earth will be, that it will be one of uninterrupted peace and tranquility. A time when "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," Mic. iv. 3. Such is not the condition of the world now, for the earth is a scene of contention and strife, with a prospect, that at no very distant day the nations of Europe will be involved in a general war. The preparations that are now being made, far exceeds anything of the kind that has ever been known in the history of the world. Besides, there is a general feeling of unrest among them, which it is believed will be followed by the terrible and awful realities of war.

It is predicted that such a state of affairs among the nations will precede the Coming of the King, but cannot exist during his reign. For then "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee, for the kingdom is the Lord's, and he is the governor among the nations," Psa. xxii. 27, 28. "In his day shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth," Psa. lxxiii. 7. "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David," Isa. ix. 7. The peaceable and happy condition of the world that shall exist after the establishment of the kingdom of our Lord, which is indicated by these Scriptures, is a glory after which, in this age, the righteous sigh in vain. It can only be seen in prophecy.

When the world shall be recovered from the curse that was pronounced upon it, and shall be renovated and restored to its original fertility and fruitfulness, and its great army of destroyers removed, and its resources adjusted according to the eternal principles of righteousness and equity, as is will be under the reign of Christ, it will only require a small portion of the time to obtain the means of a livelihood. And as during that period, the Lord's earthly people will be exempted from disease, they will be free from the languor and stupidity, which results from an abnormal condition of the system, that largely debilitates the whole human race. And as the duration of life will be increased to its antediluvian longevity, it will afford ample opportunity to explore the various fields of science, and for the acquisition of knowledge, and to become familiar with the great questions relating to God, and to his works, in which a proficiency will be made, which will greatly surpass our highest conceptions.

In this way, by the assistance of the Spirit, the knowledge of God will be diffused through all the earth, as is clearly taught in the following Scriptures, where it is said: "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," Isa. xi. 9; Hab. ii. 14. "And they shall not teach every man his neighbor, saying know the Lord: for all shall know me from the least to the greatest of them," Heb. viii. 11; Jer. xxxi. 34.

It will be observed that this promise belongs to the new covenant that God, by the mouth of the prophet Jeremiah, said he would make with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah; and Paul refers to the fact that it was to be made with them, without giving the slightest intimation that it had been or that it could be transferred from them, therefore we cannot understand it to have any reference to the church, but to the reign of Christ that shall be established over the house of Jacob, after which the Lord is represented as saying: "Arise and shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee," Isa. lx. 1. Then in the third verse it is said: "The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." From this we understand that the people of Israel, whose place will be nearest the throne, and who will have the most direct communication with the Lord, will be the leaders in the great light and knowledge that shall cover the earth.

The agency by which the earth shall be renovated and prepared for the Millennial kingdom of Christ is the Spirit, the outpouring of which is promised in its completeness, in connection with the new covenant which shall be made with Israel and Judah at the time of their final deliverance and return to their own land, and the coming of the Son of Man to reign over them. (Compare Isa. xxxii. 1, 13–18 with Joel ii. 28–32 and Zech. xii. 7–10). After that, by the energy of the Spirit's power, the curse shall be lifted from the land, and it shall bloom with all the magnificence and glory which are seen in the illustrious descriptions of the prophets.

But to cap the climax of glory that shall shine forth in the kingdom of our Lord, and fill the hearts of his people with joy, it is said that, "He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them," Rev. vii. 15 and xxi. 3. The Lord and his Bride whose bodies will be fashioned like unto his own, will doubtless, during his reign, become personally known to his earthly people, and will converse with them familiarly, as he did with the disciples during the forty days that intervened between the time of his resurrection and ascension, and which is also typified by the angelic visitations of the Abrahamic and Israelitish dispensations. To be honored with the presence and association of such visitors will be a glory quite beyond the power of our infinite minds to estimate.

We wish now to call attention to the fact that all this glory which has been described belongs to the Lord's earthly people, and is what Paul calls, "The glory of the terrestrial," 1 Cor. xv. 40, which differs very widely from "The glory of the celestial." And it will be observed that all the blessedness of the Scriptures relating to the kingdom of our Lord, which have been examined, present an earthly prospect, and promise only such things as are adapted to supply the wants and desires of a people having temporal bodies like our own, which is exceeded by "the glory of the celestial" as far as the heavens are above the earth.

Those who are the true members of the Church of Christ, belong to his body and Bride, and compose the heavenly division of the great family of God, and are appointed to a glory that far excels that which belongs to his earthly people: for "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory," Col. iii. 4. All those who are sleeping in him shall be raised, and the living shall be changed, 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51, and their bodies shall all be "fashioned like unto his glorious body," Phil. iii. 21. "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality," 1 Cor. xv. 42. Then shall they be equal to himself, for he says to the Father: "The glory which thou gavest me, I have given them," John xvii. 22. They will be clothed with his own glory and splendor, and invested with the exceeding greatness of his mighty power, Eph. i. 19, 20. And all things on earth and in heaven will be in subordination to them who are the Bride of heaven and Queen of earth: and will have authority to judge the world, angels and men, as indicated by the following language of the apostle: "Do ye not know: that the saints shall judge the world? And if the world is to be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?" 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3.

The place of the church of Christ, during his reign on earth, will be with himself, on his throne; for he says, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me on My throne," Rev. iii. 21. There they will be partakers of his glory, and co-operate with him in his reign over his earthly people.

Now in conclusion let me say: To you who are members of the true Church of Christ, and who full believe and receive these great and precious doctrines relating to his kingdom, and to the exalted position you shall occupy during his reign, the hope that his coming is near at hand, so indicated in the prophecies and signs of the times, must be full of inspiration; and should lead to a more full and complete consecration of yourselves to the great work of winning souls to the Lord, and also into a more perfect union of yourselves to Christ; "That ye may be found worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory," 1 Thess. ii. 12. And our prayer is that you may all be found looking for him, for the apostle says that, "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation," Heb. ix. 28.—W. A. Bowyer.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

DR. SIVARTHA.

In our last issue we inserted a short note regarding his plans for organising a movement (for the re-settlement of Palestine. In the Montreal Herald and Weekly Star, for July 18, we find a somewhat fuller notice of his purposes, as follows:

"Dr. Sivartha, of Chicago, is organising a movement for the resettlement of Palestine. He is working in England as well as in America. He is making many converts to his views, and he expects that there will soon be an extensive migration to the Holy Land from both Europe and America. The new colony, although the product of deep religious convictions, is to be formed on strictly business principles. Captain Conder, who has made an official survey of Palestine, reports that its agricultural capabilities are very great and that it can be easily made to rival in fertility the most productive countries of Southern Europe. Plans have been formed to rebuild Jerusalem in harmony with the prophetic descriptions of the Bible. It is proposed to be made a centre of learning and political influence as well as of religion. Dr. Sivartha's scheme is extensive and far-reaching. He says that he has long made it a study to develop not only all Palestine but all the great Euphrates Valley, "which is capable of sustaining 100,000,000 people, and of again being the centre of the world's activities." He expects aid both from Jews and Gentiles. According to his expectations the Jews will form but one-sixth of the population of the reinhabited and revived Holy Land. Dr. Sivartha is evidently an enthusiast, who has the faculty of inoculating others with his enthusiasm."

In the Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times, of July 26, we read—"Dr. Sivartha sailed last week on the Anchoria to commence operations on his project for colonizing Palestine. He proposes to rebuild Jerusalem, and has no doubt as to funds being furnished for the work."

From periodicals of the day we learn that the Germans are becoming quite numerous, as colonists, in Palestine. Israel also, in exile, is anxiously looking for the fulfilment of prophecy in being once more gathered back to the "Fatherland." Grand events will transpire in that country in connection with the closing years of this gospel dispensation and the opening years of the now impending Millennial Age. Various actors may take a part, and strange scenes may be enacted in those climes of ancient story. We await the denouement.

CLAIMING a citizenship in heaven—See Phil. iii. 20, R. V.—we do not take any active part in political matters. Still Paul recognized, and claimed his rights as a Roman citizen. So, as a citizen of the United States, and as a lover of liberty, education, and the Bible, and with an intense hatred to those emissaries of Satan, the Jesuits, in their covert treasonable design, in their expelling the Bible from schools, interfering with the management of institutions of learning by ousting teachers, and throwing out books of history that allude to indulgences, and the abominations connected with their sale in the times preceding, and connected with the rise of the Great Reformation, we have taken it upon us to quote pretty freely from different authentic historians a part, and a part only, of what is on record regarding that abominable trade. It was this abhorred Jesuitical encroachment on American rights and institutions that prompted our course; and we are glad to learn that there is a waking up to this subject. It is high time.

IN a number of a few weeks ago, we called attention to a journal published in Chicago entitled America. In view of the encroachments of Romanism, and when associated foreigners are outraging true American feeling, and love of blood-bought institutions, by claiming the right to display the detestable emblems of despotism where only the "Star Spangled Banner" should be flung out to the winds, there is ample place for a journal so truly American. Native born Americans, and liberty-loving naturalized foreigners, lovers of the Bible, of free schools and the rights of conscience, will find much to admire and indorse in its columns. Political Judases, who are bartering with a corrupt hierarchy for preferment, would find some very good practical hints in its varied articles.

Mould, Flowers and Wheat.

We remember four lines written by a poet whose name we cannot just now recall, who, in speaking of future contingencies regarding his dead dust said,

"To think of seasons yet to come
That I may never see;
To think a flower is yet to bloom
Of dust that I shall be."

This surmise might have become a reality if he had been buried in Egypt's battle fields "among the noble slain" in England's wars. To enrich the grain lands of Britain decaying bones are imported, and some summer flowers may draw their gaudy beauties from bone dust, as well as wheat its strength. An English paper says:

The bones of our soldiers who fell in Egypt are arriving in this country to be used as manure. A vessel with a cargo of bones reached Aberdeen. The captain said the bones, principally of the camel and giraffe, while being shipped at Alexandria were found to include a number of perfect skeletons. These he rejected, though the cargo is supposed to have contained a quantity of separate human bones. The natives visit the battle-fields and dig up the remains of English soldiers.—London Christian World.

THE ANCIENTS AND THE FUTURE STATE.

In our spell of indisposition, so far as health was concerned, we were led to vividly contemplate the blessed hopes set before us in the glorious gospel, as relating to complete emancipation from death, and from all the evils resulting from sin at the coming of our Lord. During the few days of convalescence, we looked into some histories, and our attention was drawn to the perfect contrast in expression between the inspired writers and those who lived and died without the gospel's cheering hopes. What comfort could we, on a bed of sickness, derive from what the wise among the Gentiles have said respecting futurity? By way of illustration, in contrast, we now place before our readers what some men, noted in heathen annals, have said. We translate from the original in the foot notes of the volumes narrating the early history of Christianity. We learn that Julius Cæsar boldly averred, in a speech made in the Roman Senate, that man had nothing to fear or hope for after death. As some of our readers may like to see the original, we give it. Speaking of death he says: Do poena possumus equidem dicere id, quod res habet: in luctu atque miseriis mortem sæpenumerum requiem, non cruciatum esse; eam cuncta mortalium mala dissolvere; ultra neque curæ neque gaudio locum esse. This we somewhat freely translate; "Concerning punishment we are enabled to speak confidentially, as to what may pertain to it, that for the grieving and miserable death brings a state of absolute repose from all affliction, and not a state of excruciating agony. It sets mortals most absolutely free from every form of evil; and beyond it there is no place for either trouble or enjoyment."

M. Portius Cato, an illustrious philosopher of the Stoic School, gives these sentiments of Cæsar his unqualified approbation in these words:—Bene et composite, Cæsar paulo ante in hoc ordine de vita et morte disseruit: falsa, credo, existimans quæ de inferis memorantur; diverso itinere malos a bonis loca tetra, inculta, fœda, atque formidolosa habere. To this we give the following English rendering: "Cæsar a very short time ago reasoned in a happy pertinent style in this particular manner concerning life and death. In making his estimate of what is commonly narrated about the dwellers in the nether world he says, I believe it all false that the wicked make a diverse journey, from that made by the good, to hideous, waste, foul, and horrible abodes." In the opinion of these two eminent Romans death ended all.

And this was the opinion of whole schools of heathen philosophers. With these, misery had its end in the eternal insensibility and unconsciousness of the grave. To what Cæsar and Cato have said we will only add, at this time, the expression of another Roman of distinguished eminence. The Elder Pliny tersely shows how thoroughly impregnated with this form of unbelief the educated class were in those times. Speaking of the death state he says:—"Omnibus a supremo die eadem, quæ ante primum: nec magis a morte sensus ullus ant corpori aut animæ, quam ante natalem." We thus express this in an English dress: "From the last death-day the same state will be for all as it was before the first birth-day. Onward from death there will never more be either bodily sensation or mental consciousness any more than there was anterior to our birth." Pliny thus makes our human existence a brief hour of sensation and unconsciousness between two eternal nights. Leaving now the ancients let us see how this latter thought of Pliny was draped in figure by one of our English ancestry. Green, in his History of the English people, informs us that an aged Ealdorman once addressed Edwine, king of Northumbria, in the following manner:—"So seems the life of man, O King, as a sparrow's flight through the hall when a man is sitting at meat in winter-tide with the warm fire lighted on the hearth, but the chill rain-storm without. The sparrow flies in at one door and tarries for a moment in the light and heat of the hearth-fire, and then flying forth from the other vanishes into the wintry darkness from whence it came. So tarries for a moment the life of man in our sight, but what is before it, what after it, we know not."

Then speaking of Christianity, which was then just being introduced into Britain, he says:—"If this new teaching tell us aught certainly of these, let us follow it." It was no inspiring hope of a future state that animated the angels; but a certain lofty spirit, inherent in their mental constitution, that prompted to deeds of noble manhood, and personal glory and independence in the present life. The mysteries of life and death were pathetic themes for the bards. The language of one of these poets of the olden time warms the living in these words:—"Soon will it be that sickness or sword-blade shear thy strength from thee, or the fire sing thee, or the flood whelm thee, or the sword grip thee, or arrow hit thee, or age o'ertake thee, and thine eye's brightness sink down in darkness." With them life and death were controlled by "weird" or destiny. "Strong as he might be, man struggled in vain with the doom that encompassed him, that girded his life with a thousand perils and broke it at so short a span." Life had its work of "doomed deeds," closing in the fateful "weirdness" at death and the tomb. It was a "sparrow-flight through a warm light room" from an eternal winter-night one into the self-same eternal winter-night again—into endless darkness and nothingness.

How ardently we should prize the glorious gospel through which "life and immortality are brought to light." In order to this let us read in contrast to the words above quoted some few of the triumphant expressions of the ancient worthies, who walked in the light of divine revelation, and spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. Says Job:—"I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me." David says: "As for me, I will behold thy righteousness: I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." Speaking of the living God, Isaiah says: "He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall be taken away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it." And again: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." We close the contrast with the glowing words of Paul who lived shortly after Cæsar and Cato, and who was cotemporary with Pliny. "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Jesus Christ is "the resurrection and the life," and he will raise up all his people at the last day. Death, to the believer, is only the briefest suspension of conscious activities, and the grave-sleep a short, deep, undisturbed and unmeasured repose, during which the unmanifested life is hid with Christ in God to be manifested in a body like Christ's own most glorious body, when that body is raised from the dead. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 40.

SIN AND THE SINNER.

Q. What is sin?

A. Sin is a violation of God's law involving moral character.

Q. Has it not a more general meaning?

A. In a more general sense sin is a violation of any law, physical or moral. We may transgress any physical law, and to such infractions God has fixed penalties. We violate the laws of health. Various diseases follow as penalties or as effects flowing from legitimate causes. Death itself is the highest penalty attached to the violation of the laws of health.

Q. Who, then, is a sinner?

A. Any one that violates law, physical or moral.

Q. Does the death of Christ answer the demands of violated physical law?

A. It does not pay the penalty of broken natural laws, such as the laws of the material world, and those of health; but it extends to the penalties affixed to violated moral laws, such as involve moral character; the soul that sinneth, it shall die; this death penalty, the death of Christ is not intended to prevent. Christians have infirmities; they suffer and die.

Q. What then, is requisite to constitute in a Bible sense, an act a sin and the doer a sinner?

A. The person must know the character of the law violated; and his will must be free to act or not to act, since the will that is forced by a higher and more powerful will ceases to claim such act as its own.

Q. Will you please define various classes of sin?

A. The term sin, as used in the Bible, has the following shades of meaning: 1. It may be defined to be any thought, word, deed, omission, or desire contrary to the law of God; the first shade of meaning may be, termed a corrupt, or sinful nature. Psa. li. 5; Rom. vii. 8. 2. The acting out of that corrupt nature. Jas. i. 15. This is called actual transgression. 3. That corrupt nature, acted out, begets still deeper defilement. Psa. ii. 2; Heb. x. 2. 4. The punishment of sin sometimes takes the family name, as in Gen. iv. 7, xix. 15. Sometimes it denotes both the guilt and the punishment. Psa. xxxii. 1. It sometimes denotes the sacrifices that were offered for sin. Lev. iv. 3, 25, 29. 7. Sin is sometimes taken for a fault, either in doctrine or mode of life. John viii. 46. 8. It stands, also, for infidelity. John xvi. 9. 9. For a corrupt course of life. 10. For the sins committed by those who have been regenerated. Rom. vi. 12. 11. It stands for sins highly aggravated. John xv. 22, 24. 12. Idols sometimes have the name. Amos viii. 14.

Q. Who is the original author of sin?

A. God's holiness and purity would not allow him to tempt any one to sin, or to violate his own law. James i. 13. Satan is the original author. Jesus restores man to a state where his salvation is possible. He can accept the terms and live.

Q. What are presumptuous sins?

A. Deliberate and known sins.

Q. Have all mankind so sinned as to forfeit eternal life?

A. They have. Eternal life is a gift, not from the first Adam, for, by disobedience he lost it, but from Jesus Christ the last Adam, purchased by his obedience and death. The wages or hire of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. Rom. vi. 23.

Q. If Jesus, the last Adam, purchased eternal life or salvation for all mankind, will he not bestow it upon every member of the human family?

A. He has made salvation possible for all whose wills will yield to the convictions of Bible truths.

Q. Can you name any class of sinners that place themselves beyond the reach of mercy?

A. Christ himself names such a class, Matt. xii. 31, 32, "Wherefore I say unto you, all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whoever shall speak a word against the Son of Man it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world (age) neither in the world (age) to come!

Q. What is the sin against the Holy Ghost?

A. It is the attributing of the works of the Spirit of God to Satanic power. Maliciously and against the convictions of their own consciences, imputing the works of the Spirit to the prince of darkness. See Heb. x. 26, 27; also Heb. vi. 4-6. "Such as are guilty of this sin, are excepted from pardon, because the death of Christ was not appointed for the expiation of it; and there being no sacrifice, there can be no satisfaction, and consequently no pardon."

Q. May they not be forgiven in the coming age?

A. No; since there is no sacrifice that reaches their case, there can be no expiation and no pardon.

Q. How then is Jesus the Savior of all men?

A. This refers to life in a subordinate sense, and not to eternal life.

Q. Is it not said that, to Christ, every knee shall bow?

A. It is so said, Isa. xlv. 23; Rom. xiv. 11; Phil. ii. 10. But this is a subjugation in wrath. No intimation is here given that this is a willing obedience. In that age of subjugation they are forced to submit to superior power as the south in the great rebellion submitted to the superior power of the north. Eternal life is a gift, free, but not forced upon any; to force any one into that state would be to that person a punishment. Willing obedience procures the gift of eternal life. They must not only be willing, but that willingness must be prompted by pure love to God. Without such there can be no giving of eternal life.

The Greatness of Trifles.

The best fidelity to Christ is shown in a daily vigilant service to him in trifles, in efforts to honor him in humble, inconspicuous services, such as in good temper in families, sympathy with man and beast, honesty in business, liberality to servants, fidelity to employers. These things make up the best discipleship. The same truth applies to many things. The best paintings are those where such details as the blades of grass, the leaves of the trees, the lines upon the water, and similar minute points, are most perfectly delineated. Artistic excellency consists chiefly in the complete accuracy which the slothful or the ignorant workman cannot or will not accomplish. The great Italian sculptor, Michael Angelo, was once visited by an acquaintance, who remarked, on entering his studio, "Why, you have done nothing to that figure since I was here last." "Yes," was the reply; "I have softened this expression, touched off that projection, and made other improvements." "Oh!" said the visitor, "those are mere trifles." "True," answered Michael Angelo, "but remember that trifles make perfection; and perfection is no trifle." In like manner, the highest forms of devotion to Christ consist in fidelity to apparent trifles. For only heartfelt love and abiding recollectedness of him, as an ever-beloved object, will enable his disciples to maintain throughout each day, in word and company, in busy occupation and before his enemies, the duty of honoring him thus continuously and in the whole details of life. —London Record.

Where is the Throne.

Spiritualizing makes strange work of many passages in prophecy. "The Lord shall give unto him the throne of his Father David." Mr. Burlington Wale says of this text: "How few Christians believe this! and how many distort this and similar passages by spiritualizing them! We would ask these brethren what, in their principle of interpretation, we are to understand by the above promise—'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his Father David?' Is it a spiritual throne in human hearts? When did David occupy that? Is it the throne in heaven which the Savior occupies now? When did David sit upon that? Did David ever have a throne in heaven? Has Christ ever had a throne on earth? No! But he will; for the only throne that David ever occupied was in Jerusalem, over Judea and Israel, and that throne has never yet been occupied by the Lord Jesus; but if the above promise and prophecy speak truth, he will yet occupy that throne, or wield dominion from Jerusalem over Israel and the world.

Bad Thoughts.

Bad thoughts, if cherished, blight virtue, destroy purity, and undermine the stablest foundations of character. They are like rot in timber; like rust in iron. They eat into the man. And when the process has gone on for a while, and there comes the stress of an outward temptation, down they go into a mass of ruins! Ships go out to sea, all bright with fresh paint, their sails all spread and streamers flying, and never come back, never reach port. Why? They met a storm and went down, because they were rotten. Under the paint was decay! Just so, bad thoughts, vile, impure thoughts and imaginations, rot the manly oak of character, rust the iron of principle, slacken all the stays of virtue, and leave the man, the woman, to the violence of temptation, with no interior of reserve power to stand the shock. Bad thoughts fed and fattened are the bottom vice of society.

Enlisting is Only the Beginning.

Resolving to serve the Lord is a good start in the right direction, but it is only a start. It bears the same relation to the actual service of God that a soldier's enlistment does to a soldier's campaigning. Says the Son of Sirach: "My son, if thou come to serve the Lord, prepare thy soul for temptation. Set thy heart aright and constantly endure, and make not haste in time of trouble. Cleave unto him and depart not away, that thou mayst be increased at thy last end." And it is in the line of this thought that the apostle to the Gentiles says, to one of his young fellow-soldiers: "Suffer hardship with me, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." Enlisting is a good beginning; but it is he who endureth unto the end that shall be saved.

We Must Not Doubt God.

We must not allow ourselves to doubt the goodness of God, because his ways are not our ways. We must not become impatient; because all good is not accomplished at once, nor all evil destroyed at once. We must not grow weary in waiting because our prayers are not answered at once. Nor must we grow weary in well doing, "for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." Here we must "walk by faith, not by sight." And though our faith may be sorely tried, yet let us not doubt that in the light of eternity all the mysteries of Providence will be cleared up, and things which now are so perplexing to our minds, will be found to have been full of wisdom and mercy. "For now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as I am known."

MAXEY.—In Plymouth, Marshall Co., Ind., July 28, 1888, Nathan Maxey, aged 74 years, 2 months and 6 days.

Brother Maxey was born in Garrard County, Ky., May 22, 1814, came to Indiana in 1821. After living in Jennings and Bartholemew Counties he removed to Marshall County, in 1852, where he resided near and in Plymouth till his death. In 1837 he was married to Miss Matilda Welch who was ever to him a kind and devoted wife.

Thus death has taken from us another faithful member of the Church of God. He had a stroke of paralysis a few years ago, and, as a consequence, became partially crippled. His death finally was quite unexpected and sudden. We entertain the glad and joyful assurance that he sleeps in Jesus awaiting the coming of the Life-giver on the resurrection morn. Funeral discourse by the Editor, Sunday, July 29, 2:30 p. m., at the Methodist Church in Plymouth. The appreciation in which Brother Maxey was held was manifest in the large audience in attendance.

Anniversaries.

"The Church of God" in Michigan will hold their Annual Meeting (D. V.) in Dutton, Kent Co., beginning Thursday evening, Aug. 23d, and holding over Sunday. Now brothers and sisters one and all, this meeting means more to us than any previous meeting ever held in Michigan has meant. It means more than meeting for a visit, it means business, and very important business too. It means a reunion of the State of Michigan into one common brotherhood if we are ready for it. Are we ready. If all come for that purpose, with every selfish object entirely left out, only the good of the cause at heart, feeling the great need of earnest united efforts for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, then the object of this gathering will be accomplished. Let every brother and sister in the State who are holding fast to the faith once delivered to the saints be present without fail. God's cause needs your earnest attention. Come with hearts full of love and prayer, come with hands ready to grasp every child of God with a hearty, honest welcome. Come with a purpose high and holy, and this meeting will be heralded to the throne above, with joy sinners will turn to say, "Behold how these brethren love one another," and we will all receive a blessing.

The train accommodations are much better than heretofore. Trains leave G. R. for Dutton over the Michigan Central R. R at 1:10 p. m. reaching here 1:28 p. m. Another leaving G. R. at 5:40 p. m. reaching here at 6:00. Another leaves G. R. at 11:00 evening reaching here at 11:17 evening. Trains reach here from the East at 5:28 a. m. 9:25 a. m. 2:50 p. m. 9:53 evening.

The Annual State Conference of the Church of God will meet at Claysville, Brooken P. O, Huntington Co., Ind., beginning on Friday, August 31, 1888, at 2:30 p. m., and last over Sunday. Those coming by the Nickle Plate R. R, will stop at South Whitley. Those coming on the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific R. R., or the Cincinnati, Wabash & Michigan R. R., will stop at North Manchester, where they will be met and conveyed to the place of meeting. At our meeting at Antioch last June the subject of having the churches represented at Conference by delegates was discussed, and a motion was made that each local church appoint at a meeting of the church held previous to the Conference, delegates who can attend the Conference, and that the Church officers send the names of such delegates to the Conference Secretary, that they may be known as the authorized representatives of such church. It was also urged that at the same meeting the local churches collect such amounts as they can, to send to the conference for purposes of evangelising. Brethren, this work is important. Business is business, and the work of spending the money the good Lord has placed in our hands to the best advantage, requires just as much attention as any worldly affair, and a little more care. So I urge it upon every Church of God in Indiana, to have a meeting soon, and appoint your delegates and make a generous collection, and report the action, and come to the meeting prepared to make a grand good effort to do more this year than last, and do it better, for the time to work is getting very short.

The brethren and sisters at Claysville are able and willing to accommodate all who will attend. Any one intending to attend this meeting, who is not acquainted with the route, etc., will do well to write to A. G. Brookover, or Dr. C. W. Fry, Bracken, Ind., stating what time they expect to get there, and they will be cared for.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

The second quarterly meeting of the A. G. Conference of Michigan will be held with the church at Hesperia, Oceana Co., commencing Friday evening, August 17th, 1888, and holding over Sunday. Teams will meet the morning trains at Fremont, Friday, the day the meeting commences. Fremont is twelve miles from Hesperia situated on the Chicago & West Mich. R. R. between Big Rapids and Muskegon. Those going by way of Big Rapids will have to stay in Big Rapids or Fremont Thursday night. Let us all come to the meeting with hearts full to overflowing with the love of God and make this meeting one long to be remembered on account of the power of God with us. A. L. FOX, Pres.
PETER L. SCOTT, Sec.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V. in Bland and Haller's Block, Room 36, 37½ Ontario Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Seats free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are we come.

"I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." Phil. iv. 11.

Have I learned in whatsoever
State, to be content?
Have I learned this blessed lesson,
By my Master sent,—
And with joyous acquiescence
Do I greet his will,
Even when my own is thwarted,
And my hands lie still?

Surely it is best and sweetest,
Thus to have Him choose,
Even though some work I've taken,
By this choice I lose.
Foldest hands need not be idle,—
Fold them but in prayer,
Other souls may toil far better
For God's answer there.

They that reap receive their wages,
Those who work, their crown,
Those who pray, throughout the ages
Bring life-it answers down:
In "whatever state" abiding
Till the Master call,
They at eventide will find him
Glorified in all.

What though I can do so little
For my Lord and King,
At his feet I sit and listen,
At his feet I sing.
And whatever my condition,
All in love is meant;
Sing, my soul, thy recognition!
Sing, and be content!

PAUL'S FORERVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 2.

Paul himself probably supposed that the antichrist he foretold would be an individual, for it is not always given to prophets to understand the messages they are inspired to deliver. "Not unto themselves, but unto us" they minister, as Peter tells us. At any rate, the early Church thought so, as their writings prove. They expected an individual antichrist, who should be followed by an immediate advent of Christ. But it must be remembered that the apostles and the early Church knew nothing of the eighteen centuries of delay which have actually taken place. They could not have guessed or even conceived that well-nigh two thousand years would pass before the second advent. They expected it in their own day. Paul wrote as if he himself would see it: "We who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord;" and no revelation was given the effect of which would have been to rob the early Church of that sweet and sanctifying hope. On the contrary, the prediction of the apostasy and the antichrist who should head it up are purposely so worded as not to extinguish that hope. Even in Daniel, where chronological limits are assigned to the Roman "little horn," the expression which conveys them is symbolic, and could be interpreted with certainty only by the fulfilment.

No duration at all is mentioned in this prophecy by Paul, only the two limits. "Already" the apostasy was developing, and it would not be destroyed till the advent. That much was clearly revealed, but not the length of the interval between the starting-point in apostolic days in the first century, and the advent, which has not yet—in the nineteenth—taken place. There was a good reason for the form of the prophecy—for the ambiguous use of the singular number. It neither asserted nor excluded a dynastic meaning. Time alone could decide, and time has decided.

Bearing this in mind, let us now look at Paul's prophetic portrait of the great antichristian power he foresaw and foretold.

It is a strange one, with marked and most peculiar features. He is represented as seated in the temple or house of God; i. e. the Church, "the habitation of God through the Spirit," God's dwelling-place—a sacred sphere, the most sacred on earth. There in the midst, exalted and enthroned, sits a sinful, mortal, an enemy of God, a "man of sin," engaged in receiving from a multitude of deluded apostate Christians worship(ful) submission and adoration. Beneath him, like a dark cloud of vapor, out of which he has arisen, is a "mystery of iniquity." There is a chronological date upon the cloud. Close examination shows inscribed on it the words, "doth already work," indicating its existence in Paul's day, eighteen centuries ago. On one side lies a broken arch, covered with Roman sculpture. This arch had at one period blocked the way from the dark under cloud to the exalted seat occupied by the "man of sin." In Paul's day it stood firm, a massive hindrance; but he foresaw that it would be "taken out of the way." By some mighty stroke it has been rent, and lies in fragments. The barrier has been "taken out of the way." Through the ruinous gap the mystery of iniquity has come up into the holy place in the form of "all deceivableness of unrighteousness." Mingled with a vast mass of deceit there are certain leading lies, which are firmly believed, and many "lying wonders."

The countenance of the "man of sin" is marked by pretended sanctity. There is in it a look of elevation, marred by pride. The features are full of power and intelligence. His head is encircled with a crown of a peculiar form, unlike that worn by ordinary kings, and upon it is the title "King of kings and Lord of lords,"—implying that he is ruler both of the Church and of the world, because as God on earth. His hand is lifted in the attitude of one bestowing Divine favors. His semblance is that of benignity and blessing, while the spirit of the man is that of the great adversary. Behind him, half concealed, is a dark figure difficult to make out, with a face full of malignity. There is a gleam of defiance in his eye, and a deadly purpose in his aspect. He too wears a crown, and the name written on it in yellow, sulphurous letters is, "god of this world." He stands close to the "man of sin,"—too close to be seen by the worshiping multitude,—directing and inspiring all his utterances and all his movements. With extraordinary skill he wields a world-wide power through this chosen agent, a power which has been exercised in various ways for six thousand years, deluding men to their destruction, but which reaches its climax in this combination of satanic craft with ecclesiastical exaltation. By the mouth of the "man of sin" he speaks to the multitude throughout the holy temple, or house of God, in a tone of authority, commanding them to submit to his teachings and guidance, and to abase themselves in his presence. His words are, "Fall down and worship me." The deluded multitude blindly obeys him, as though his voice was the voice of God!

Under the feet of the "man of sin" are two venerable volumes, bearing the titles "Laws Human and Divine." He is trampling on them both, treading them under-foot! Some in the crowd are pointing to this fact, and stand in a protesting attitude. In the distance there are prophets and apostles looking on. Far above—a perfect contrast in every respect to the self-exalting "man of sin"—is seen the self-humbling and self-sacrificing Son of God. He too is seated, seated on a radiant throne, from which celestial glory is streaming. His attitude is that of one coming in judgment for the destruction of the "man of sin" and his sinful worshipers. Many of the protestors are looking at him in anticipation of his advent, and seem to have something of his likeness. The face of the man of sin is the face of a false apostle, the dark face of Judas. Written upon the wall of the temple, in letters of light, just above the proud, false, central figure, is the name "son of perdition." The man of sin is a Judas—a secret enemy while a seeming friend—a "familiar friend," yet a fatal foe who betrays with a kiss and a "hail, master!"

There are several features in this portrait which I must ask you specially to notice. Observe the place occupied by the man of sin—the "temple" or house of God. This is not, and cannot be, any Jewish temple. Paul, who uses this expressions in his prophetic portrait of Romanism, employs it both in Corinthians and Ephesians with reference to the Christian Church. In the second Epistle to the Corinthians, writing to Gentile Christians, he says, "Ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them." In Ephesians he calls the Church "a holy temple," a "habitation of God through the Spirit," and he would never have applied it to the Jewish temple, which, with all other Jewish things, he regarded as mere shadows of Christian realities. To Paul emphatically the temple of God was the Church of Christ. This is the temple in which his prophetic eye saw the man of sin seated. It is no question of his bodily location in any structure of wood and stone, but of something far higher. The temple of God is that "spiritual house" in which he dwells. It is built of "living stones," of true believers. It is here that the man of sin was to usurp the place of God. This is the "mystery," the dread danger, the deadly evil, predicted by the Apostle. It is no person in a temple of stone, but a power in the Christian Church.

Observe next the character of the man of sin. He is at once an imitation of Christ, and a contrast to him. He occupies his position, but is totally unlike him, and opposed to him. He has usurped his place and his prerogatives; but, so far from truly representing him, he represents his great enemy. As Christ acts for God, so the man of sin acts for Satan, who indeed produces him for this very purpose. His coming is "after the working of Satan." Christ and he are antagonistic powers: the power of light, and the power of darkness; the majesty of heaven, and the might of hell. And as the Son of God humbled himself, so the "man of sin" exalts himself. There is infinite self-abasement in the one, the Divine nature stooping to humanity; and infinite self-exaltation in the other, the human and satanic assuming to be Divine. Observe here that it is not asserted that the man of sin will say that he is God, but that he will show himself as such. The words are, "He as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God" or is Divine, or a Divine being (ανατειτονα εαυτον οτι εστι θεος). There is no article here before the name God. The expression indicates that the man of sin would show himself by acts and professions to be possessed of superhuman and Divine dignity, authority, and power.

Observe the position of the man of sin. Notice the word καθισαι, "sitteth," and connect with it καθεδρα, a seat, a word which occurs three times in the New Testament. It is used twice with reference to the seats in the temple of those who sold doves, who turned the house of God into a house of merchandise and den of thieves; and once in the sentence, "the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat." From καθεδρα comes "cathedral," the bishop's seat," and also the expression ex cathedra; as when we say the pope speaks ex cathedra, or from his seat, officially. There, in that exalted cathedral position, and claiming to represent God, the man of sin was to act and abide as the pretended vicar, but real antagonist, of Christ, undermining his authority, abolishing his laws, and oppressing his people. Observe the words, "who opposeth." It is possible effectually to oppose another without being his avowed antagonist: so the professions of the predicted power might be friendly, while his actions would be those of an opponent of the gospel of Christ.

We have said that the principles which were ultimately to produce the man of sin had already begun to operate in Paul's own day. His words are, "The mystery of iniquity doth already work;" and these principles would continue to work until the full development of the apostasy, and its final destruction at the second advent; that is, throughout the eighteen Christian centuries. The sphere of their operation therefore cannot be the Jewish temple, which was destroyed in the first century, but must needs be the professing Christian Church.

An important point in the prophecy is the existence in apostolic times of a certain restraining power, withholding while it lasted the manifestation of the man of sin. Paul, for good reasons, speaks of it in guarded language, as "he who letteth," or "that which hinders." What it was Paul knew, and the Thessalonians knew from him; "Remember ye not, that, when I was with you, I told you?" The early Church—from whom alone we can learn what Paul told them by word of mouth, but refrained from committing to writing—has left it on record that the Apostle had told them that this hindering power was the dominion of the Roman Cæsars; that while they continued to reign at Rome, the development of the predicted power of evil was impossible. Hence it would seem that Rome would be the seat of the man of sin. During the continuance of the Roman empire there was no opportunity for him to rise; he would only be manifested on its fall. While the Cæsars reigned he could not appear, but when they passed away he would succeed them.

Notice particularly that, just as the expression, "he that letteth," comprehends the line or succession of the Cæsars, so the expression, "he that sitteth," may well comprehend an analogous line or succession of rulers. Both expressions refer to dynasties, and not to individuals.

The distinctive names given by Paul to the great head of the apostasy are expressive of his character. They are the "man of sin," the "son of perdition," and "that wicked" (ο ανομος, the lawless one). First, it was to be to an extraordinary extent sinful itself, and the occasion of sin in others; secondly, it would be like Judas, and share his doom; and, thirdly, it would set at defiance all laws, whether human or Divine. It would be inspired by Satan, and, on account of its evil character and actions, it would be doomed to destruction; it would eventually "go to its own place"—the bottomless pit, from whence it emanated. Its doom was to fall in two stages: the Lord himself would consume it by the spirit of his mouth, and destroy it by the brightness of his epiphany, or advent in power and glory. There would be first extirpation, then a destruction. It would continue until the second coming of Christ—a statement which, as you will observe, involves the Lord's return before the millennium, since there can be no millennium under the reign of the man of sin, nor prior to his utter destruction.

Let us now compare this portrait of the man of sin drawn by the Apostle Paul with the portrait of the self-exalting power foretold by Daniel, which we studied last week. The comparison will demonstrate their identity.

1. Both are Roman. The self-exalting horn or head represented by Daniel is Rome; it belongs to the fourth or Roman empire. So also does Paul's man of sin, for the imperial government seated at Rome needed to be removed in order to make way for its rise and dominion. It was to be the successor of the Cæsars at Rome. They have the same geographical seat.

2. They have the same chronological point of origin: both arise on the fall of the old undivided empire of Rome. And they have the same chronological termination: Daniel's little horn perishes at the coming of the Son of Man in glory, and Paul's man of sin is destroyed at the epiphany.

3. Both exalt themselves against God. Daniel mentions the proud words of the blasphemous little horn, and Paul the audacious deeds of the man of sin, showing himself as Divine.

4. Both begin as small, inconspicuous powers, and develop gradually to very great and influential ones.

5. Both claim to be teachers of men. Daniel's little horn was to have eyes, as a bishop, or overseer (the meaning of the word bishop, επισκοπος, is overseer); and that he was to have a mouth, that is, that he was to be a teacher; while Paul assigns to the man of sin ecclesiastical eminence, a proud position in the temple of God, or Christian Church.

6. Both are persecutors. Daniel describes the little horn as a persecutor wearing out the saints, and Paul speaks of the man of sin as "opposing," and calls him "the lawless one."

To sum up. The two have the same place—Rome; the same period—from the sixth century to the second coming of the Lord in glory; the same wicked character, the same lawlessness, the same self-exalting defiance of God, the same gradual growth from weakness to dominion, the same episcopal pretensions, the same persecuting character, the same two-fold doom.

These resemblances are so important, so numerous, so comprehensive, and exact, as to prove beyond all question that the self-exalting, persecuting power predicted by Daniel and this man of sin foretold by Paul are one and the same power. Even Romanists admit this to be the case, and call the power thus doubly predicted the antichrist.

In the Douay Bible, with notes, issued under Roman authority, and bearing the signatures of Cardinals Wiseman and Manning, the "man of sin" is interpreted as follows: "'He sitteth in the temple of God,' etc. By all these words is described to us the great antichrist,.... according to the unquestionable authority and consent of the ancient Fathers." Rome allows thus that the "little horn" of Daniel and the "man of sin" of Paul foreshow one and the same power, and admits that power to be the antichrist.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

Married to a Drunkard.

A TRUE STORY.

She arose suddenly in the meeting, and spoke as follows:—

"Married to a drunkard! Yes I was married to a drunkard. Look at me! I am talking to the girls."

We all turned and looked at her. She was a wan woman, with dark, sad eyes, and white hair, placed smoothly over a brow that denoted intellect.

"When I married a drunkard, I reached the acme of misery," she continued, "I was young, and oh, so happy! I married the man I loved, and who professed to love me. He was a drunkard and I knew it—knew it, but did not understand it. There is not a young girl in this building that does understand it, unless she has a drunkard in her family; then, perhaps, she knows how deeply the iron enters the soul of a woman when she loves, and is allied to a drunkard, whether father, husband, brother or son. Girls, believe me when I tell you that to marry a drunkard, to love a drunkard is the crown of all misery. I have gone through the deep waters, and know. I have gained that fearful knowledge at the expense of happiness, sanity, almost life itself. Do you wonder my hair is white? It turned white in a night—'bleached by sorrow,' as Marie Antoinette said of her hair. I am not forty years old, yet the snows of seventy rest upon my head; and upon my heart—ah! I cannot begin to count the wisdom resting there," she said with unutterable pathos in her voice.

"My husband was a professional man. His calling took him from home frequently at night, and when he returned he returned drunk. Gradually he gave way to temptation in the day, until he was rarely sober. I had two lovely little girls and a boy." Here her voice faltered, and we sat in deep silence listening to her story. "My husband had been drinking deeply. I had not seen him for two days. He had kept away from his home. One night I was seated beside my sick boy; the two little girls were in bed in the next room, while beyond, was another room into which I heard my husband go, as he entered the house. That room communicated with the one in which my little girls were sleeping. I do not know why, but a feeling of terror suddenly took possession of me, and I felt that my little girls were in danger. I arose and went to the room. The door was locked. I knocked on it frantically, but no answer came. I seemed to be endowed with super-human strength, and, throwing myself with all my force against the door, the lock gave way, and the door flew open. Oh, the sight! the terrible sight!" she wailed out in a voice that haunts me now; and she covered her face with her hands, and when she removed them, it was whiter and sadder than ever.

"Delirium-tremens! You have never seen it, girls; God grant you never may. My husband stood beside the bed, his eyes glaring with insanity, and in his hand a large knife. 'Take them away,' he screamed. 'The horrible things, they are crawling all over me. Take them away, I say!' and he flourished the knife in the air. Regardless of danger, I rushed up to the bed, and my heart seemed suddenly to cease beating. There lay my two children, covered with their life-blood, slain by their own father! For a moment I could not utter a sound. I was literally dumb in the presence of this terrible sorrow. I scarcely heeded the maniac at my side—the man who had wrought me all this woe. Then I uttered a loud scream, and my wailings filled the air. The servants heard me and hastened to the room, and when my husband saw them, he suddenly drew the knife across his own throat. I know nothing more. I was borne senseless from the room that contained my slaughtered children and the body of my husband. The next day my hair was white, and my mind so shattered that I knew no one."

She ceased! Our eyes were riveted upon her wan face, and some of the women present sobbed aloud, while there was scarcely a dry eye in that temperance meeting. So much sorrow, we thought, and through no fault of her own. We saw that she had not done speaking, and was only waiting to subdue her emotion to resume her story.

"Two years," she continued, "I was a mental wreck, then I recovered from the shock, and absorbed myself in the care of my boy. But the sin of the father was visited upon the child, and six months ago my boy of eighteen was placed in a drunkard's grave; and as I, his loving mother, stood and saw the sod heaped over him, I said, 'Thank God! I'd rather see him there than have him live a drunkard;' and I turned unto my desolate home a childless woman—one on whom the hand of God had rested heavily.

"Girls, it is you I wish to rescue from the fate that overtook me. Do not blast your life as I blasted mine; do not be drawn into the madness of marrying a drunkard. You love him! So much the worse for you, for married to him, the greater will be your misery because of your love. You will marry him and then reform him, so you say. Ah! a woman sadly overrates her strength when she undertakes to do this. You are no match for the giant demon, 'drink,' when he possesses a man's body and soul. You are no match for him, I say. What is your puny strength beside his gigantic force? He will crush you too. It is to save you, girls, from the sorrows that wrecked my happiness that I have unfolded my history to you. I am a stranger in this great city. I am merely passing through it; and I have a message to bear to every girl in America—never marry a drunkard!"

I can see her now, as she stood there amid the hushed audience, her dark eyes glowing, and her frame quivering with emotion, as she uttered her impassioned appeal. Then she hurried out and we never saw her again. Her words, "fitly spoken," were not without effect, however, and because of them there is one girl single now.—Alice Randolph.

The Gathering of the Nations; or, the Judgment of the Sheep and the Goats.—Matt. xxv. 31-46.—No. 1.

There is a wide difference of opinion in the interpretation of this remarkable passage, confined, however, chiefly to two classes of interpreters,—pre-millennial and post-millennial,—the former regarding it as descriptive of the judgment of the living prior to the thousand years' reign of Christ and his saints, and the latter regarding it as the general judgment of the living and the dead, of all ages, at the end of that reign and the winding up of all human history. We believe the pre-millennial view is the one which preserves the unity of Bible teaching on this subject.

This gathering is when the Son of man comes again; it is after those who sleep in Jesus have been raised, and those of his church, his elect, who are alive, are caught up into the clouds; for when he comes in his glory, they come with him as well as the holy angels, as other passages plainly teach. And it is in the interval between the resurrection of the holy dead and the Lord's coming to the earth, when the beast and the false prophet are having a false triumph, and persecuting those who refuse to worship the beast, that those whom the Savior calls his brethren suffer affliction, and the righteous succor them; then when he comes, the righteous are rewarded by being made inheritors of the kingdom; all showing that this is descriptive of a scene that takes place previous to the thousand years and not after, and that it concerns the then living and not the dead.

During the millennium Christ's brethren are in the kingdom, whatever may be the position they occupy; hence they are neither hungry, nor thirsty, nor naked, nor sick, nor in prison. This is further evidence that this gathering of the nations is before the thousand years, when his brethren who have suffered are before him, and when they who have ministered unto them are also before him; for it would be incongruous to suppose that this could represent a scene at the great white throne judgment of the dead, after they have dwelt with Christ in the kingdom for a thousand years. He says nothing here concerning the dead.

To interpret this passage so as to include the judgment of the dead, would be bringing a meaning to it which is not in it. There is no reference in it to the resurrection. It is when Christ comes to take the kingdom that there is the gathering of the nations, and it is not till the end of the thousand years' reign that the general resurrection takes place, and the wicked dead are judged. We are not, therefore, to include in this gathering the unnumbered millions who have previously lived and died, but those who are alive at the time of his coming. The dead are never called the nations. The dead are destitute of all those things which would constitute them nations.

This phrase, the nations, means the living peoples of the earth. The same phrase is used in Joel iii. 11–13, and means the same as it does here. "Haste ye, and come, all ye nations round about, and gather yourselves together; thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord. Let the nations bestir themselves, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat: for there will I sit to judge all the nations round about. Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe; come, tread ye, for the winepress is full, their fate overflow, for their wickedness is great." No reference is made in this passage to the judgment of the dead. In the sense of the living peoples of the earth, this phrase, the nations, when used elsewhere, is always understood; and it would be so understood in Matt. xxv. were not the plain grammatical sense of the passage against a mere human theory of the judgment now very widely accepted. But the passage is perverted to make it suit a preconceived view. It is shown by learned critics that the word here rendered nations means living nations, Gentile or heathen nations.

Further, the usage of Scripture is overlooked in concluding the universality of this judgment from the word all,—all the nations. This word sometimes denotes a great many, not literally every individual. Paul says to Timothy, "This thou knowest, that all that are in Asia turned away from me, of whom are Phygelus and Hermogenes." 2 Tim. i. 15. This seems to be spoken in reference to a certain period when the apostle was in Rome, and "the all must of course apply," says Dean Alford, "to all of whom the apostle had had trial." In the Gospel of John, iii. 26, we read, "And they came unto John, and said to him, Rabbi, he that was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou hast borne witness, behold, the same baptiseth, and all men come to him." This cannot mean all men universally, but a large number. Other similar instances of the use of this word might be given. See Exod. ix. 6; 1 Chron. xiv. 17; Zeph. ii. 11; Matt. iii. 5; xxi. 26. There are so many instances in Scripture in which the word all is used in a limited sense, that before it is unduly pressed in this place, we should consider the scope of Scripture teaching on this point. Every one conversant with Scripture, and who is guided in his judgment by the tenor of Scripture, will see that this term, all the nations, does not only not include the dead of previous ages, but not every person even of the living nations. It cannot include the vast multitude of little children and others who will be incapable of being judged by the test named in the passage.

And just here it will help our understanding of the passage to strengthen the remarks we have already made, if we consider this test. The test applied in this judgment in discriminating between the sheep and the goats, or the righteous and the wicked, is one that will not admit of universal application. See how it will apply to the dead of past ages. For thousands and thousands of years past the great majority of the race that have died, have died in a state of heathen darkness. It is impossible that this test can be applicable to them. Though we admit, and rejoice to admit, that those among the heathen who have never heard of Christ, who according to their light have feared God and worked righteousness, will be accepted of him, Scripture does not warrant us to conclude that any who have died without a knowledge of Christ, will be exalted to the high honor of inheriting the kingdom, and therefore, being joint-rulers with Christ. But the righteous in the passage who care for Christ's brethren, will be inheritors of the kingdom; not subjects of it, but rulers in it. The God-fearing heathen of past ages will be saved, but we cannot, if we would preserve the harmony of Holy Scripture, suppose that they will be saved so high up as the body of sanctified believers, the elect race, the royal priesthood. And if none of Christ's co-rulers are to be found among those who have died in total ignorance of Christ—and how can they be?—this test cannot be applied to them; and therefore this gathering and judgment is of the then living when the Son of man comes, and not of the dead of by-gone ages. There have passed away unnumbered millions of the race whose character could not be judged by the principle laid down in this notable passage in Matthew.

UNTURNING.

Three things never come again:
Snow may vanish from the plain,
Blossoms from the dewy sod,
Verdure from the broken clod,
Water from the river's bed,
Forests from the mountain's head,
Night may brighten into day,
Noon in midnight fade away.
Yet the snow shall come once more
When the winter tempests roar.
Blossoms each returning spring
In her laden arms shall bring,
Grass be green where ploughshares run,
Rivers flash in autumn's sun,
Time shall bid the forests grow,
Noon and midnight come and go,
But though all thy soul complain,
Three things shall not come again.

Never to the bow that bends
Comes the arrow that it sends;
Spent in space, its airy flight,
Vanishes like lost delight.
When with rapid aim it sprang
From the bowstring's shivering twang
Straight to brain or heart it fled,
Once for all its course was sped.
No wild wail upon its track
Brings the barb of vengeance back.
Hold thy hand before it go;
Pause beside the bended bow;
Hurtled once across the plain,
No spent arrow comes again.

Never comes the chance that passed:
That one moment was its last,
Though thy life upon it hung,
Though thy death beneath it swung,
If thy future all the way
Now in darkness goes astray.
When the instant born of fate
Passes through the golden gate;
When the hour, but not the man,
Comes and goes from nature's plan;
Never more its countenance
Beams upon thy slow advance.
Never more that time shall be
Burden nearer unto thee.
Weep and search o'er land and main,
Lost chance never comes again.

Never shall thy spoken word
Be again unsaid, unheard.
Well it, work the utterance wrought,
Woe or weal, whate'er it brought;
Once for all the runes is read,
Once for all the judgment said.
Though it pierced a poisoned spear
Through the soul thou holdest dear,
Though it quiver fierce and deep,
Through some stainless spirit's sleep;
Idle, vain, the flying string
That a passing rage might bring.
Speech shall give it fangs of steel,
Utterance all its barb reveal.

Give thy tears of blood and fire;
Pray with pangs of mad desire;
Offer life, and soul, and all,
That one sentence to recall,
Wrestle with its fatal wrath,
Chase with dying feet its path,
Rue it all thy lingering days,
Hide it deep with love and praise;
Once for all thy word is sped,
None invade it but the dead.
All thy travail will be vain—
Spoken words come not again!

Dear Restitution:

After so long a time since seeing any word from California, I will write a few words to let the eastern brethren and sisters know that we are still alive and laboring for the Master. During the latter part of May Brother James G. Ledford of Monrovia, Los Angeles Co., and Brother J. M Gallahorn of Yuba City, Sutter Co., Cal., held a series of meetings at Meridian in Sutter Co., under the name of "the holiness meetings," and advocating the "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," Acts iii. 21, and a hearty belief in the word, John iii. 16, and repentance as being essential to the forgiveness of sins. 2 Peter iii. 9. And believe in baptism as being one of the divine commands, Acts ii. 38, and that by immersion or burial in water, Rom. vi. 4, thus being a similie of Christ's burial and resurrection, same verse, and by living continually a holy life, 1 Peter i. 15, and doing the Lord's commandments, and they are not grievous, 1 John v. 3, together with other kindred truths. As a result of their labors, twelve persons came out and endorsed these teachings of the Bible, and are now rejoicing in the hope of a reward of eternal life. Some of these persons had been baptized by sprinkling in the pedobaptist churches, and in studying the Scriptures found that a belief and repentance were necessary before baptism, so they were dissatisfied on that point, and in many other things they found themselves wanting, but have now got out of the meshes of the pedobaptist churches, and have our Lord Jesus for their leader and standard. There were already some others at this place who had come out of darkness into the light a year or two before, and now there are I think about three or four candidates that are waiting for Brother Ledford to come back to immerse them.

Praise the Lord for this great work of redemption. Hallelujah! what a Savior to come to save such sinners as us. Well may we rejoice after having our sins blotted out. Dear brethren, we have much encouragement with the knowledge of our sins forgiven, and of having been translated out of darkness into light, and of having been made partakers of the heavenly calling, but we have much need of prayer, if not I pray the Lord to give us more strength and courage, in order that we may not be found wanting. I praise the Lord for his love toward me, and for showing wherein I was in darkness, and bringing me into the light through the instrumentality of Bros. Ledford and Gallahorn. May their labors be crowned with success wherever they may go.

Brother Gallahorn has preached the gospel in Indiana, and, it is wonderful to relate, has never heard of the Church of God anywhere there, not even anywhere else until he saw me in Sutter Co. But from the description I gave of them he claimed them for his people, all out and out; that was his answer I believe. I forwarded a lot of last year's RESTITUTIONS and have ordered the paper to his address for three months and hope the seed thus sown may fall in good ground. I do pray that none of the brothers or sisters will ever backslide, and when they or any of the eastern brothers or sisters pray, pray that I may never go into the ways of the world again, but that we may all be faithful unto the end or death. Let us be up and have our lamps trimmed and burning, so that when the Savior comes we shall not be asleep, or found wanting.

It has been a long time since I read anything on the subject of holiness or a holy life in THE RESTITUTION. I think too much time and thought is given to other subjects. There ought to be at the least two or three short articles each week, and more if there is room for them, directly on the ways of life we should live. If I can write anything on the subject that will enlighten any one I will do it, and if I make any mistakes—well walk until I make one and then correct me. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, amen.

MELVIN S. CORBALEY.

NATURE UNENDING.

We have never seen a finer argument for the perpetuity of the earth, and sun, and moon than the following. It is the whole thing in a nutshell.—It is scriptural and logical. Indeed, it is conclusive. "The earth abideth forever," is the testimony of inspiration. From the Bible we learn a fact for science—that the sun has endless duration. This is founded on Ps. lxxii. 5, 7, 17; and lxxxix. 3, 4, 28, 29, 35, 37.

It is predicted by Christ, of his throne and of his people, that each shall continue forever, as long as the sun and moon endure. There would be no force in the parallel if the sun were to exist for a less period than is affirmed of Christ, his throne, and his people. The sun is declared to be a witness forever in the heavens of the covenant of God to his Son, and to the redeemed for their unending existence. The witness must be contemporaneous and coterminous with the covenant. The covenant exists so long as the subject continues. But the subject continues to endless duration. The witnesses must be of concurrent perpetuity. Therefore the witnesses, the sun and moon, have endless duration.

By parity of reasoning, the solar system has a like unending duration; for the superior, the sun, controls and carries the inferior. I believe this argument is as logical as it is biblical.

The Spartan's Wreath of Triumph.

"There was an old law among the ancient Spartans that forbade any but one who had been crowned at the athletic games to stand beside their king in front rank in the day of battle. A youth entered at the games one day, and was disciplining himself carefully for the struggle. Large sums were offered him if he would withdraw, but he scorned them all. The day of trial came, and to him it was a day of triumph, as he anticipated. His perseverance was rewarded, and the crown of victory was his. When he received it, it was only a wreath of green parsley and bay-leaves. A friend near him remarked that, and asked him what he thought of it. 'I look not on it,' was the reply, 'but because of it I can stand by my king in the van!' That is one of the greatest honors and rewards that Christ, the King of glory, gives to his servants, that they may stand by him in the van during the fight with sin and Satan; and is it not a high position to occupy, honorable to ourselves and helpful to our fellows?

The Coming Age—In Nature and Prophecy. By J. F. Weather.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a steadfast and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, round in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads it 540 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $3.00 Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled, as we have received an invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. ## ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or enslaved the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The political policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth limp, 192 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 25 cents.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS { One Year . . $1.00. Six Months . . .50. Three Months . . .25.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 13.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE POST-TERTIARY OR QUARTERNARY AGE.—CONTINUED

OF THE ABRAHAMIC PROMISE.

In carrying out the specific design of the present and the succeeding ages, God made certain promises to Abraham which have formed a nucleus around which cluster all the facts of Jewish history, and that have stood as a basis of faith from that time to the present. Few persons are aware that any such promises were ever made, and a still less number weigh their import sufficiently to find that these promises, or any of them, can in any way affect themselves, yet they are so intimately interwoven with the present and future age-work of the Creator, and of such wonderful importance to his co-laborers in the full development of those periods that he, "willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it (the promise) by an oath."....."For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself, saying, Surely, blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And, so, after he had patiently endured he obtained the promise." Heb. vi. As has just been stated this promise was confirmed by an oath "that by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us: which hope we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and stedfast."

Since then it stands as the one hope, this promise is doubtless worthy of a critical examination, that we may be profited thereby, "even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness," Gal. iii. 6; and "that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham," Ib; and again, "the Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all the nations be blessed. So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." Gal. vi. 7–9. From the letter to the Romans we read that "the promise that he should be the heir of the world was not to Abraham or to his seed by the law, but through the righteousness of faith." iv. 13. By reference to the first record of these promises we will see that "The Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee; and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing; and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xii. 1–3. In obedience to the divine commandment he came to Sichem unto the plain of Moreh in the land of Canaan where the Lord repeated the promise, "Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord who appeared unto him." Ib. xii. 7. "And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it and to thy seed forever; and I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee." Gen. xiii. 14–17. "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them; and he said unto him, so shall thy seed be. And he believed the Lord and he counted it to him for righteousness." Ibid xv. 6. "In that same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." Ib. v. 18. "As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations," (the fact of the change of his name is then stated and the language of the promise continues), "and I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession: and I will be their God." After his offering on Mount Moriah, where Isaac's life was miraculously spared "the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time and said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies: and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice." Gen. xxii. 15–18

From the foregoing quotations we may readily observe that the promises made to Abraham were:

1. An inheritance of land,—a portion of the earth.

2. An innumerable progeny, or seed.

3. A rulership over the nations of the earth.

4. The blessing of the nations through that rule.

We have also seen that Paul calls this promise the gospel, (good news) of the age; and as such it embraces all that pertains to that message in all its relations to the human family. It is called the gospel of the kingdom of God," and is synonymous with "the promise" of the kingdom of God, since the words "the gospel" and "the promise" apply to like conditions, relations, objects and events. "The promise," therefore, grasps the "one hope," and "one faith," for which Jude exhorts the sanctified ones to "earnestly contend;" the obedience so essential to an adoption into the household of God's obedient, faithful co-workers, and the subsequent formation of character such as is necessary to insure a resurrection from among the dead; all of which is introductory to its full fruition in the age to come.

To Abraham and to his seed were the promises made, and Paul's commentary is, that, "He saith not, And to seeds as of many, but as of one; and to thy seed which is Christ." Gal. iii. 16. After explaining the relative effect and force of the law, and of "the promise," illustrating his explanation by the pedagogue, he continues, "For ye are all the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to "the promise." Gal. iii. 24–29.

It may not be unprofitable to trace "the promise" somewhat farther before leaving the subject. Paul's testimony in his defense before Agrippa was, "Now I stand and am judged for the hope of 'the promise' made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise, our twelve tribes instantly serving God night and day, hope to come." Acts xxvi. 6, 7. Peter, on the day of Pentecost, answered the multitudes who enquired, "Men and brethren, what shall we do? by saying, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, for 'the promise' is unto you and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." Acts ii. 37–39. He also told the Jews, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying, unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Ib. iii. 25. It has been said heretofore that "the promise" was one for the possession of a landed inheritance, and this is true; hence the force and aptness of such passages in the inspired word as, "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth." Matt. v. 5 "Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." Prov. xi. 31. "And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus; that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness towards us in Christ Jesus." Ephes. ii. 6, 7. "He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron." Rev. ii. 26, 27. "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us unto God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v. 9, 10. "And the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii. 27.

Abraham became the heir of the world through the righteousness of faith, and Jesus Christ—his seed—inherits the same, through his obedience to God, even unto death, yet neither Abraham nor his seed have come into possession of their promised inheritance. Of the former's claim it is written, "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred and come into the land which I will show thee. Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran, and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell, and he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on; yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child." Acts vii. 2–5 "These all (the long list of worthies mentioned with Abraham and Sarah, his wife) having obtained a good report through faith received not the promise; God having provided some better things for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise." Heb. xi 9. Of the latter is recorded, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another." Matt. xxv. 31, 32. "Jesus answered, my kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." Let it be remembered however, that God's oath is pledged for the fulfilment of the deferred expectation. The promise must and will be fulfilled in all its fulness, and for this object the succeeding age (the world to come) has been revealed to us as the purpose of the all-wise Creator.

The resurrection of the dead becomes at once a necessity, for if Abraham falls of a resurrection to life, the promise to him as "heir of the world," also is a failure, even as the non-resurrection of Christ would have caused the destruction of the base of Christian faith and hope, and left the future age (the kingdom of God) without him as their federal head. The resurrection of the Christ is an assurance of the resurrection of him to whom the promises were made primarily; and with him all those who, through the Christ are engrafted into the Abrahamic stock, and who bear the Abrahamic faith in, and conformity of life to the God-work of the ages. The resurrection of the dead and "the promise" mingle and blend together in harmonious parallelism, so that their separation is impossible; and the resurrection of the Christ to "the power of an endless life" gives a prophecy of the plane of life in the future or Theozoic Age, as certainly as the tiny mammal (Dromatherium Sylvestre) of the Mesozoic, gave promise of the type of mammalian life in the Tertiary age that followed, or as did the Tertiary man foretell the predominating form of the Post-tertiary fauna.

ON A MISSION TO THE LAND OF MY FATHERS.

Thankful and unspeakably glad for having visited Bethlehem, and realized that for the first time in our lives we were on the soil somewhere near the spot where the Redeemer was born, we continued our journey to the Jordan, so familiar to every Bible student. The landscapes all round Bethlehem are most charming. For the first hour from the city the eye constantly rests on objects of beauty, majesty, and even wonder. Soon, however, we leave the lovely fields and orchards, and pass into rough, rugged, and somewhat dangerous territory. On, on we go, and now everything that meets the eye is unutterably wild. Now and then a fierce-looking Arab, swiftly riding on a camel, with long spear at his side, is passing, salutes us with a salaam, and our Bedouin guide and Ibrahim quickly respond, 'Uvalkom salaam" ("And unto you be peace.")

The heat of the sun gets more and more intense, the air more oppressive; and, for our encouragement, we are informed by Ibrahim that we shall find the atmosphere and journey more inconvenient the farther we go.

The journey now is a constant ascent and descent of tremendous rocky mountains. Some parts are so precipitous that every moment we expect to fall, not to rise again. Ibrahim, however, laughingly encourages us. "Don't fear, M. Englishman, English are brave, and fear not." What else could we do, but muster up courage and exhibit the fearlessness of an Englishman, although in the person of a native of Russia? With courage we never suspected to have possessed we at last arrived at Mar Saba, a convent of marvellous architectural skill, and of considerable interest. This convent stands on the edge of the gorge of Kedron. It occupies the mountainous cliff between the two channels, and looks down a precipice of six hundred feet. Many portions of this great edifice are constructed in chambers cut out of the mountain side. Irregular masses of walls, towers, chambers, and chapels, are perched upon rock terraces that cling to the rock side of the precipice, and are supported by huge flying buttresses.

In the exterior construction of the convent every advantage has been taken of natural caves and some artificial ones hewn out of the mountains, some probably before the Christian era. Here none can enter without a special permit from the patriarch in Jerusalem, and as we were favored with the desired "permit" we boldly rang the bell, and intimated our desire to remain there the night. The massive gate, the only entrance, was soon after open to us. A monk conducted us to our room. Here Bedouins and ladies are not permitted to enter. The monks number about sixty, all of them being under the vow of humility, chastity, and poverty. These, being of the Greek order, wear their conspicuous high black caps. Conversation is very pleasant, but, alas! exhibits great ignorance. After refreshing ourselves and resting after the fatiguing journey, an obliging monk conducted us through this most remarkable convent. Its position and architecture, and the wild and majestic scenery, are impossible to depict. No word-painting of the most eloquent speaker or writer could possibly describe this place—doubtless the most wonderful in the world. Being conducted round the obliging monk took special delight in describing to us the sacredness of the place and the religious duties of its inmates. After a good night's rest, we rose at four o'clock in the morning, and prepared for the continuance of our journey to the Dead Sea and Jordan.

The journey, once begun, continues more weary and fatiguing. The road is rough, and the whole task almost exhausting, but it richly repays the undertaking, although to the nervous traveller there will be probably no journey in the world more trying. While we pass through scenery weird and wild, and very near the edge of an awful chasm, we are thankful for the sure-footed mules on which we ride. We cross Kedron, and we then have a hard task of a long and miserably tedious ascent. Knowing that the view from the top must be most inspiring, we rest a little before reaching the summit, so that we may be more fresh and able to appreciate the scenery. After resting we again started, and soon reached the top, when a most magnificent and awe-inspiring view burst upon our sight as we beheld the great wilderness of Kogedi; and as the eye rested on this wilderness we were reminded of David's refuge from Saul, and then finding Saul in a cave, 1 Samuel xxiii. 29, and xxiv. Starting on another descent, every step seems dangerous, yet the cheerfulness of Ibrahim and song of our Bedouin break the monotony of the journey and stillness of the air.

We passed through the Valley of Fire, still continuing the wild winding roads. Our attention is called to the minaret on the summit of the mountain, and there we are informed by our Bedouin is the tomb of Moses.

Having politely replied that we could not believe in this Mohammedan tradition, our Bedouin became very earnest, and aware by the beard of the Prophet that the remains of Moses rest there, and that thither the faithful Moslems annually go on a pilgrimage.

Our eyes next rest on most interesting scenery. Close by us we gaze upon the Dead Sea, and not very far off is Jordan. The atmosphere being wonderfully clear, we behold objects over an area of about one hundred miles. How interesting to look across, and behold the plain of Moab and its mountains. We are reminded of Deut. xxxiv, "And Moses went up from the plain of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, that is over against Jericho." As the majestic view is before us, we open again our Bibles and linger still more as we read the strange and wonderful life of Moses—and we are thrilled as we read, "So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord. And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Bethpeor: but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." We look on Moab and its mountains and are awed with the picturesqueness of the view. Mrs. Alexander's poem seems more realistic than it ever before felt—

"By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale of the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave.

"And lonely grave in Moab's land,
O dark Bethpeor's hill,
Speak to these curious hearts of ours,
And teach them to be still."

With such feelings we continued until we found ourselves at the world's wonder—the Dead Sea.

What thoughts are associated with this place! Why is it called Dead Sea? If no other answer were given, the surroundings here would justify the name. The calm sea has no living thing in it. The soil for about an hour and a-half or two hours' travel is barren. A most unnatural gloom overhangs the entire region—no living thing in the water, and only now and then some birds flying across. Here we bathe and enjoy our swim in the intensely salt water. In endeavoring to swim, the splashing of the water finds its way into our mouths and eyes. And what a strange sensation after bathing in this memorable sea! We rest and refresh ourselves with some bread and wine, and then walk round for a little while. By the side of the sea we think of Lot, to whom this sea and the surrounding scenery was an attraction; and of the fact that he, therefore, settled in this region. We think of the five cities on the plains here, of the inhabitants that sinned against God, and of the destruction that overtook them. We here read with great interest Genesis xix. Round about here the eye often rests upon the extraordinary salt hills and salt pillars, and we are reminded of Lot's wife. Here Numbers xxxiv. 2–12 is no longer a dry description of Holy Writ.

This sea was a border line of Judah, Joshua xv. 1–5.

How thrilling a picture the prophetic words of Ezek. xlvii. 6–12, as we read them by the side of the mysterious cave, to which, doubtless, the prophet referred.

The solemnity of our meditation was somewhat interrupted, when we quietly interested ourselves in watching some of our party trying to swim in the strangely buoyant water. Our courageous bathers could not possibly prevent their feet flying upwards, although they tried hard to keep them under water. The tormenting heat of the merciless sun made it somewhat too uncomfortable to remain here much longer. We, therefore, took again to our accustomed saddles, and our good-natured mules soon enabled us to turn our backs to the Dead Sea. Our previous bathing in the intensely salt sea made us feel rather uncomfortable. Our skin seemed as if enriched and irritated with Pharaoh's third plague. Under the circumstances we hurried with all the speed our animals could take us until we arrived—at Jordan.

At once we hasten to the supposed part of the river where our Lord was baptized. Here we bathe, and with what delight! Here, after bathing, we sit for a considerable time and enjoy rest. The inconvenience of salt sea water soon passes away after bathing in Jordan.

Here, as we rested, we made the acquaintance of a French and German speaking traveller. After some conversation, with my Bible in hand, being in so impressive a place, our thoughts naturally are directed to the historical and Scriptural associations of the spot. My German-speaking companion for the time being, informs me that he is a Protestant, and takes care to impress upon me the fact of his disbelief in all superstitions and mere legends of Christians, Moslems, and Jews. I am delighted to feel I am in the company of a Protestant. Soon, however, I discovered, with a regret, that Protestant with him implies a different thing to what I expected.

In conversation I remark, "How did you enjoy bathing in the memorable and most interesting Jordan?"

"After some hesitation, he replies: "By the bye, do we not read about Jordan in the Bible?'

"Yes, certainly!'

"I thought so also," remarks my foreign acquaintance.

"Do you not remember reading of the great Jewish Baptist baptising in Jordan? and do you not remember that here in one day three thousand were baptized?"

"Certainly! certainly! I remember all about it," is the reply. I was astonished when he remarked, "Was not Spurgeon a most wonderfully strong man to have baptized three thousand in one day!" I smiled, and could not help laughing inwardly at the statement. I endeavored to assure him that Spurgeon did not baptize the thousands mentioned, but my companion declared that I could not be correct in my knowledge of history. As he was certain that Spurgeon was the great Baptist Apostle. I tried hard to persuade him that the apostle by the name he mentioned had never yet visited that country, and has not seen Jordan. "Oh!" said he, "I don't mean the Spurgeon you mean." I assured him that Spurgeon was still alive, and that I had the honor of knowing him and members of his family, and was a student in the College of which he is President; but for a long time all my speaking seemed of no avail. I read to him Matt. iii., Mark i., and spoke to him about John the Baptist. My friend, however, was incredulous; he could not accept the name of John nor Peter, as he had no recollection of it; but the former name was well known to him. I found in a more lengthy conversation the cause of that gentleman's error. Although nominally a Protestant, yet to him the meaning of the word Protestant implied only protesting against every religion! Therefore, alas! his ignorance. Yet the association of the name of the beloved pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle was a mystery to me. The cause of it, I was anxious to discover. I learned, however, that my fellow traveller had in years past read sermons in German of the great Baptist preacher, and, being ignorant of Scripture truth, in error reading the sacred volume on the story of the great baptism doubtless learned in childhood, with a confused mind associated the events of two thousand years ago with the life of the President of the Pastor's College—name of world-wide renown.

After some rest we gently walked about here, and innumerable incidents from Old and New Testament Scriptures clustered round, and the memory was burdened with recollections of narratives we had learned from infancy. How realistic here, when thinking of Israel crossing the river! We thought of Jacob, who, with his staff, crossed Jordan. We thought of Absalom, and others whose names are so closely connected with this Jordan. We thought of Elijah, who—a master of Israel with burning zeal—took hold of his mantle and smote the rushing river and crossed, 2 Kings ii. We thought also of Elisha, as, with his master's and predecessor's mantle, he also smote the river and made a dry passage for himself. We thought, too, of the great Syrian captain, who was cured by washing in Jordan, 2 Kings v. We also read and thought of Matthew iii. 5, 6, 13, 17, and many other passages making this Jordan so memorable.

After lingering and resting at Jordan, we again took our saddles and were on our onward journey towards Jericho. A good hour's ride brought us to the Valley of Achor. The memories of Joshua and Israel after their defeat at Ai were very forcibly brought to mind as we thought that here Achan and his miserable family were stoned to death. We read the stern words of Joshua, "Why hast thou troubled us? the Lord shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones. Wherefore the name of that place was called the Valley of Achor"—i. e., trouble, Joshua vii. 24–26.

Still onward we kept, and we came to Er-Riha, a small village, the houses consisting of miserable mud hovels. This village is a true picture of wretchedness and abomination. The people, like their homes, are filthy. The awful stench was enough to breathe of pestilence for miles round. And yet, filth seems a second nature to the people in Er-Riha. Although the place is so wretched and the people dangerous thieves, we nevertheless determined to have a good view of the spot.—Isaac Levinsohn, in Jewish Herald.

Active Piety.

The stoutest timber stands on Norwegian rocks, where tempests rage, and the long, hard winters reign. The muscles are seen most fully developed in the brawny arm that plies the blacksmith's hammer. Even so the most vigorous and healthy piety is that which is the busiest, which has difficulties to battle with, which has its hands full of good works, which has neither time nor room for evil, but, aiming at great things, both for God and man, promptly and summarily dismisses temptations with Nehemiah's answer: "I have a great work to do, therefore I cannot come down."

The second quarterly meeting of the A. C. Conference of Michigan will be held with the church at Hesperia, Oceana Co., commencing Friday evening, August 17th, 1888, and holding over Sunday. Teams will meet the morning trains at Fremont, Friday, the day the meeting commences. Fremont is twelve miles from Hesperia situated on the Chicago & West Mich. R. R. between Big Rapids and Muskegon. Those going by way of Big Rapids will have to stay in Big Rapids or Fremont Thursday night. Let us all come to the meeting with hearts full to overflowing with the love of God and make this meeting one long to be remembered on account of the power of God with us. A. L. FOX, Pres.

In our article last week on the "Ancients and the Future State," for the word dicore read dicse; for guadia read guadio, and in the next column for Angels read Angles, the name of a tribe settled in Britain.

---

Two letters relating to the same subject have come to hand, one of which was written by Sr. H. V. Reed and the other by Bro. Thomas Wilson. We desire to express our sincere thanks to both writers for their kind letters, as they will prove of value to us hereafter.

---

Bro. C. H. Jones presented us with a pamphlet published by himself containing a lecture delivered at Chatauqua on The Great Pyramid—Its Teaching to us as a People. It brings out some of the more important problems connected with that "Wonder of the World" in a very striking manner.

---

We are glad to inform all our friends that our health has improved so much that we have resumed filling our appointments, and hope to perfectly recover that degree of strength that we enjoyed before our late attack. We thank our friends for their sympathies, whether personally expressed, or through kind notes as printed in the present number.

---

In all our intercourse with all persons connected with the religious denominations of our day, who professedly take the Bible for authority in matters of faith and practice, let us be very kind, careful, and forbearing in presenting to them, for their careful, and prayerful consideration those important doctrines, that to a very great extent, characterize us, as a people, in our own religious belief. There is no call for treating either people, or their cherished doctrines even if erroneous, with contempt, ridicule, or the language of harsh invective. If truth, presented in its beautifully revealed simplicity, will not carry conviction to the minds of our friends, we certainly gain nothing by incurring their disgust and imbittered opposition to those truths and ourselves, by an unwarranted harshness and roughness in our style of presenting our belief. Let us present the truth in love, and leave all results, as to its reception, with God. God has not said "He successful," but "Be faithful." "Hold forth the word of life" is the direction. Let us do this as faithful ministers of the gospel of the grace of God.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

DR. ADOLPH SAPHIR.

This celebrated writer is of Jewish parentage. He was born in Pesth, Hungary about fifty-seven years ago. To influence the minds of his Jewish brethren he wrote a series of tracts in German, which were subsequently translated into English, Dutch, Hebrew, and the Jewish-German dialect, and in these languages these tracts have been extensively circulated. The subjoined will give an idea of his application of prophecy to his own people. "His references to his own people Israel are always honest, tender, and dignified. He holds that, for a period, namely during the Times of the Gentiles, Israel was to be rejected, the kingdom to be taken from them until they shall say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," until Jesus restore unto Israel the kingdom, and the inscription written over his cross shall be fulfilled in the sight of all the nations. That the interval between Christ's first and second Coming was a period for the most part ignored by the Old Testament prophets, who beheld two mountain tops, between which in reality many and long valleys and plains interposed, in such close proximity that they describe them as if they were one, though between them lay the period during which from among the Gentiles the Church, the Bride of Christ, would be gathered."

PREMONITORY WARNINGS.

For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumbering upon the bed; then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction, Job xxxiii. 14-16.

Mr. William Birch delivered his 775th Sermon in Free Trade Hall, Manchester, England, March 11, 1888. This sermon outlines his views on the Second Advent, its connected events, and its proximity. His conclusion, from his interpretation of the prophetic numbers, is—that we are within eight years of the "First Resurrection." In our own experience, when severe trouble was approaching, the warning has come to ourself in that way indicated in the Scripture quoted above. "The coming event has cast its shadow before." This fact made the solemn experience of Mr. Birch, alluded to in his sermon of March 11, seem the more striking. The closing up of Dispensations is always marked by strange phenomena. Above all things, let us heed the Scriptures. Speaking of himself Mr. Birch says:—

"MY REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE THIS WEEK.

This week I have twice passed through the fear of death, and I do not know the reason why, excepting as a means of instruction to you, under similar circumstances. On each occasion I felt that I was about to die, although at the time I was, and am now, in perfect health and strength. The first time was last Sunday night, March 4, or rather about 2 A. M. on Monday morning, March 5, after writing out my Sunday evening sermon for publication as usual. I had retired to rest, and was at once falling into a sound sleep. Suddenly I awoke, without any bodily pain or oppression, but with a strong feeling that the hand of death was on me. For a moment I was awe-struck, but the next moment felt a blessed peace, which brought tears to my eyes as I said within myself, "Glory be to God; I am resting on the precious blood:" and calmly awaited for the last stroke. Then a voice sounded, "Not now, but be always ready!"

The second time was last night (Saturday, March 10th). Suddenly I awoke, as if some one had touched me, and the voice sounded within, "Are you ready?"

But I found myself without any feeling of peace. In a state of sudden alarm I got up, and began to walk about the room in a struggle against the angel of death. I said, "Oh, where is the peace which is promised to the adopted children of God?" And, not finding peace, I examined my foundation for the hope of salvation. I prayed, "Hast Thou not said that all manner of sin shall be forgiven unto men? I know that I believe Thy dear Son died for my sins; and Thy word says that whosoever doth so believe, shall not perish. Therefore, according to Thy word, all my sins are forgiven, and my soul saved." The feeling of death, however, still clutched me—no pain or convulsion of body; it was the feeling of the soul. The fear of death was with me; but having God's word for it that I was a saved sinner, I quietly trusted his word, and, leaning against a chair, calmly waited for the visit of death. Then the inward voice again exclaimed, "Not this time, but be always ready!"

BAILEYVILLE, Ill.

Dear Bro. Editor:

I know every reader of THE RESTITUTION will echo their sympathy with me in your late prostration and utter feebleness, which decaying years brings upon all the human family. For which cause we faint not, but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. Bear not my brother, "for thou shalt come to thy grave like as a shock of corn cometh in his season." The gates of hades shall not prevail against you, for he who made a new and living way by the blood of the everlasting covenant, holds the keys of death and the grave, and will soon say to his prisoners of hope, Come forth! giving them eternal beauty for ashes. Your sickness was the occasion of "Restitutions," which article was especially precious to me, having been pondering deeply on the words of our Lord, "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." The gate being strait signifies that the circumstances surrounding the one who would enter it are difficult, close, strict, rigorous, and often a distressing necessity; this is the first step toward life eternal. O if we could but keep the prize in view, the unspeakable gift, the gift of God. But this we see but dimly as we enter the strait gate, and then, the way is so narrow, because we are commanded to turn neither to the right hand or left, neither must we look back, but pressing on, looking to Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, we shall hear a word behind us saying, this is the way, walk ye in it. It is narrow my brother, because it is a continual warfare against self, a dying daily, an utter destruction of the natural man, which is enmity against God.

Narrow! because we are commanded to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, and for the eternal weight of glory this is indeed our reasonable service. Narrow is the way, because it is not easy to pluck out the right eye, that our whole body may be full of light, but this discipline makes us new creatures in Christ Jesus our Lord, inviting us to partake of the divine nature, so that we may be heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Jesus in his kingdom of glory. Can we imagine my brother what it is to be an heir of God? Who can fathom the amazing depth of such love, the exceeding magnitude of such a high calling? As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; wonderful favor! And the same inherent eternal life is offered to every one who will lay hold of it, and so run that they may obtain. It may well be called "the unsearchable riches of Christ," for it is through his merits we obtain this abounding grace, glory, honor and immortality. The narrow way may be rugged, lonely and steep, for few there be that find it, but the sweet promise is, "My grace is sufficient for thee, my strength is made perfect in thy weakness. Be of good cheer, I have overcome. Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. O let us come boldly to the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in every time of need. And while we are running the race, let us never forget the inestimable prize, "The Crown of Life." Our Savior trod this narrow way, and has shown us no other leading unto life. May grace be given us to apprehend that for which we are apprehended of Christ Jesus. The narrow way is the path of the justified one, shining more and more unto the perfect day, and here is the way where light dwelleth, the upward way to Zion, the way of righteousness, the only way into the Most Holy. "Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord." And now my brother I command you to his grace who hath declared, "Even to your old age I am he, and even to hoar hairs I will carry and will deliver you." "He is faithful who hath promised, who will also do it." Your Sister in the blessed hope of eternal life through Christ.

ELIZABETH COPPMAN.

Bro. Chaplin:

Seeing your last editorial and your precarious state of health, I was reminded to write and communicate to you our heartfelt sympathy and our Christian regards. I think I know how to regard the aged and infirm as my health is always very poor. And more than this your overburdened life at your advanced age certainly is enough to justify you in expecting the Christian sympathy of all the dear brethren who are living for the world to come. May our dear Father who has led you thus far, sustain and keep you unto the coming of our glorious King, when the inhabitants of that goodly land shall never more say "I am sick."

Our faithful labors all in the past and our aching hearts at rest, our frail bodies invigorated with our Father's undying nature. Most glorious are, may it soon dawn upon our sin-cursed world, when our Father's children who are living by faith shall be made free indeed. Amen.

T. E. ADAMS.

"Christian! Walk Carefully."

Yes dear Christian, take heed to your daily walk, to your words, to every act of every hour of your life.

Men see you. They stand on the corners of the streets taking notes. If you use the language of the blackguard they will know it, if there is any false dealing on your part, they mark it down against you. And if your conversation, or conduct, is not honest toward them that are without, how can you expect them to be influenced by any thing that you may say, to come into the fold of Christ?

As a dear young lady said to me the other day, "I have seen so much of this going back on one's profession, that I know I never could be a Christian."

How sad it made me feel! Brethren and sisters, be true to Christ, then will you make others strong to follow him, brave to enlist, glad to fight.

THE ROSE.

"How fair is the rose! what a beautiful flower!
The glory of April and May!
But the leaves are beginning to fade in an hour,
And they wither and die in a day.

"Yet the rose has one powerful virtue to boast,
Above all the flowers of the field;
When its leaves are all dead, and its fine colors lost,
Still how sweet a perfume it will yield.

"So frail is the youth and beauty of man,
Though they bloom and look gay like the rose;
But all our fond care to preserve them is vain,
Time kills them as fast as he goes.

"Then I'll not be proud of my youth or my beauty,
Since both of them wither and fade,
But gain a good name by well doing my duty:
This will scent, like a rose, when I'm dead."

Dear Restitution:

I have written one letter to you before and have seen it in print, so I thought I would write another and tell of our visit to Antioch.

There were twenty-seven Youthful Workers there and all of them enjoyed the meeting.

We went through our program as soon as we reached Antioch and quite a crowd was there. After we finished it, Mr. Conner, Mr. Railsback, and several ladies spoke to us; then the older ones had their meeting, which we enjoyed too.

The next time we met Auntie Chaplin told us that a little band similar to ours had been organized at Argos, which pleased us very much, and we hope that many more may yet be organized. Hoping that some time in the future we may all meet again at "Old Antioch," I will close.

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.

"When I first came to New York, at the age of twelve years, to seek employment," says the narrator, "I can call myself a precocious chap without any danger of being accused of an unusual degree of self-appreciation. I was quick to learn everything,—the bad as well as the good. My employer used profane language. I picked up the oaths he dropped with a naturalness that surprised even myself. The boys in the office all chewed tobacco. This was a little the hardest job I ever attempted; but after two weeks of nausea and indescribable stomach-wrenching, I came off victorious and could get away with my paper of tobacco a day with the best of them. One afternoon I was sent with a note from my employer to a house in the upper part of the city. I hadn't anything to read, but I had plenty of tobacco; and with that I proposed to entertain myself during the two or three hours I must spend in the passage. For some distance I did not notice who were beside me, but by and by a lady said very softly and pleasantly: 'Would you please, little boy, be more careful? I am going to a party this afternoon, and I should not like to have my dress spoiled.' I looked into her face. It was the sweetest face I ever saw. Pale, earnest, and loving; to my boyish heart it was the countenance of an angel. There was very little that I could say. I managed to dispose of the tobacco, however, and wiped my mouth very carefully,—all of which I felt certain she saw and mentally commented upon.

"'Have you a mother, little boy?' she next asked in the same tone.

"'No, ma'am,' I answered; and I felt my throat filling up, and I knew I must swallow very fast to keep from sobbing.

"'You have a father, then, I suppose?' she continued.

"'No, ma'am; no father.'

"'Brothers and sisters?'

"'Neither, ma'am.'

"'Then the little boy is alone in the world?'

"'Alone, ma'am.'

"'How long has your mother been dead?' and the dear woman looked away from my face, and waited until I could speak.

"'Two years,' I answered.

"'And you loved her?' came next.

"'Dearly,' was all I could say.

"She was silent a moment, and then said, so sweetly—oh! I shall never forget it:

"'And what do you think your dear mother would say—how do you think she would feel—to know that her little boy was guilty of such a disgusting habit as this?' pointing to my cheek where the tell-tale quid had vainly tried to stand its ground. 'I must leave now,' she continued, 'but here is my card; and if you come to me almost any evening, I shall be glad to see you, and perhaps we can be of service to each other.'

"She gave me her little gloved hand, and I shall never forget the sensation of that moment. I could not bear to part with her; without her I felt that I could do nothing; with her I could grow to a man's estate,—a man in the true sense of the word. From that moment tobacco never passed my lips. As soon as I could summon courage, I called upon that lady. Well do I remember how my heart beat as I waited in the elegant parlor for her to come down, and how awkward I felt as I followed my guide to her private sitting room. Here she got at every point of my life; and before I bade her good by it was arranged that I should spend two evenings of each week at her house, and study on these occasions just what she thought best. No lover ever looked forward to meeting with the mistress of his heart any more ardently than I did to those meetings with my friend. I grew careful of my appearance, careful of my conversation, and strove in every way to be worthy of this noble friendship. Two years passed in this delightful manner—two years that made me. My friend not only attended to my studies, striving also all the while to sow the right kind of spiritual seed, but she procured me a situation with a particular friend of hers, where I remain to this day. Nobody but God knows what I owe this woman. During the last three months of those two years I noticed that she grew constantly pale and thin; she never was betrayed into speaking of herself. Sometimes, when I would ask her if she felt worse than usual, she would reply:

"'Oh, no! I am only a little tired—that is all.'

"One evening she kept me by her sofa much longer than her custom, while she arranged lessons and laid out work enough, it seemed to me, for months.

"'Why so much to-night?' I inquired, conscious that my heart ached, and vaguely suspecting the cause.

"'Because, dear,' she answered, 'I do not want you to come for the next week, and I am anxious that you should have sufficient work to anticipate, as well as keep you busy. I think I can trust you to be a good boy, John?'

"'I think you can, ma'am,' I answered, almost sobbing.

"Then I knew all, and my grief knew no bounds. It is no use to go on. She died two days later; and when I hear folks speak of woman's influence, I feel like telling the whole world what a woman did for me."

WHAT THE COMING WAR WILL MEAN.

"Sooner or later the nations will rush to war out of sheer impatience with the weight of their armor." So say many who do not think. But if they reflect for a moment what rushing to war means they will change their opinion. For as the armed peace is a nightmare fouler than the world has yet suffered, so the next war is an appalling catastrophe from which imagination shrinks aghast. For there is nothing in modern history that it will resemble. Hitherto, down even to the last wars, when empires have gone to battle it has been a war of soldiers. The next war will be a war of peoples. In the Russo-Turkish war it was an army framed on the old system which was repulsed at Plevna, and ultimately swept in triumph to Constantinople. In the Franco-German war the French army were largely professional, and it was because the standing army of professional soldiers went down like ninepins before the irresistible rush of an armed nation that the whole military system has been revolutionised. Now every nation has armed all its able-bodied adults. In former days the mustering of half a million of soldiers was regarded as a mighty feat. Prince Bismark has added to the ranks of the army of the Fatherland, with one stroke of his pen, 700,000 fathers of families, and not a single voice is raised even in passing protest. Germany in the centre of Europe fronts east and west with a host of 3,000,000 trained soldiers. France will have between two and three millions ready to hand. Russia before long will be able to put 5,000,000 into line. Austria and Italy we need not count. The blast of the trumpets that proclaims the beginning of war will summon the manhood of Europe to the work of slaughter.

Not only will the number of the combatants be far beyond those which were raised even in the days of the First Napoleon—the Grand Army which he led to Moscow only consisted of 150,000 men more than the 700,000 added this year to the German army—but the spirit in which it will be fought out will differ for the worse. Prince Bismark has frankly told us what kind of war it will be. We shall fight, he said, if we do fight, until we are bled as white as veal. It will be a duel to the death—a war in which the avowed object of the combatants is the utter destruction of their adversary. "De mainer a blanc," to drain the very life blood of your enemy until you leave his carcass as white as that of the calf rom which the butcher seeks to drain every ruddy drop of gore—that is the declared ideal of the foremost nations of the Continent in the year of grace 1888. The imagination refuses to picture what it means. All our recent wars were short. The longest was that of the Crimea, which was little more than the seige and the defence of a single fortress by professional soldiers. The Franco-Italian war was almost an affair of weeks. The Danish war was over almost before it began. The Austro-Prussian-Italian war lasted just six months. The Franco-German war was over in six months. The conquest of Turkey was completed in about the same time. But the next war will not be over in six weeks or in six months. To bleed each other white, when both combatants are pretty well matched, and when there are millions of men in reserve, is an affair of years. But when all business is suspended, and the reapers have been summoned from the farms to the battle-fields, it will be impossible to carry on war on this scale for years without utter collapse and ghastly famine. Hence the unbattled millions will fight with the grim and desperate energy of men who know that like Judas, what they must do they must do quickly. They will strike terror. All the tourney rules of civilized war will be in danger of going by the board. It will be a contest of Titans waged with the ruthlessness of fiends. The next war will be in danger of degenerating into a nineteenth century version of the horrors of the Thirty Years' War, on a scale far more gigantic, and therefore characterized by crimes far more colossal.

Apart from the certainty of horrors to which the burning of Bazeilles, and even the sack of Magdeburg would be but as interludes in the infernal tragedy, there is another aspect of the struggle which is too often overlooked. The new style of warfare, in which battles are fought, not by a professional class set apart from the nation, governed by strict codes of military laws, and remaining apart from the activities of national existence, but by the nation itself, threatens to have most alarming results for humanity and civilization. We are able to see something of what it involves in the Criminal Statistics of Germany since the war. The conquest of France was one of the most expeditious and in many respects one of the least objectional wars ever waged. But it brutalized the Germans to an extent difficult to realize outside Germany. The citizen, plunged for six months into all the license and savagery of war, acquired a taint from which he did not purge himself for years. War is the unloosing of all crimes, the sanctioning of all violence, the negation of the sanctity of property and of life. To accustom men to war is to accustom them to live in a world where the ordinary moral code is suspended. It does not easily re-establish its authority when peace is concluded. The criminal statistics of Germany since 1871 show a terrible increase in all kinds of violent crime—murder, highway robbery, theft by violence, burglary, assaults on women and children—which after ten or fifteen years has only now begun to decline. The violence put in practice against the enemy in France left its poison in the blood of the Germans. What will be the effect upon civilization and humanity of accustoming 10,000,000 of citizens to make murder their daily passion throughout a long war, in which every evil dormant in the human animal would be given to run, no one can foresee. One thing only is certain, that the consequences would be far more hideous and deadly than anyone has yet ventured to conceive.

When the avalanche trembles overhead even the fool might sense to whistle, but there gentry, with the measureless catastrophe impending, go shouting and hallooing like a very Tom of Bedlam escaped from his keepers. It is sport to the fool to do mischief, and the madmen leave to scatter firebrands and death; but surely those journalists in London and elsewhere, who "love to swell the war-whoop passionate for war" might at least reflect for a moment on the responsibilities of provoking a conflict which would have as its watchword "de mainer a blanc" all round.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Present is Ours.

We live in the past, we live in the future, and the present we let slip through our hands. Yet we are dead to the past, we are not born to the future, and the present is our only time for doing, enjoying, living. We must indeed think of the past to profit by the experience it has given us, to repent of our sins, and to make reparation where we have injured any one, but we must not let our life be in the past. We should use the past only to live better, to live more fully in the present.

As regards the future, there is a certain provision for it that is the duty of the present hour, but beyond that we should stifle anxiety and fear as not belonging to us. We should remember how often we have allowed ourselves to be distracted by dread of a future difficulty or sorrow, and when the time and place were reached, lo! the heavy stone was already rolled away, and angels with blessings stood awaiting us. We may rest assured that if we do our part in the present, God will take care of the future.

All the boys will enjoy the frontispiece of the August Wide Awake, "The Crisis," a wild Canadian river-scene, also the accompanying story of peril and pluck, "Saved on the Brink," by Macdonald Oxley; and both boys and girls will have great fun over James Otis' complete serial, "A Neck-tie Party," for it is a jolly story. One of the most beautiful things in the number is by May Kendall, an English writer, the author of That Very Mab; it is a "parable" entitled "The Temple of Music," and teaches one of she most precious of life's lessons—that "he who loses his life shall find it;" all who have ever given up an ideal for the sake of duty will be the happier for reading this exquisite story. In "The Elephants of an Indian Prince" Miss Risley Seward offers the young folks the most entertaining elephant article ever written, from her own experience with the finest elephants of Asia. "Pets in Artist Life," by Eleanor Lewis, has some beautiful pictures and some very amusing anecdotes. There is a charming little tale for little folks by Katharine Macquoid, about two little girls and "A Sabot." Edward Everett Hale writes about Boston Common as it was in Revolutionary Days, and the article has Henry Bacon's famous picture of "The Boston School Boys and General Gage." Dr. Garnett of the British Museum has a witty Chinese story called "The rewards of Industry," amusingly illustrated. Mrs. James T. Fields contributes a long suggestive story, "A Helping Hand," written for young women just from school—a noble story. "Double Rosa," the serial by Mrs. Sherwood, relates the overthrow of Phyllis and Bluebell, and the training-ship serial by Mrs. Crowninshield, "Plucky Smalls," shows how the Government decorated Plucky with a medal—this story is altogether delightful. Margaret Sidney contributes a charming poem, "The Little Town-maid," which is a most pathetic appeal for a universal "Country week." There are many other attractions—a pretty paper by Mrs. Frances A Humphrey about "The English Daisy," written among English daisies, an article on Hans Andersen, an account of the baby Buddahs in Thibet by Mrs. Leonowens, instructions how to make a "handy microscope," together with Tangles, Letters from children, poems, prize-questions and pictures.

THE ETERNAL HOME.

No sickness there—
No weary wasting of the frame away;
No tearful shrinking from the midnight air—
No dread of summer's bright and fervid ray.

No hidden grief!
No wild and cheerless visions of despair;
No vain petition for a swift relief—
No tearful eyes, no broken hearts are there.

Care has no home
Within the happy realms of ceaseless song;
Its billows break away and melt in foam,
For from the mansions of the holy throng.

The storm's black wing
Is never spread athwart celestial skies;
Its swellings blend not with notes of spring,
As some too tender flowret fades and dies.

No night distills
Its chilling dews upon the tender frame;
Nor moon is needed there. The light which fills
That land of glory from its Maker came.

No parted friends
Or mournful recollections have to weep;
No bed of death enduring love attends
To watch the coming of pulseless sleep.

No blasted bower
Or withered bed celestial gardens know;
No scorching or swift descending shower
Scatters destruction like a ruthless foe.

No battle word
Startles the sacred host with fear or dread;
The song of peace creation's morning heard
Is sung wherever angel minstrels tread.

With faith our guide,
White-robed and innocent to tread the way,
Why should we fear to plunge in Jordan's tide,
And find the scene of eternal day.

PAUL'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM.
No. 3.

So far than for our examination of the prophecies of the ROMAN antichrist, given, some of them a thousand, and others five hundred years before the actual appearance of the predicted power. Strange and incomprehensible must these prophecies have appeared, both to those who gave them and to those who received them. Little could they imagine the tremendous scale, both geographical and chronological, on which they were to be fulfilled! They understood clearly that an awful apostasy was to intervene between the early Church and the advent; but how far it would extend and how long it would last they knew not, and could not know. A terrible enemy to God and to his church was to arise, strange as it might seem, in that church itself; and yet it was to have its seat in Rome, which was in their day the throne of the pagan persecutors of Christianity. How could these things be? much was revealed, but much was left still utterly mysterious, and which time only could interpret.

Turn now from the prophecy to the history, and let the latter interpret the former. We see what was predicted, let us ask what has happened. What are the historical facts? The history of the Christian Church does not record a steady progress in the pathway of truth and holiness, an uninterrupted spread of the kingdom of God on earth. On the contrary, it tells the story of a tremendous apostasy. Even in the first century, as we learn from the New Testament, there set in a departure from the gospel, and a return to certain forms of ritualism, as among the Galatians. In the second and third centuries, antichristian doctrine and antichristian practices, sacramentarianism and superstitionism, invaded the church, and gradually climbed to a commanding position, which they never afterwards abandoned. In the fourth century, with the fall of paganism, began a worldly, imperial Christianity, wholly unlike primitive apostolic Christianity, a sort of Christianized heathenism; and in the fifth and sixth centuries sprang up the Papacy, in whose career the apostasy culminated later on.

The mighty Cæsars had fallen; Augustus, Domitian, Hadrian, Diocletian, were gone; even the Constantines and Julians had passed away. The seat of sovereignty had been removed from Rome to Constantinople. Goths and Vandals had overthrown the western empire; the once mighty political structure lay shivered into broken fragments. The imperial government was slain by the Gothic sword. The Cæsars were no more, and Rome was in actual desolation. Then slowly on the ruins of old imperial Rome rose another power and another monarchy—a monarchy of loftier aspirations and more ruthless might, claiming dominion, not alone over the bodies, but over the souls of men; dominion, not only within the limits of a fallen empire, but throughout the entire world. Higher and higher rose the Papacy, till in the dark ages all Christendom was subject to its sway.

"Under the sacerdotal monarchy of St. Peter," says Gibbon, "the nations began to resume the practice of seeking on the banks of the Tiber their kings, their laws, and the oracles of their fate." And this was a voluntary submission. As a kingdom, the Papacy was not at that time in any position to enforce it. Not by military power, but by spiritual and religious pretensions, did the Bishop of Rome attain supremacy in the Church and in the world; it was by his lofty claim to be the vicegerent of Christ, by his assumption that he was as God on earth, —it was by means of his episcopal position that he attained by degrees supreme power, not in the Church only, but in the world.

The growth of this power to these gigantic proportions was a most singular phenomenon. Tyndale, the Reformer, speaking of it, says:

"To see how the holy father came up, mark the ensample of the ivy. First it springeth up out of the earth, and then awhile creepeth along by the ground, till it find a great tree. Then it joineth itself beneath, unto the body of the tree, and creepeth up a little and a little, fair and softly. At the beginning, while it is yet thin and small, the burden is not perceived; it seemeth glorious to garnish the tree in winter. But it holdeth fast withal, and ceaseth not to climb up till it be at the top, and even above all. And then it sendeth its branches along by the branches of the tree, and overgroweth all, and waxeth great, heavy, and thick; and it sucketh the moisture so sore out of the tree and its branches, that it choaketh and stifleth them. And then the foul, stinking ivy waxeth mighty in the stump of the tree, and becometh a nest and a nest for all unclean birds, and for blind owls, which hawk in the dark, and dare not come to the light.

"Even so the Bishop of Rome, now called pope, at the beginning crept along upon the earth, and every man trod on him. As soon as there came a Christian emperor, he joined himself to his feet and kissed them, and crept up a little, with begging now this privilege, now that.....And thus with flattering and feigning and vain superstition, under the cape of St. Peter he crept up, and fastened his roots in the heart of the emperor, and with his sword climbed above all his fellow bishops, and brought them under his feet. And as he subdued them by the emperor's sword, even so, after they were sworn faithful, he, by their means, climbed up above the emperor, and subdued him also, and made him stoop unto his feet and kiss them.....And thus the pope, the father of all hypocrites, hath with falsehood and guile perverted the order of the world, and turned things upside down."

"All the kings of the West reverence the pope as a God on earth," said Gregory II., and he spoke truly. Sismondi describes how Pepin and the Franks received him as a divinity. His dogmas were regarded as oracles; his bulls and sentences as the voice of God. "The people think of the pope as the God that has power over all things in earth and in heaven." Marcellus, addressing the pope at the Lateran Council, said, "Thou art another God on earth;" and "our Lord God the pope" was an oft accepted title. These are facts, substantial facts of history, which can be proved by countless documents, and which indeed no Romanist will deny. The people rendered and the pope received worship—the worship due to God alone. At the coronation of Pope Innocent X., Cardinal Colonna, in his own name and that of the clergy of St. Peter's, addressed the following words to the pope, "kneeling on his knees:" "Most holy and blessed father! head of the Church, ruler of the world, to whom the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed, whom the angels in heaven revere, and the gates of hell fear, and all the world adores, we specially venerate, worship, and adore thee!" What blasphemous exultation is here! Have not Paul's words been fulfilled? Has not this man of sin, sitting in the temple of God, shown himself that he is God, or allowed himself to be treated as Divine, nay, even claimed to be so treated? He allowed himself to be styled "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," because he gave and sold indulgences for sin. He was even more merciful than Christ; for he left souls in purgatory, and the pope took them out! He could command even the angels of heaven, and add saints to the celestial choir, raising dead men to form part of heaven's hierarchy as "saints," and causing them henceforth to be worshipped by the church on earth.

In all this the pope was as God upon earth. It was his to speak and govern as God; it was the world's to bow down, to believe, and to obey.

See him in his robes of more than kingly royalty, with his crown of more than terrestrial dominion—not one, but three, three in one, a triple crown. The proud tiara of the Papacy symbolises power on earth, in heaven, and in hell; in all three the pope claims to rule. He is far above all kings. He is the vicegerent of God, the regent of the universal. He never rises from his pontifical throne to any person whomsoever, nor uncovers himself before mortal man. He does not even condescend to honor any human being by the least inclination of his head. His nuncios and legions take precedence of the ambassadors of all crowned heads. Cardinals, the chief princes of the Church, adore his holiness upon their bended knees, kissing his right hand, and even his feet! At his coronation they set him on the high altar of St. Peter's and adore him as the representive of Deity. He is carried in lofty state on men's shoulders, beneath a canopy hung with fringe of gold. People, prelates, princes, and cardinals exalt and worship him with the most solemn ceremonies. He is head of the universal Church, arbiter of its rights and privileges. He wears the keys, as the sign of his power to open the gates of heaven to all believers. He holds two swords, as judging in things temporal and spiritual. He is "the sole and supreme judge of men, and can himself be judged of no man." He is the husband of the Church, and as such wears a ring, indicating her perpetual betrothal to himself. Thousands upon thousands kneel before him; they struggle to get near his person; they stretch forth their hands to obtain his indulgences, and crave his quasi-Divine benediction, that "smoke of smoke," as Luther called it. The deluded multitude rend the air with acclamations at his approach. In his procession all is gorgeous magnificence. Swiss guards and other attendants from his cortege, in scarlet cloaks, embroidered with gold, with silver maces and rich caparisons, silk housings, red velvets, purples, satins laced with gold, long flowing robes sweeping the ground, some crimson, some black, some white, and caps adorned with precious stones, and helmets glittering in the sun. His litter is lined with scarlet velvet, fringed with gold, and he himself is clothed in a white satin cassock, with rochet, stole, and mozette, all of red velvet if it is winter, or of red satin if it is summer. At his adoration by the cardons and clergy of St. Peter's, he is clothed in a white garment and seated on a throne, and thus attired he "presides in the temple of the Lord."

Mark these words: he "presides in the temple of the Lord." I took them from Picart's description of the Roman ceremonial, a Roman Catholic authority. It is the Romanists themselves who use this significant phrase of the Papal pontiff: he "presides in the temple of the Lord." Exalted to this position, he is incensed, and the cardinals, one at a time, in solemn, deliberate state and idolatrous submission, kiss his hand, his foot, and even his stomach. He is surrounded by cardinals, archbishops, bishops, abbots, priests, and princes. Enormous fans of peacocks' feathers are carried on either side of his chair, as used to be done to the pagan monarchs of olden times. He directs the affairs of the greatest empire upon earth, governing by an almost infinite number of men, whom he keeps constantly in subjection to himself, and from whom he demands frequent periodical account. He distributes spiritual gifts, and exalts to the highest preferments, not only on earth, but also in heaven; for is it not his to make bishops and archbishops, to canonize whom he will, and to decree their perpetual memorial and worship in the world?

All power is delivered unto him. He forgives sins; he bestows grace; he cancels punishments, even in purgatory; he restores the lapsed; he excommunicates the rebellious; he can make that which is unlawful, lawful; he cannot err; his sentences are final, his utterances infallible, his decrees irreformable. O dread dominion! O dizzy height! O blasphemous assumption! O sublime, satanic tyranny! who is like unto thee, thou resuscitated Cæsar, thou false Christ? Lord of the consciences, thou silliest there as a very deity, Quasi Deus, as God. They attest supreme, as their own words are witness, "in the temple of the Lord!"

Look again at the confessional, where every priest sits as an image of the pope his master, with the scored countenance of men and women beneath his feet, as though he was a god! For mark, he searches the heart, the very secrets of the soul; he demands the discovery and confession of all its sins; he makes himself master of all its thoughts and intents; he sits in that temple, the temple of the human consciences, which God claims solely for himself. Oh, awful position! And there he presumes to reign, to decide, to absolve from sin; "Absolve te," I absolve thee, is his word. The sinner regards him as holding the place of Jesus Christ. This Romish work is a witness that is so. This is the Veritable Manual. Here, in the chapter for the direction of those who go to confession, and every Papist does, are these words, "Confessors should not be viewed in any other light than.....as holding the place of Jesus Christ" (p. 177). And again, on p. 182, "When you leave the confessional, do not disturb your mind by examining whether you have been confessed well, or have forgotten any of your sins; but rest assured that, if you have made your confession with sincerity, and the other requisite dispositions, you are according to the express decisions of the Council of Trent, fully absolved from every sin." "Who can forgive sins, but God only?" See how the "man of sin" sits in God's temple, and robs him of his place and his prerogative!

Look at this other book. It is the volume of the laws and condition of the Jesuits. Here, on p. 10, the Jesuit is taught that his superior, whoever he may be, must be recognized, reverenced, and submitted to with perfect and complete subjection of act and thought, as occupying the place of Jesus Christ. Thus the priest in the confessional, and the superior in the Jesuit order, and the bishop and archbishop and cardinal, all reflect the sacerdotal supremacy of the pope, who sits there in God's very temple, the temple of conscience and of the Christian Church, as a usurping god—quasi Deus, as if God himself.

But we must pass on from this point, the position assumed by the man of sin in the Church of God, and ask whether Romanism has fulfilled the other predictions of St. Paul as to "lying wonders" and "signs," or false miracles, and the deceits of unrighteousness. Has she employed these as a means of gaining "power," deluding her votaries that she might the more effectually enslave them? To exalt the priesthood, and especially its head, the Papal highpriest, Rome has spared nothing. She has trampled alike on the intellect and conscience of mankind, and despised the eternal well-being of souls by inducing them to believe lies.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

Dear Restitution:

Several things have been from time to time on my mind to say in THE RESTITUTION, but affliction, bodily and otherwise, have prevented my writing. At your time of life I judge you find that to be labor which in former years was no hardship. But the hope we have long cherished is our paramount interest at all times, in ease or suffering. The world sleeps, sleeps in the sense Paul speaks of in 1 Thes. v. 6, 7. And no wonder, when clergy of different sects screw disbelief in portions of God's word. This is true in England as well as in America. It seems to some persons a breach of good manners to talk on Bible subjects in company! Weather, crops, trade, politics, jesting, bazaars, railroads, steamboats, telegraphs, telephones, exhibitions, racing and cricket may be discussed, but divine truth is discarded. You and myself remember when many were interested about the advent. In some parts it was the especial topic. Insensibility now permeates society, and "as it was in the days of Noah" are words more and more appropriate as years come and go. So it will be but a few, not stupified by the abounding unbelief, will be ready. What a mistake was made in 1844! In view of our Lord's word's, "at such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh" it would have been at such an hour as ye think, had he then come. We thought we knew the day, almost the hour, and our presumption was rebuked. Since 1844 time calculations have been made, with what result we all know. Ye know not when the time is." According to a Herald of Life sent to me by a friend, some are confident that the present year will witness the advent. But while we long for our Lord's coming, we cannot accept, as reliable, calculations from those who are radically unsound on prophecy. Those who say that the 1000 years of Rev. xx. are in the past, and who talk about "conditional prophecy," a term in itself contradictory, are not the persons to be correct about the time of the advent. False prophets have long been among the advent people. But sooner or later he will come, and that he may come quickly is our daily prayer.

There is now and then a person to be met with who will admit much concerning the advent; and sometimes interest will be manifested, and thanks given for instruction. We must bear witness as Noah did, even though it may be. God forgive our past unfaithfulness! At this moment there is a lull in Europe. But think of peace when millions of men are kept in readiness for battle! The talk of peace brings 1 Thess. v. 3 to mind.

Perils within are more dangerous than perils without. Satan is on the alert where truth has a place. What deadly, damnable heresies have crept in among those who have been enlightened about the things of the kingdom. Partial inspiration, a sentiment leading to rationalism, another word for infidelity, Josephism, which is blasphemy, sinking into perdition those who imbibe it; and, again, another tenet, happily (we hope) confined to a very few, that it was God who moved the serpent in the garden to deceive Eve, an assertion blasphemous as Josephism; such are dangers not to be permitted to wound, poison, and destroy the lambs of the little flock, and no warning faithfully sounded.

Be not discouraged by affliction, however severe or protracted. Some persons are apt to think their own trials are especially hard. To such we say with Paul to the Corinthians, "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man." Are you afflicted by disease or infirmity, loss of one or more members of the frame? So are and have been thousands before you. Are you falsely accused, maligned, or persecuted? Jesus himself, prophets, apostles, and disciples in all ages have known such usage. Have you been doing your best to get an honest living, and been foiled over and over again, cheated, betrayed, undermined, and slandered, and because you are in distressed circumstances, blamed, while blamers have hours of ease you cannot afford? Be assured you are not alone. Have you domestic troubles? Such troubles began in Adam and Eve's family, and have continued ever since. Are you brought low in circumstances, so that you taste a little of what Job knew. See Job xxx. Instead of feeling this hard, rejoice therein. But let there be no self-exaltation.

Look back on your past life. Are you not ashamed of this and that? Bless God for punishments! David had a hard experience when he exclaimed, Psa. xlii. 10, "As with a sword in my bones," etc. David sinned, and avowed his sins, and we must be honest before God, and before others, seeking no palliation against the simple fact of sin. The writer owns the justice of punishments in his own case. Infinite in blessings they are when patiently borne and acknowledged as just. Be it our wisdom so to bear and own them, that they may yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto us. Without chastisement we are bastards; let us then patiently endure all, that we may be partakers of God's holiness! H. H.

"His Neighbor Cometh and Searcheth Him."

In this country especially is it true, "A public man becomes public property" and therefore all who act as interpreters of the law, as also those who call themselves "ministers of the gospel," are alike subject to review and criticism. A just criticism is not hypercriticism, and all who handle the pen, or speak in defence of recognized principles, are alike the objects of test.

A number of rules for a proper use of the means, whereby all who are, or consider themselves teachers, are given to us in the Scriptures. As "If any man speak, as the oracles of God; if any man minister, as of the ability which God giveth: that God, in all things may be glorified." 1 Peter iv. 11. Another set of wholesome words is given by the Preacher, "Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God: for God is in heaven, and thou upon the earth; therefore let thy words be few." Eccl. v. 2. The apostle James in his epistle, admonishes in many well directed expressions those safe and salutary rules of conduct, as, "Do not err my beloved brethren," and "My beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath," and, "If any man among you seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain." James i. 16, 19, 26.

Illustrations as forcible as the foregoing, could easily be multiplied; the point we here before us is of a solemn, and well for all if knowing these things we lay the same to heart, and act as those who must render account. I will remember a saying of my father's, long ago uttered, but which will bear repeating, "They who live the longer, and have their eyesight, see the most." It is also true as to the hearing. Some have ears but they don't hear; and some have ears who often wish they did not hear; there is so much said that ought as well and better be left unsaid. This of course is applicable in many cases. There are many who call themselves Christians, and whose daily delight seems to be to tell how "sound in the faith" they are, how they have grown in knowledge of the things concerning the kingdom since they were immersed; how much more they know of these things than Brother A., or Sister B., and by a crucial test, from their standpoint, which, granting they give chapter and verse as proof, must be accepted so far as it goes; but is this all? Is knowledge the basis and superstructure, or is there something of equal, if not of paramount value associated with knowledge? Peter tells us to "Grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." This divine favor—grace—in which we are to grow, has health associated therewith! An individual Christian, or body of Christians may grow for awhile on knowledge, especially if they have been living as blinded by the "Traditions of the elders," and have come to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Such only know the happy deliverance from darkness into marvellous light, who have had the experience! But here we must not rest; having attained certain heights let us go on to perfection, cultivating all the graces of our holy religion; and the benediction will assuredly rest on all such.

"It is a great thing to be a Christian," such an one as not only knows, "Whom I have believed," according to the book, but who have a joy and rejoicing of heart known only to those who love the doctrines of God our Savior, and have a fellowship of spirit, and are united in heart and hand, "soul, body and spirit" in maintaining integrity of purpose in the fear of the Lord. To this and let it not be left to the preacher to say "Come," but "Let him that heareth (or has heard) say, come!" so that any who are thirsting after the water of life, and the bread from heaven, may drink and eat and have eternal life in the coming kingdom! If this, dear brethren and sisters in Christ Jesus, is the aim of our lives, we need fear no searching, for our works will accord with our words, God will be honored, and souls saved.

GEO. W. YOUNG.

PEIRCE.—At his residence in Benton Co., Mo., June 12, 1888, of consumption, Josiah Pierce, aged 87 years, 11 months, and 11 days.

Brother Peirce leaves a wife 78 years old to mourn his loss, but she mourns not as those who have no hope. He lived a just, upright, Christian life, and fell peacefully asleep in the blessed hope of a glorious immortality at the resurrection of the just. He has been a faithful disciple of the Lord and a constant reader of THE RESTITUTION.

JOSHUA KIDWELL.

Shortly before he died Brother Peirce wrote the following concerning himself, which we give in this connection, at his request:

I was born in Hillsborough, Highland Co., State of Ohio, June 23, 1820. I was brought up in the faith of the people called Quakers; believed their doctrine until I was 38 years old. Then I heard the Campbellites preach, and this gave me a start to investigate the Scriptures on the life and death question. I found no immortal life promised to any but those who had believed the gospel of the kingdom of God, and been immersed in water. All such are promised an immortal life at the resurrection of the just. My mortal life seems to be near its end. Good by, dear brethren who read THE RESTITUTION until Jesus comes for his people.

Announcements.

The Church of God" in Michigan will hold their Annual Meeting (D. V.) in Dutton, Kent Co., beginning Thursday evening, Aug. 23d, and holding over Sunday. Now brothers and sisters one and all, this meeting means more to us than any previous meeting ever held in Michigan has meant. It means more than meeting for a visit, it means business, and very important business too. It means a reunion of the State of Michigan into one common brotherhood if we are ready for it. Are we ready. If all come for that purpose, with every selfish object entirely left out, only the good of the cause at heart, feeling the great need of earnest united efforts for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, then the object of this gathering will be accomplished. Let every brother and sister in the State who are holding fast to the faith once delivered to the saints be present without fail. God's cause needs your earnest attention. Come with hearts full of love and prayer, come with hands ready to grasp every child of God with a hearty, honest welcome. Come with a purpose high and holy, and this meeting will be heralded to the throne above, with joy sinners will turn to say, "Behold how these brethren love one another," and we will all receive a blessing.

MARY A. WOODWARD, Sec.
JACOB LEMON, Pres.
WM. MOSHER, Vice Pres.

The Annual State Conference of the Church of God will meet at Claysville, Bracken P. O., Huntington Co., Ind., beginning on Friday, August 31, 1888, at 2:30 p. m., and last over Sunday. Those coming by the Nickle Plate R. R., will stop at South Whitley. Those coming on the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific R. R., or the Cincinnati, Wabash & Michigan R. R., will stop at North Manchester, where they will be met and conveyed to the place of meeting. At our meeting at Antioch last June the subject of having the churches represented at Conference by delegates was discussed, and a motion was made that each local church appoint, at a meeting of the church held previous to the Conference, delegates who can attend the Conference, and that the Church officers send the names of such delegates to the Conference Secretary, that they may be known as the authorized representatives of such church. It was also urged that at the same meeting the local churches collect such amounts as they can, to send to the conference for purposes of evangelising. Brethren, this work is important. Business is business, and the work of spending the money the good Lord has placed in our hands to the best advantage, requires just as much attention as any worldly affair, and a little more care. So I urge it upon every Church of God in Indiana, to have a meeting soon, and appoint your delegates and make a generous collection, and report the action, and come to the meeting prepared to make a grand good effort to do more this year than last, and do it better, for the time to work is getting very short.

The brethren and sisters at Claysville are able and willing to accommodate all who will attend. Any one intending to attend this meeting, who is not acquainted with the route, etc., will do well to write to A. C. Brookover, or Dr. C. W. Fry, Bracken, Ind., stating what time they expect to get there, and they will be cared for.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

The Churches of God in Iowa will meet in Conference and for exhortation, preaching and general business, at Marathon, Buena Vista Co., Iowa, on Thursday evening, Sept. 13, 1888, and continue over the following Sunday, as Brother Carton and Scott may arrange. We hope to have a good meeting. Let all the brethren come.

A PSALM OF NIGHT.

Fades from the west the farewell light,
Flung backward by the setting sun,
And silence deepens as the night
Steals with its solemn shadows on.
Gathers the soft, refreshing dew,
On springing grass and flow'ret stems—
And lo! the everlasting blue
Is radiant with a thousand gems!

Not only doth the voiceful day
Thy loving kindness, Lord, proclaim—
But night, with its sublime array
Of worlds doth magnify thy name!
Yea—while adoring seraphim
Before thee bend the willing knee,
From every star a choral hymn
Goes up unceasingly to thee!

Day unto day doth utter speech,
And night to night thy voice makes known:
Through all the earth where thought may reach
Is heard the glad and solemn tone—
And worlds beyond the farthest star
Whose light hath reached a human eye,
Catch the high anthem from afar
That rolls along immensity.

O Holy Father, 'mid the calm
And stillness of this evening hour,
We, too, would lift our solemn psalm
To praise thy goodness and thy power!
For over us, as over all,
Thy tender mercies still extend,
Nor vainly shall the contrite call
On thee, our Father and our friend.

Kept by thy goodness through the day,
Thanksgivings to thy name we pour—
Right o'er us with its stars—we pray
Thy love to guard us evermore.
In grief console, in gladness bless,
In darkness guide, in sickness cheer—
Till, in the Savior's righteousness
Before thy presence we appear.

The Gathering of the Nations; or, the Judgment of the Sheep and the Goats.—Matt. xxv. 31-46.—No. 2.

In this judgment there seems to be but one simple rule of procedure. A reward is given to those who in kindness and mercy supply the wants of the needy, and do it as unto the Christ; punishment is meted out to those who neglect to do this. No other principle is laid down. No other reason for reward, no other reason for punishment is assigned. The separation into two different and opposite companies is made on that ground, and no other. Is it for us to add any thing to this? To introduce any other principle into the passage might be foreign to the Savior's design. No reference is made to repentance, or faith, or regeneration, or purity of heart; the reference is simply to works of charity. Yet while no other test of character is laid down in this passage, it is clear to our mind that the Christ recognized as underlying this charitable conduct, the pure motive that prompted it,—the desire to do his will, to please him, to promote his cause, to do good in imitation of him, and for his sake. And such a motive can only spring from faith in the Christ, and from the divine life in the soul. If there is not this motive power behind these deeds of benevolence, it would be impossible for the King to exalt the doers of them to be inheritors of the kingdom. That to us seems to be beyond dispute. And plainly it is the lack of this faith and love in the other class, the want of regard for the Christ, and for those he calls his brethren, that causes them to harden their hearts in the presence of want and suffering, and which is really the ground of the curse pronounced upon them. There are very many instances now of Christians who have faith and love in the heart, and the desire to help needy brethren, who have not the means; and there will doubtless be many such in the future. In regard to all such cases the King will act in righteousness.

The next point we must notice is one of some difficulty, and expositors, of course, differ respecting it. It will be observed, judging from what is on the surface of this passage, that the righteous who do these good deeds, seem not to be conscious of doing them unto the Christ, or of being influenced in doing them by a regard to the Christ. They no not deny that they have done these good works, yet they seem not to be aware that what they have done for the needy and destitute, was done to the Lord Jesus Christ. It will not do to say that they know perfectly all about this, and that their language of non-recognition of their deeds as done unto the Christ, is intended simply to show their humility, for in that case, their humility would be only a false humility. Let us not take from, or add to, this representation, for in either way we may mar the symmetry and beauty of the truth here revealed; yet we may say a few things in explanation of their language, which, if they do not remove the difficulty, may lessen it. It is concluded by some that the righteous here are partially ignorant of the Christ, and that these good works spring from love to God in a general sense, and from a sense of obligation to help the needy, and not from a conscious faith in the Christ, and a desire to do all to his glory. This view we are unable to accept. We admit that it may be inferred, with some show of plausibility, from the answer of the righteous, that great ignorance concerning the Christ will prevail at the period here referred to. This may seem incredible to some looking at the fact of the wide proclamation of the gospel, and the large circulation of the Scriptures and innumerable Christian books in all the nations. But great light will be thrown on this point by understanding the time when this representation will fit in. It will be after the falling away, after the general prevalence of unbelief, after gross darkness covers the peoples, after the removal of the church, after the revelation of the antichrist, and when martyrdom is the penalty—the frequent penalty—for not doing homage to the beast and his image. It will be at the time when the Christ shall come to take the kingdom out of the hands of the one who will then possess it, who will be a usurper, and to claim it as his own. This will be the time of this judgment. Hence ignorance of the true Christ will be alarmingly great and wide-spread. But even then there may be some who, apart from faith in Jesus, will fear God, and work righteousness, and be moved by feelings of humanity towards their fellow-creatures who are in need and in suffering, and whose feelings will go out in deeds of beneficence, in works of mercy. But this explanation, though specious, is not satisfactory, and does not remove the difficulty. For the living righteous—the truly righteous—of that period, notwithstanding the darkness that will prevail, must have a knowledge of the Christ, and faith in his name, or they could not be accounted meet to inherit the kingdom.

Others take a similar view, but modified a little, and put in a different form. Dean Alford says, "The answer of these righteous appears to me to show plainly that they are not to be understood as being the covenanted servants of Christ. Such an answer it would be impossible for them to make, who had done all distinctly with reference to Christ, and for his sake, and with his declaration of Ch. x. 40-42 before them. Such a supposition would remove all reality, as indeed it has generally done, from our Lord's description." This is strong language, but its force is entirely broken by the fact that the King pronounces these righteous blessed of his Father, and bids them inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world. Such words could not be spoken by the Christ, if they were not his covenant servants; and Dean Alford, we think, must have overlooked this when he made the above statement. But though these righteous are inheritors, or heirs, of the kingdom, they may not occupy so high a position as those who are in the first resurrection—the first in point of eminence—and as those among the living who are thought worthy of translation. There will be different offices and different positions of honor in the kingdom, and as these righteous are not among the translated, who will accompany the King in his glory at this judgment—assuming that the translation will have taken place a little while previously, which the analogy of Scripture, we think, shows—we may conclude that some will be chosen to a higher rank than they.

Stier thinks that the only ground of acceptance of the righteous, is their humane feeling or sympathy, as manifested in their efforts to relieve suffering. He does not believe that these benevolent acts of the righteous spring from a conscious faith in the Son of God. Upon he remarks, "All those are blessed whose hearts have not been closed against the love of God that draws all nations; that a dogmatically-developed faith in the Lord is not required of all men is here positively declared against all narrow dogmatism that would set limits to God's infinite love." But this idea strengthens the erroneous view of those who teach that good works will save us. Though faith in the Christ is not named, we contend that it is clearly implied; for they could not be rewarded with rulership in the kingdom, if their works were not the fruit or the outgrowth of conscious faith in Christ. The Savior is speaking here of his sheep; he designates these righteous by that name; and in another of his discourses, he teaches that he is the good Shepherd, and that his own sheep know him, and hear his voice: therefore, by these sheep, by these righteous in this place he must mean true believers, justified and sanctified. Whatever difficulties may be suggested by the answer of the righteous, no criticism can show that they are not conscious believers in the Anointed; for he commands them to inherit the kingdom; and those who inherit the kingdom are rulers in it; they are exalted to the high honor of kingship. James teaches that we must be rich in faith to be heirs of the kingdom. Paul teaches that whatsoever we do, we are to work heartily, as unto the Lord, and not unto men, if we would receive the recompense of the inheritance; that to be "joint-heirs with Christ," the Spirit himself must bear "witness with our spirit, that we are children of God." And Peter teaches that we are to give diligence to make our calling and election sure, in order that there may be richly supplied unto us "the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weather.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with extraordinary ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are exclaiming "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar terms, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, favoring careful study and profound thought. Its able writer, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, clearing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that the purpose here is moulding and reshaping the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has come to be cast as a unit. There votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already stunned or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, every body interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth bound, 200 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 15, 1888. NO. 31.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS { One Year . . $2.00. Six Months . . 1.00. Three Months . .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as preequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Gathering of the Nations; or, the Judgment of the Sheep and the Goats.—Matt. xv. 31-46.—No. 6.

But further; the whole drift of this description of this judgment assumes that those before the King have some knowledge of him and of their duty; otherwise the test of doing good works unto Christ, or not doing them unto Christ, would not be applicable. This shows that the righteous do not do them in ignorance of Christ. The wisdom and fitness of this test is seen by considering the time of this judgment, which is after the secret principle, and when the King manifests himself openly. It has respect to the conduct of persons who have witnessed the persecution of Christians under the reign of the antichrist. By this description Christ designs to teach an important lesson, that is the grand obligation under which we are laid to confer benefits on others, and also the certainty of even small acts of kindness, done in his name, receiving their reward.

Two more thoughts must finish our remarks on this answer of the righteous, and these, we think, will make the matter as clear as it is possible to make it till the consummation of the age reveals the great facts. It should be remembered that true believers, with a renewed moral nature, and new motives, actuated by a regard to Christ, so accustomed themselves to what may be called little acts of kindness, that they become natural to them; their life-habit of doing good, the fruit of the new moral nature, becomes a sort of second nature; and while faith in Christ, and love to Christ, lie behind all this, as the great motive-power, they may often do acts of kindness, and have their thoughts so taken up with conferring benefits on those who are needy, that they may not always think of the motive-power behind those acts; and they may become so easy, being dictated by their new nature, and being in such perfect accord with their present views and feelings, as not to strike them as any thing special or extraordinary.

Another thing which may be said is, that while these righteous cannot, consistently with the King's commendation of them and the high reward given to them, be supposed to use the language of verses 37-39 to give themselves an appearance of humility, they nevertheless are humble, and feel themselves very little in the presence of the King, and while comparing their own works with the amazingly great things the Lord has done for them. Their answer shows that they have the true spirit of humility, that they attach no merit to their good works; and that they cannot, on the ground of them, claim the inheritance about to be conferred upon them. Christ exhorted his apostles to humility in these words, recorded in Luke xvii. 10: "Even so ye also, when ye shall have done all the things that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do." These righteous are evidently influenced by the spirit of this exhortation. In themselves they have no claim on any reward for works of charity they have done; for though they may have fulfilled all the divine requirements, they have done no more than their duty. The reward, therefore, is not of merit, but of grace. And the strength in which we do any good works, and the disposition we have to do them, are from Christ; and hence they should be done to his glory. And who performs such works without the consciousness of numerous frailties and imperfections? Are there any real humble followers of Jesus who cannot adopt this language, "We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which it was our duty to do?" Bengel says, "Wretched is he whom the Lord calls an unprofitable servant: happy, he who calls himself so."

Again; these kind and merciful acts are done to some whom Christ calls his brethren, and being done to his brethren, he regards them as done unto himself, and hence he rewards the doers. But who are they who are here called his brethren? This is a point that cannot be settled, that is, beyond dispute, though to our own mind the matter is very plain if we are to be guided by the analogy of Scripture. Some take a very broad view, and regard man, as man, Christ's brother, and therefore, all men as his brethren. By this phrase, "My brethren," Watson thinks that all men are intended. "Those who restrain the term brethren," says he, "to poor and destitute Christians, have no warrant for in the words or from the scope of the discourse. To narrow up the obligations of obedience to those of our own faith would have been rather in the spirit of Judaism than according to the liberal and expansive genius of Christianity; the term brethren is to be taken in its largest sense for all mankind. By taking upon him our nature, Christ became the brother of every man." This language is strong, but as irrelevant as it is strong. The question is not whether we should "narrow up the obligations of beneficence to those of our own faith," or broaden them out to all mankind; but what is the Scriptural usage of the term, brethren? It is not whether we should do good simply to the household of faith, or, as we have opportunity, to all men; but what did Christ mean by the words, "My brethren," which can only be determined by the sense in which the term is used elsewhere. Barnes adopts the same view as Watson. He says, "Christ acknowledges all the poor, and needy, and strangers, of every land as his brethren." But this view we cannot entertain for a moment; we are persuaded it is a great error; Christ never acknowledged any such thing, for many of such are unbelievers, are opposed to Christ, and hate his teaching and his authority; and how could he acknowledge such as his brethren?

Some think the reference is to his own people according to the flesh, the Jews. And this view is far less objectionable and far more probable than the other, because prior to his coming in his glory, and gathering the nations before him, the remnant of his chosen people will have passed through trouble and suffering under the power of the last great Gentile oppressor. Others think the reference is to those who have believed on him, and who are the sons of God by adoption, and therefore, his brethren in a higher sense. And this, after a careful examination, we think is the true view. We think the word does not refer simply to the Jews, but to all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who believe in the Christ. As a matter of fact, however, prophecy leads us to the conclusion that the majority of these brethren at the gathering will be believing Jews, though it may include some believing Gentiles. The analogy of Scripture on this point shows that faith in the Divine Son is necessary to adoption into the family of God, and in order to become true brethren. That is clearly evident by the use of the word in the following passages:—"Then saith Jesus unto them, Fear not: go tell my brethren that they depart into Galilee, and there shall they see me." Here Jesus referred to the apostles and disciples. "But he answered and said unto them, My mother and my brethren are these which hear the word of God and do it." These words are decisive in showing that obedience to God's word is necessary to constitute men his brethren. "Jesus saith to her, Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended unto the Father: but go unto my brethren, and say to them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God." In this passage it was disciples that Mary Magdalene was commanded to go and speak to. "For both he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren."—Matt. xxviii. 10; Luke viii. 21; John xx. 17; Heb. ii. 11. In this verse sanctified believers are in union with Christ, and therefore, are his brethren. Bengel, who is no mean authority, thinks that they are believers whom Christ calls his brethren. This view seems further strengthened by the fact that prior to this judgment of the living nations, prophecy shows that believers—believing Gentiles as well as Jews—will suffer greatly under the reign of the antichrist. They will be in a state in which they will greatly need help and relief and succor and consolation. Indeed, some of these very brethren may be living before him at the time of this judgment, may have survived the terrible hour of trial, and others may have suffered martyrdom for his name. These brethren must be believers or saints.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 14.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE POST-TESTIARY OR QUARTERNARY AGE.—CONTINUED.

OF THE JEWISH NATION.

"The promise," made to Abraham was confirmed to the Jewish fathers, as it is written, "He hath remembered his covenant forever; the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. Which covenant he made with Abraham and his oath unto Isaac; and confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant; saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance." Psa. cv. 8-11.

The earliest history available to us—the Scriptural—besides making a record of the earth and of the living organisms by which it is populated, follows the fortunes of the human family through the patriarchal period; then taking up the line of one family (that of Abraham) its writings are mainly devoted to a narrative of the events pertaining to the Hebrew, or Jewish nation, and those things that specially affect them, their interests and their individual and national polity.

The records of the Old Testament are as truly Hebraic, as is the history of England, English, or that of the United States of America, American; nor are those of the New Testament scarcely less so. Their laws, their domestic affairs, their national polity, manners, customs and religious worship, are the themes of prophet, psalmist, judge and king. The consolation of the Christ that "salvation is of the Jews," finds a reverberating echo through all the sacred writings from the time of Abraham onward to their final description of the restored Jewish theocracy of a renewed earth in the apocalypse.

The long-looked-for Messiah "came to his own, but his own received him not." He sent forth the apostles as missionaries to herald forth the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, and at the same time bade them not to "go into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans," said he to them, "enter ye not, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." It will be remembered, too, that in his conversation with the woman of Canaan, he plainly told her, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

So emphatically are the writings of the Bible Jewish that only one of the apostles of our Lord and Savior claims to have been chosen as a herald to any other people, and even he treats largely of the Israelites and of their relation to the future age. Another fact showing the intensely Israelitish character of the Bible, is that no nation, or people, except those more or less intimately connected with the Jews, is mentioned in its writings. Thus, China, whose historical record, it is claimed, is synchronous with, or antedates that of Abraham, finds no place in its pages; and the same is true of every other nationality not in some way associated with the descendants of Abraham.

Beloved for their fathers' sakes; made the recipients through them of the adoption, the glory and the covenants; to whom, also, pertained the service of God, and the promises; and of whom as concerning the flesh, Christ came; a peculiar people (treasure) unto God above all people; a kingdom of priests and a holy nation, the Jewish nation existed, by election, and by obedience, through the time of the judges, as a theocracy, with God as their chief ruler, to whom all questions of a domestic, civil or governmental character were referred for final decision.

Impiously requesting a king of Samuel, God hearkened to their solicitations, and gave them Saul for their king, and this form of government was retained until the Babylonian captivity, though they were still prompted, counselled and guided in nearly all their domestic, civil and national affairs (when desired and sought after by them,) by the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, through their prophets. In the palmy days of David's and Solomon's reigns, they were acknowledged to be "the kingdom of God;" the throne of the kingdom of Israel being known as "the throne of the Lord." Thus David says, "Of all my sons (for God hath given me many sons), he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord, over Israel," 1 Chron. xxviii. 5; and again, "Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father, and prospered, and all Israel obeyed him." 1 Chron. xxix. 23.

An extension of the promises made to the early fathers, embodying a continuance of regal power in the Davidical line, to his descendants, gave a peculiar character to the history of this people from David's reign to all succeeding generations. Of this also are the following: "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant, Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations." Psa. lxxxix. 3, 4. "Also I will make thy firstborn higher than the kings of the earth. My mercy will I keep for him forevermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him. His seed also will I make to endure forever, and his throne as the days of heaven. If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure forever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established forever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven." Psa. lxxxix. 27-37.

"For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel; neither shall the priests, the Levites, my ministers, want a man before me to offer burnt offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings, and to sacrifice continually." Jer. xxxiii. 17, 18. "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it; of the fruit of thy body will I sit upon thy throne. If thy children will keep my testimony that I shall teach them, their children shall also sit upon thy throne forevermore. For the Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest forever, here will I dwell; for I have desired it." Psa. cxxxii. 11-14.

Under the reign of Zedekiah the kingdom of God was overturned; its king with his sightless eyes, together with most of his subjects were carried captives to Babylon. Of this subjugation of Israel the prophet Ezekiel had forewarned the nation in the following words: "And thou profane, wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem and take off the crown: this shall not be the same; exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high; I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." Ezek. xxi. 25-27. The prophet Hosea prophesied of the same interregnum during which the sceptre was removed from Israel and Judah, and which continued from this captivity to its restoration in the person of the Christ. He says, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without a teraphim; afterward shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." Hosea iii. 4, 5.

That the nation of Israel enter largely as a factor into the labors of the future age will be shown under its appropriate head. That they have not yet regained their promised national status is the burthen of the Scriptures from their captivity through all the sacred narrative to its close. At the same time the full, undoubted, plain-spoken prophecy of a time when Israel must and will be nationally restored to their own land (Palestine) for future uninterrupted possession and unlimited prosperity is evidenced by language such as the following: "He," the Christ, "shall be great, and shall be called the son of the highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Israel forever: and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 31, 32. "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel: for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of David: as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets which have been since the world began: that we should be saved from our enemies and from the hand of all that hate us: to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant: the oath which he sware unto our father Abraham, that he would grant us, that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life." Ib. i. 68-75. The disciples on the road to Emmaus only expressed the common expectation of the Jews in relation to national deliverance when they said, "We trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel," Luke xxiv. 21, and the same is true of the eleven who enquired of the Savior just before his ascension into heaven, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Acts i. 6. As certainly, though less directly, does Christ's reply to the question of Peter as to the resurrection, or reward to be derived by the disciples for having left all and followed him, point to Israel's restoration; says he, "Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel," Matt. xix. 28; and also, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke xxii. 28-30.

Paul's language in this relation is explicit and plain; "For I would not, brethren," writes he to the Romans, "that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness (margin, hardness) in part, is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, there shall come out of Zion a deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the gospel they are enemies for your sakes; but as touching the election, they are beloved for their father's sakes. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." Rom. ii. 25-29. It was of this national regathering of Israel the prophet said, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is the name whereby he shall be called, The Lord Our Righteousness. Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but the Lord liveth which brought up, and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them: and they shall dwell in their own land." Jer. xxiii. 5-8; and, too, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah. In those days, and at that time, will I cause the Branch of righteousness to grow up unto David; and he shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land. In those days shall Judah be saved and Jerusalem shall dwell safely: and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, The Lord Our Righteousness. For thus saith the Lord: David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel; neither shall the priests, the Levites, want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings, and to do sacrifice continually. And the word of the Lord came unto Jeremiah, saying, Thus saith the Lord: if ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites, the priests, my ministers." Jer. xxxiii. 14-21.

It was through the partial blindness, hardness, and defection of Israel that they rejected Jesus, the Christ, their Messiah, from assuming the reins of government, as king of the Jews. It was this same blindness, and hardness, and defection on their part, that caused the record, "He came unto his own but his own received him not;" yet their rejection of him opened the way for the gospel of the kingdom of God to be preached to the Gentile nations. Had they (the Jews) accepted him as the Messiah, Israel would have become the true earth-rulers, under Christ, governing the world; but refusing him, and rejecting him, they take their allotted place, in the restoration, (restitution), to be governed by David's loyal Son, and the apostles, immortalized, under him, while to those Gentiles, of the present Gentile dispensation of grace, who by faith in, and obedience to the gospel (good news) of this age, who have formed characters such as are acceptable to God, "they having been grafted into the Abrahamic stock through Jesus Christ,—will be given the rulership (forfeited by the Jewish nation) over the nations, kindreds, tongues and people of the Gentile world during that glorious age. Hence the potency of Christ's language to the Jews, "Therefore I say unto you," says he, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof," Matt. xxi. 43; and of, "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth," Acts xiii. 46; and too, of "I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now, if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing (decay, or loss, margin) of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?" Rom. xi. 11, 12. Israel's apostasy however is only for a limited season, terminating with the close of the Gentile supremacy, under the gospel dispensation; for their national blindness will only extend to the close of that period known as "The times of the Gentiles," or as Paul has said, "until the times of the Gentiles be come in," (fulfilled). Now, having denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted (or released) unto them instead of their Savior, and having killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; Israel has been sifted among all nations, like as corn is sifted through a sieve; they have been made the tail and not the head among the nations; "a desolation, an astonishment, a hissing and a curse;" "a proverb and a byword, wherever they have been sifted; they have suffered the faithless in their hearts in the land of their enemies, so that, literally, the sound of a shaken leaf chased them, and made them to flee as fleeing from a sword; they have truly fallen when none pursued. They have fallen one upon another as it were before a sword when none pursued, and have had no power to stand before their enemies; they have perished among the heathen; the land of their enemies has eaten them up, and what was left have plied away in their enemies land. See Zech. xxvi. For more than eighteen centuries, Jerusalem, the beautiful, idolized capital city, has been overrun by Gentile hordes; their temple razed to the ground and the royal people not permitted to even worship towards Zion's holy hill. The Turk and the Saracen, the infidel and the Christian, the pope and the crusading knight have alike overrun the sacred soil of Judea, while her expatriated people have shed the bitter tears of banishment from land and home; of servility and degradation, unrelieved by any hope of a speedy relief.

Nor is the cup of their national dishonor yet drained to the dregs. Zechariah prophesies of a time, Zech. xiv. 1, 2, when in their distress, they will certainly be glad to cry out in the language of the prophet: "Lo, this is our God: we have waited for him and he will save us; this is our Lord: we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. xxv. 9. Their house has been left unto them desolate as the Lord prophesied it would be left, and in the distress of the nation immediately prior to the manifestation of his return to them, when there is apparently nothing left between them and utter extinction; when their land is overcome and their flocks, herds and farm products destroyed, by the armed forces of all the earth nations; their restored Jerusalem taken and the houses rifled; their children slain and their women subjected to the passions of unbridled lust; with one half of their citizens torn from their homes and driven into bondage; then it is that the whole house of Israel will gladly accept deliverance from the despised Nazarene; then it is that they will accept him as the one who should redeem Israel; then will they say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord" even as the Savior prophesied, and they will accept him as "King of the Jews," while ascriptions of praise and honor and blessing from the redeemed of all nations will blend with their hosannas, in proclaiming him "King of kings and Lord of lords," through the age of the ages, world without end.

BIBLE STUDY.

Our minds cannot grow without ideas, and ideas are worth nothing unless formed into individual views, and—thank God that it is so—individual views that are our own, and so growing and germinant, are obtained only by work—by my work for them. "The Son of God has given us an understanding that we may know"—"not the knowledge is given," says one, "but the ability, the power and the opportunity to gain the knowledge." "If the intellectual possessions of the present," says another, a great secular writer, "are not to melt under our hands they must be acquired anew;" and he goes on to quote from another, "What you have inherited from your fathers, acquire it that you may possess it."

All this is of greater importance in biblical matters by so much as they rise into vastly more enduring significance. God would have us busy at his book, honestly busy, busy through our own powers. Inherited wealth, we often say, is not a blessing, where it stands in the way of its possessor learning anything for himself. Too much seeing through other's eyes, learning through other's toil, may prove the most delusive kind of seeing and learning. If our Christianity is to become strong it must cease to coop as possible to be fed with a spoon. How long we puzzled in years gone by over the text of so much Bible. Why was it not the little book that many practically make it? Why, we answer in reply, was not the land of Canaan the contracted region in the centre of Palestine that it threatened to become? Because they needed the training and discipline of the whole life of promise. Not Judah alone, nor Reuben alone, nor Naphtali alone, but each and all must fight till the whole land was in possession. "Nor can a Christian rest in anything which has been already gained. New acquisitions of knowledge, new modes of thought, new forms of society, are always calling for interpretation, for recognition, for adjustment."—Prof. W. W. Lovejoy.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

At our meeting at the Antioch Church on Sunday last, Aug. 12, we had the privilege of baptizing a Sister, Mrs. Mary Thomas, into the Divine Name upon her confession of faith. She had been a faithful worker in the Sunday School for some time, and we hope her new relation to the Church and to her blessed Redeemer, will result in her advancement in the Divine life, and in the advancement of the interests of the Church.

SHOULD health remain good as at present with self and family we expect to attend the Conference at Dutton, Mich. We hope the contemplated Conferences in Michigan and Indiana may be attended with the Divine blessing in encouraging the brethren and in devising methods for the further extension of the cause of our loved Redeemer. Should we fail to reach the Conference, our brethren will attribute the failure to poor health.

PLANTING CHRISTIAN ANTHEMS.

In a paper of last week we read of a man who was bedding out and arranging some flowers, and who, in reply to a question as to what he was doing, said that he was planting out some Christian Anthems, meaning Chrysanthemums. Well Christian Anthems are by no means the plants to be despised. Job, narrating his own former course of life in succoring the distressed, says: "I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy." When Israel's thirst was miraculously assuaged in the desert, the anthem was—"Spring up, O well; sing ye unto it." The glorious future will be the time for planting Christian Anthems. Of Jerusalem we read: "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem." Of the resurrection of God's people: "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out her dead." Of the nations in the coming age: "O let the nations be glad and sing for joy: for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth." Of the redeemed returning we read: "The redeemed of the Lord shall return and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their head; they shall obtain gladness and joy: and sorrow and mourning shall flee away." It was the work of Christ himself, to plant Christian Anthems. It is appointed unto him, among many other blessings to bestow, "to give the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the Spirit of heaviness." When the poor sinner experiences the "joy and peace" there is in believing, it is then that the Christian Anthems are planted in his heart. God planted an Eden upon earth with choicest flowers, but in man's poor heart he has planted Christian Anthems. If we plant some Chrysanthemums in our gardens, let us also plant some Christian Anthems in sorrowing hearts.

Communications.

To the Church of God in the United States and Canada, and Sister Churches Affiliating with Them, by Whatsoever Name they may be Called, Greeting.

"The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of Light."

An anxious retrospect by many thoughtful members of the Church, reveals the fact that during the last twenty years, Churches, some large, some small, have been formed, existed for a brief period and then gone out of existence; that in other cases Churches would have been formed, but for the fact that the evangelist has been driven away from the field with his work half completed because there was no aid rendered him in his work, and his family necessities required him to abandon the work and return to his daily labor.

In many cases Churches built up on the doctrines first taught them, have had fatal discords introduced among them by later and unauthorized preachers teaching contrary doctrines. To correct these and other errors of the past, and to increase tenfold the good now being accomplished it is the belief of many that the time is full ripe for an organized Union of the Church, in all places, and for concentrated persistent effort in proclaiming the Gospel to the many who have never had it properly presented to them. To bring about a Union of all the Churches into "one body." It has been proposed to have a general conference of the Church, to be held this year, represented by delegates from each Church in the country under about the following conditions.

1st. Let each Church of twenty members (or a group of smaller Churches to the number of twenty or more members) meet, vote upon and send to the Editor of THE RESTITUTION before October first 1888, the result of the vote as to when and where this general conference shall be held, and also the name and address of a delegate of sound judgment and discretion (not necessarily a preacher, unless the Church so prefers it), who shall represent, and cast the vote of the Church on the business matters brought before the Conference.

Each delegate to take with him to the conference a written certificate from the clerk or presiding officer of the Church, stating that he is the accredited delegate representing, and entitled to vote for that Church in the general conference of the Church of God and sister Churches wherever it may be held. This meeting, when held should extend for ten days, over two Sundays, say from Friday evening to the second Monday evening, and the time and place for holding it will be announced by the Editor of THE RESTITUTION, as shall best represent the choice of a majority of the Churches writing to him before October 1st. The questions each delegate will have power to vote upon will be—

a. A Covenant, the same in all Churches, short and Scriptural, which shall be subscribed to by all members as they are received into the Church.

b. The arrangement of the best and most permanent form of collecting the income needed for the support of each individual Church; and of providing a fund for general evangelistic work; and who shall administer to that fund.

c. How weak and needy churches can best be fostered and cared for.

d. How, and under what authority shall general or special evangelists represent the Church.

e. The power to make rules for the government of this and future yearly general conferences, and to decide when and where the next general conference shall meet, and how delegates may be appointed.

f. If any other propositions are presented at this general conference, they may be voted upon by the delegate subject to its ratification by his Church.

That lack of means may not prevent any delegate from attending this important conference, the Church at Philadelphia agrees that, where a Church is not able to bear the entire expense of sending its delegate, each of such delegates shall receive a contribution of $10.00 toward his expenses, if the general conference is held west of Harrisburg, Pa., or of $20.00 each if it is held east of Harrisburg. The Philadelphia Church also offers if the conference is held in Philadelphia that each delegate shall be provided for without cost during the time of the Conference in Philadelphia. Doubtless other cities would do as well. This call meets the approval of Elder O. C. Ramsey, our Pastor in Phila., of Elder Geo. R. Kramer, Pastor of the Church of the Blessed Hope in Brooklyn, and doubtless of many others in the Churches of Brooklyn, Baltimore, Winchester and other places. The Eastern Churches do not insist on this Conference being held in the East, if in the judgment of the Church, it is best to hold it anywhere in the West. For the Church at Philadelphia. GEO. F. WORK.

[As we received the above at too late a date to make any remarks or suggestions for the present number, we thought best not to delay placing it before our brethren on that account, more especially as some Conferences are to be held so soon. So we give the Circular Letter at once for consideration and action and entreat our brethren to give the latter prompt and earnest consideration at the soon coming Conferences in Indiana and Michigan, as well as among the churches. ### LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE PATRIARCH JACOB.—No. 1.

We have entered into the era of sentiment now, such as it is, and it is very interesting, to say no more, to observe how the modern ideals of virtue evolved from "modern thought," contemn the rugged and sturdy righteousness, so to speak, of the holy men of old. I am not aware of a single exception to the rule of absurd criticism that is applied to the worthies of the Old Testament Scriptures, and if those of the New Testament escape the reason is that the histories of their lives are not depicted with the unsparing exactness of their brethren of the former ages. Those of us who are partially acquainted with the works of infidel authors know that the Son of the living God has not been exempted from this role, and I have both seen in print and heard from the platform, contumely and contempt poured upon his sacred name.

I would choose the name of Jacob, however, as the name that heads the list of all the others, as the one upon which has been heaped the most abuse by a generation whose refinement has so attenuated its intellect in some points that it can hardly be said to be responsible for anything outside of the circle of the newspapers and a ring of professors that do its thinking for it.

The Lord God, Jehovah, as recorded in the Old Testament, has condescended to be known to all future ages as "the God of Jacob," and as one is known by the company he keeps, not only is Jacob's own character involved but that of the God that loved him and rejected Esau is involved also. Jacob is denounced as a sneak; if so then God is the God of a sneak; Jacob has been denounced as an unscrupulous Jew in the very worst sense that that word is used, and the God that favors such a one is implicated in his behavior. This is my apology for introducing the subject; it is not merely a historical argument I intend to make, but a defense of the living God of Jacob, in whom "there is no unrighteousness" and "no variableness nor shadow of turning," the "same yesterday, today and forever." Verily I pity some poor, dear souls whom I have seen, who really have been at their wits' end to account for the choice of God in Jacob and been altogether unable to account for the rejection of the heroic (?) Esau, and indeed not being able to accomplish the task of accounting for it, have concluded that it is one of the things in the providence of God past finding out.

The history of Jacob, as related in the Old Testament is very briefly narrated, and yet very exactly. The salient points of his character are sketched by the hand of an artist clearly and distinctly, so that even a child can understand; but in order to understand the incidents narrated in regard to him we have to use our memories, and what intelligence we are granted to have in placing the characters in the proper situations. In other words we have to think who they were and where they were; we also have to take into consideration the motives that actuated them, and the question of rights that possibly is obsolete in our locality, or our age. For instance, to begin with, Esau is spoken of as the "eldest" and Jacob as the "youngest" brother; but we ought to bear in mind that they were twins, conceived and born together and it is specially related that at birth "Jacob's hand took hold of Esau's heel." Now whether this occurred in actual fact or is only an expression or orientalism, it seems intended to fix our minds on the fact that the interval between the birth of each was very little; but you will observe that all through the narrative Esau is the acknowledged "eldest;" to him came the honors and the birthright, the rights and titles to the life that now is, the heirship to everything else that may accrue by the law or custom of primogeniture. I can fancy Isaac taking him around and introducing him as the "eldest;" he was the big boy and somebody, and Jacob was the little boy and nobody.

Is it necessary for me to argue concerning the injustice and absurdity of such proceeding? We have still something like it in old England in the landed estates there: the eldest takes everything, the youngest can be "willed away with a shilling." Now this kind of thing might be bearable, although bad enough, where there is an actual difference in age; then the eldest brethren may swagger somewhat more gracefully as in the case of David's brethren before the Philistines. But when, as in this case, the whole matter was founded on so small a base, we might almost say pretence, a mere formula, I do not believe that there is one of my readers that would not be indignant at such absurd treatment, and would test every law in the land to claim equal rights and privileges on an equal footing, and there is no doubt that it caused bitterness and contention between the brothers. No doubt Esau swaggered a good deal, he was that kind, and we may judge that the first bringing up of the subject was not over the "mess of pottage."

And over this mess of pottage has there not been a hideous mess of misunderstanding multiplied of course by the Pharisee purity of our "refined" age? It seems that one day when the parents, Isaac and Rebecca were absent from the house, possibly Isaac had gone to the other end of the ranch to see after his stock, and Rebecca maybe was visiting their neighbors the "daughters of Heth," the boys came home and found no dinner ready. Jacob coming first went to work like a sensible person, built a fire and cooked some soup. It must be understood now that Jacob was hungry; the word does not exactly say so, but here is a point where a little intelligence helps us out and enables us to know that no big boy goes to work to cook his dinner until he is hungry enough to eat it himself. And be it observed, Jacob was only cooking his own dinner, otherwise he would have had no right to refuse to give his brother some, but he had a right to refuse in this case and Esau acknowledged that right; but oh, my! he was so hungry, he would die! I should not wonder if he did not lay down in the shade and have a good cry because his mother did not have his dinner ready. Of course he had as much access to the "lentil" bag as Jacob, according to all accounts he had more business round the promises than his brother; but he, he was too hungry to go to work and cook his dinner. I don't suppose that Jacob forgot to tell him where the lentil bag hung and no doubt he offered to lend him the pot and fire when he was done with it, but the "first born" must be waited on and pampered, and I fancy Jacob let him know it just then, most of us would under the circumstances. We would have said, "Well now here, we come home hungry and we cook our dinner; you have brought some game home no doubt, you've been hunting, cook that if lentils take too long. Here's milk back in the pantry tent, and if that is sour father will not say anything to you if you go and milk one of the goats, you are the 'pet' and the 'first born,' and have the 'birthright.'" But birthrights was nothing to him now, he had to gorge or die at once, and there has been more wasted sentiment gushed over this one little incident than would drown a whole shipload of honest men. Jacob has been abused as a heartless wretch that would not give his brother something to eat, when the fact is he had to provide his own dinner or put up with what cold chops he could find around the house; anyhow he didn't die, he found something to stay his stomach and secure his rights, for his they were quite as much as they were Esau's, as we before called attention to.

Now Esau is invariably looked upon as the hero of this story, a man all appetite, and who made no attempt to control it. Loud, self-assertive, and animal, his hunger is to be considered alone, and he comes home bawling his agony and his distress, and wants everybody to feel he is the only person that has a right to be hungry, and he has secured the admiration and pity of many worthy people that ought to know better. But so it is all the world over. When quite "plain" Jacob unostentatiously cooks his own soup in a corner and eats it by himself the world passes him by unheeded, but let Esau come along shouting for "death or porridge" and the same big world opens to him the innermost recesses of her ear and all the flood gates of her "sentiment;" he gets his name in the papers and goes picnicing to the beer gardens with such mottoes as "our children cry for bread," and if he should happen to get hanged all the newspapers men crowd around him to interview him about it and report how he looked, what he said, how he said it, how he washed his face, combed his hair and shaved himself, and this is "modern sentiment"—let it pass.

Let it be borne in mind from this point on that Esau was no longer the "first born;" what he had gained at first by a slim chance he lost at last by a supernatural; and it was not a bargain lightly struck, it was solemnly sworn to. But oaths are light things to such characters as that of Esau; he seems to have digested his with his pottage, for he never after seemed to give it a passing thought. He still passed himself off for the "first born" and so announced himself afterwards in the scene of "the blessing." Now it seems that here there is an appearance of subterfuge that is scarcely defensible; but as usual this point has been enormously magnified besides being misunderstood. The little episode was a family affair then, it was not a strife over wealth, or an empire, it dealt with the impalpable matters of the loves and preferences of parents and children. There were here wrongs, but the question is who is the wronged. The sequel shows. We have called attention to the fact and mean to emphasize it, that the boys are twin brothers of the same age; but let it be remarked that the father when on the brink of the grave as he thought, called to mind that he had one son, he was the one that cooked his venison, him he was going to bless. The other seems to have quietly slipped out of his memory more or less, until he recalled the voice. Is there any justice in such a proceeding? Is one length ahead at the start to handicap a child forever? Overlooking the fact that even that in this case had been sworn away.

I can fancy Rebecca's indignation when she heard that her boy was totally ignored and that Esau was to receive the one blessing; poor Esau, for he was to be pitied in this case, even he was surprised to find that the father had made no arrangements for a second. Jacob profited by this lesson; we observe that when he came to die he called all his sons and blessed them all, particularly the youngest; to him birthrights counted not. Perhaps it is useless to try and defend the course that Rebecca pursued to secure her boy his rights to be recognised in the family. She certainly was responsible for the deception on Isaac and assumed the responsibility unhesitatingly, for when Jacob feared to offend his father she replied, "On me be thy curse my son." But there is one thing that strikes me in this case as strange, and in fact all through the life and story of Jacob, no one in his day can be found to accuse him of wrong to his face. His traducers, both infidel and theological, have all allowed an interval of millenniums to intervene before bringing up the charges. Now Isaac, when he found he had been so grossly imposed upon as our friends assert, ought to have grown indignant, called back Jacob and given him a lecture on lying and the evil of deceiving an aged and blind parent. But we find nothing of this. "I have blessed him, yea and he shall be blessed; and he lifted up his voice and wept." Ah yes! he remembered now that he had another boy that he had never considered at all as a member of the family and that now he had crept up at the last moment, kneeled at his feet and begged his blessing, and in order to receive it he had to assume his brother's name, and conscience smitten for his unfatherly and irrational conduct he called him in a second time as he was departing to Laban and bestowed on him a second blessing. Let us pass over the next flood of gush that has been poured on Esau. In the rage of his disappointment, violent and vain he had no object in receiving the blessing but what was animal and mercenary, and being thus deprived his heart meditated murder, at least he went round among the neighbors and gave it out that as soon as his father was dead he would put an end to his brother. On this score Jacob has been accused of cowardice in fleeing to Laban, but such was not the case. If Esau had a quarrel with his brother, now was the time to fight it out, but I rather think that it was not fighting that Esau was after, but shooting. He was an adept with the bow and arrow, and Rebecca considered it best to send Jacob out of range.

Now Jacob was a "plain" man, do what we can with Jacob we can never make a hero of him; there seems to have been nothing romantic in his composition, but he was a first rate kind of a man to have for a neighbor. Reader, when you have to live beside a man always prefer a plain one; the hero, he looks well at a distance, through a long vista of years or over a vast tract of territory with an ocean or two intervening, but as a neighbor he is not a success; he begins to shoot too early in the morning and keeps up his drumming too late at night, and if your house isn't burned about your ears or some shot impinged into your joints, you will be more fortunate than many decent people who have been suddenly caught in a drove of horses and couldn't get away in time. Violent of temper, vain and loud; even if the threats that Esau vented against Jacob were merely threats, it certainly was a case where "prudence was the better part of valor" in order to prevent further disturbance if not the shedding of blood, and the motto of all good men ought to be "avoid trouble" as much as possible, even at the risk of being regarded by swaggers as cowardly, and the blessing of the God of Jacob will be bestowed on such conduct.

Dear Restitution:

Although the devil tried to hinder God's cause, yet he is raising up more people to stand for his blessed word. I praise God, although tried, yet not cast down, neither forsaken, for God is with me and Christ in me the hope of glory. Many friends of America have written to me and asked me what I think about "the Restoration of Israel." I resolved in my mind to make a thorough study of my Bible and see what God has to say about this great subject, and to answer through your excellent paper THE RESTITUTION. Why should we keep the truths under the bushel, let the people know what God says about this dear people, who have been persecuted and even are persecuted today. God has not cast away his people; although they have sinned yet God is a God of love and he is at last to bring this people out of this state to a blessed and glorified state, when all the nations shall know their God.

My soul weeps for this people. I have seen some of them persecuted, whipped, etc., and I want to do all I can to deliver them from the hands of their enemy. Christians who hold that this people will perish and not be saved, they need the Spirit of God to shed abroad into their hearts the love of their Master. If they have the love of God in their hearts I would wonder how they are permitted to oppose this people.

The Jews in this country are the most honest people that I know. Among the Jews you cannot find a woman who commits adultery with others. All of them are kept in purity; and some of them are trying to find Messiah, which is interpreted the Christ, the anointed One. The Jews of this country are a very diligent people, and many of them have acquired a good knowledge of languages as French, German, English, Italian, etc. Among the Jews of this country you cannot find many lazy people remaining idle without any work. Yet this people are persecuted even by Christians and hated by many of the present day Christians of America. O children of God, let us show mercy toward this people and do all we can for them for now is the time and now is the day that we can help them.

In Palestine this people is daily increasing; many of them are expecting Jesus to come and be their king and to reign on Mt. Zion.

Let us now see what God says about this people. Reader, I beg you in the name of God, study his word; hold it fast, believe it and proclaim it; fear not mortals who will or might call you cranks, or persecute you. Let God speak, we, his servants and children will gladly hear and believe what he says. Search the Scriptures, prove all things, hold fast that which is good. Now let us see:

1. God's object for casting away the Jews what it was? Rom. xi. 15, 25, 30.

2. God's promise is, to gather the Jews out of all lands and bring them back into their own land. (This is fulfilling almost at the present day; watch the news from Palestine.) Deut. xxx. 1–6; Isa. i. 26–28; xi. 11, 12; xiv. 1–3; xvlii. 3; xxvii. 12; liv. 6–17; Jer. xii. 14, 15; xvi. 14, 15; xxiii. 3, 8; xxix. 14; xxx. 18, 19; xxxii. 37, 39, 41; Ezek. xxxvi. 24; xxix. 21; xxxix. 25–29; Amos ix. 14, 15; Obad. xvii. 21; Acts iii. 20.

3. The Jews will begin "to seek the Lord" and God has promised "to redeem them, to save them, and to sanctify them." Psa. lxxxix: 3, 4, 34–37; Jer. l. 4, 5; Ezek. xxxvii: 23, 27, 28; Isa. i. 25; Mal. iii. 3, 4.

4. The Jews, or Israel will be judged by the twelve apostles at the great day. Matt. xix. 28; Luke xiii: 28; Matt. viii. 12; Matt. xxv. 31.

5. The dead Jews will be resurrected at Christ's appearing. Ezek. xxxvii. 1–14.

6. The Jews, or Israel will obtain mercy through our mercy. Rom. xi, 30, 31.

7. How many of the Jews or of Israel will be saved? "All" see Rom. xi. 26; Isa. xlv. 17; Jer. xxx. 17–22; Rom. ix. 8.

8. The Lord will acknowledge the Jews, or Israel, that they are his sons. Hos. i. 10.

9. The land promised to Abraham and his seed will be inherited also by the Jews. Gen. xii. 7; xiii. 14–17; xxvi. 3–5; xxviii. 4, 13; Isa. xxxv. 1, 2; Ezek. xxxvi. 28, 29, 33–36; Rev. xx. 1–6.

10. They that oppressed them will suffer for it; for it is not God's will. Deut. xxx. 7; Isa. xlix. 25, 26; lxi. 5–7; Jer. xlvi. 28, 50; xxxiii. 34; Micah v. 8, 9.

11. They that deny the restoration of the Jews will come to the time when Jehovah will call upon them to testify concerning it. Jer. xxxi. 10, 11; xxxiii. 9.

12. Israel, or the Jews now persecuted, will then be "an eternal excellency and a joy of many generations, and a praise among all people." Isa. lx. 14, 15, 18; Zeph. iii. 20.

13. At last Christ will sit on the throne of David and be the eternal King of Israel. Ezek. xxxvii. 21–28; Micah vii. 16; Dan ii. 44, 45; Luke i. 32, 33; Isa. ix. 6, 7.

So much for the present about these people. The Bible is the faith that I have. Read and study the above passages and don't pay attention to what people say. Let this subject be proved with a "thus saith the Lord" and then stand for it, in it, and with it. Fear not, for the Lord is our protector. Preach the truth, for you will be responsible; the devil might judge you but you know that he is a liar from the beginning. The world will persecute you; fear not, the world is enmity against God and will pass away with its pride, etc., but those that do the will of God will abide for ever. God bless you; pray for me. Love to all the saints. Thanks for sending THE RESTITUTION to me. I believe the truth will be affirmed soon. I am your servant in Jesus.

The Comfort of Faith.

The comfort of faith is in the help it gives beyond the realm of sight. So long as we can see just what God is doing for us, and just why he does it, we feel no need of faith. Our reason is sufficient for our encouragement. But when sight fails us, and we can see neither the what nor the why of God's dealings in our behalf, then it is for our faith in the loving and wise God to be our stay and our cheer. Charles Kingsley, indeed, suggests that faith is "reason exercised on the invisible." And thus it is that faith can give to us, in the realm of the unseen, a rest that is as sure as the rest which reason gives to us in any portion of the realm of the seen.

PAUL'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 4.

The man of sin was to come with all power and signs and lying wonders, in all deceivableness of unrighteousness. Just as the apostles wrought miracles to confirm the gospel they preached—or rather, as the Lord wrought with them and confirmed the word with signs following—so Satan would work with antichrist, endorsing his pretensions with false miracles designed to overthrow the gospel. Bishop John Jewell, of Salisbury, wrote in the sixteenth century:

"Of the first sort of false miracles, we have seen an infinite number in the days of our fathers, in the kingdom of antichrist. Then was there an appearance of spirits and visions of angels, our lady came swimming down from heaven; poor souls came creeping and crying out of purgatory, and jetted abroad; and kept stations, casting flakes of fire, and beset highways, and bemoaned their cases, the pains and torments were so bitter.

"They sought for help, and cried for good prayers; they cried for dirges, they cried for masses of requiem, for masses of scala celi, for trentals of masses. Hereof grew portesls of pardons, and hereof grew the province of purgatory, the most gainful country that ever was under the city of Rome.

"But these miracles were no miracles at all; they were devised by subtle varlets and lusy lordanes for a purpose, to get money. Oftentimes the spirit has been taken and laid in the stocks; the angel has been stript; the good lady has been caught; the conveyance of the miracle has appeared; the engines, and sleights, and the cause, and the manner of the working have been confessed.

"In these days idols could go on foot; rods could speak; bells could ring alone; images could come down, and light their own candles; dead stocks could sweat, and bestir themselves; they could turn their eyes; they could move their hands; they could open their mouths; they could heal the sick, and raise up the dead.

"These miracles were conveyances and subtleties, and indeed no miracles; the trunks by which they spake, the strings and wires with which they moved their faces and hands, all the rest of their treachery, have been disclosed. These are the miracles of which Paul speaks—miracles in sight, in appearance, but indeed no miracles.

"....It was also arranged, that the saints should not have power to work in all places. Some wrought at Canterbury, some at Walsingham, some at York, some at Buxton, some in one place, some in another, some in the towns, some in the fields. Even as Jeremiah said among the Jews, chapter xi. 'According to the number of thy cities were thy gods'. Hereof grew pilgrimages and worshiping of images, and kissing of reliques; hereof grew obligations, and onrioshing of abbeys; every man had his peculiar saint on whom he called; every country was full of chapels, every chapel full of miracles, and every miracle full of lies.

"These miracles are wrought by antichrist; they are his tools, wherewith he worketh; they are his weapons, wherewith he prevaileth; they are full of lying, full of deceitfulness, and full of wickedness: so shall antichrist prevail, and rule over the world. By these miracles he shall possess the ears, the eyes, and the hearts of many, and shall draw them after him."

It was alleged that miracles were not only wrought by the saints, but even by the relics of the saints. In Calvin's tractate on the subject of relics, he proves that the great majority of the relics in use among Romanists are spurious, having been brought forward by impostors, so that every apostle is made to have three or four bodies, and every saint two or three, and that the garments of Christ are almost infinite in number! As his body ascended to heaven, relics of it were not of course available; but spurious relics of everything he ever used or handled have been multiplied ad nauseam. Even the body of Christ has not escaped; the teeth, the hair, and the blood are exhibited in hundreds of places; the manger in which he was laid at his birth, the linen in which he was swaddled, his cradle, the first shirt his mother put on him, the pillar against which he leant in the temple, the water-pots that were at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, and even the wine that was made in them, the shoes that he used when he was a boy, the table on which he observed the Lord's Supper, and hundreds of similar things are shown—many of them in a number of places—to this day. And as to the relics connected with our Lord's sufferings and death, they are just innumerable. The fragments of the true cross scattered over the globe would, if catalogued, fill a volume. "There is no town, however small, which has not some morsel of it; and this not only in the principal cathedral church of the district, but also in parish churches. There is scarcely an abbey so poor as not to have a specimen. In some places larger fragments exist, as at Paris, Poictiers, and Rome. If all the pieces which could be found were collected into a heap, they would form a good ship load; though the gospel testifies that a single individual was able to carry the real cross. What effrontery then thus to fill the whole world with fragments which it would take more than three hundred men to carry!.... In regard to the crown of thorns, it would seem that its twigs had been planted that they might grow again; otherwise I know not how it could have attained such a size.....I would never come to an end were I to go one by one over all the absurd articles they have drawn into this service. At Rome is shown the reed which was put into our Savior's hand as a sceptre; ....the sponge which was offered to him containing vinegar mixed with gall. How, I ask, were those things recovered? They were in the hands of the wicked. Did they give them to the apostles that they might preserve them for relics, or did they themselves look them up that they might preserve them for some future period? What blasphemy to abuse the name of Christ by employing it as a a cloak for such driveling fables!"

Among the images that Rome worships, a certain class are miraculous. The figure on the crucifix of Burgos in Spain is said to have a beard which grows perpetually, and there are similar ones in three or four other places. The stupid people believe the fable to be true. Other crucifixes are said to have spoken—a whole number. Others shed tears, as for instance one at Troves, and another at Orleans. From others the warm blood flows periodically. Miraculous images of the virgin are even more numerous. As they hold that the body of the virgin ascended to heaven like that of her Son, they cannot pretend to have her bones like those of the saints. Had it been otherwise, they would have given her a body of such size as would fill a thousand coffins. But they have made up for this lack by her hair and her milk. There is no town however small, no monastery or nunnery however insignificant, which does not possess some of this—some in small, others in large quantities. As Calvin says: "Had the breasts of the most holy virgin yielded a more copious supply than is given by a cow, and had she continued to nurse during her whole lifetime, she could scarcely have furnished the quantity which is exhibited. I would fain know," he asks, "how it was collected so as to be preserved until our time. Luke relates the prophecy which Simeon made to the virgin, but he does not say that Simeon asked her to give him some milk." The fabrication of these relics was a lucrative trade throughout the middle ages; especially were dead bodies invested with sacredness by attaching to them the names of saints and martyrs. Toulouse, for instance, thinks it possesses six bodies of the apostles: James, Andrew, James the Less, Philip, Simeon, and Jude; but duplicates of those bodies are also in St. Peter's and other churches in Rome. Matthias has also another at Treves; and there are heads and arms of him existing at different places sufficient to make up another body. What shall we say of the spirit that encourages the belief in lies and deceives men in this style? The degradation inflicted on the ignorant and unlearned by those fables is terrible, as any one who watches their effect in Ireland or on the Continent is aware. Whether the miracles of the man of sin be real or pretended, true or false, it matters little. The main point is, they are directed to establish a falsehood. "His relics for his success on the effects to be wrought in human minds by wonders and deceits accomplished in the energy of Satan." He employs wonders and deceits, a pretense to miraculous powers. Romanism has availed herself of such fraudulent practices to an enormous extent, and has profited by them both financially and otherwise.

But lying wonders to impose on the ignorant and superstitious masses were not the only means by which the Papacy attained its power in the middle ages; spurious documents, impostures of another kind, were used to influence the royal, noble, and educated classes. Principal among these were the celebrated decretal epistles, a forgery which produced the most important consequences for the Papacy, though its spurious nature was ultimately detected. Gibbon writes: "Before the end of the eighth century, some apostolic scribe, perhaps the notorious Isidore, composed the 'decretals' and the 'donation of Constantine'—the two magic pillars of the spiritual and temporal monarchy of the popes. This memorable donation was introduced to the world by an epistle of Pope Adrian I., who exhorts Charlemagne to imitate the liberality and revive the name of the great Constantine. Their effect was enormous in advancing both the temporal power and the ecclesiastical supremacy of the popes. The donation of Constantine founded the one, and false decretals the other. The latter pretended to be decrees of the early bishops of Rome limiting the independence of all archbishops and bishops by establishing a supreme jurisdiction of the Roman see in all causes, and forbidding national councils to be held without its consent. "Upon these spurious decretals," says Mr. Hallam in his "History of the Middle Ages," "was built the great fabric of papal supremacy over the different national Churches—a fabric which has stood after its foundation crumbled beneath it, for no one has pretended to deny for the last two centuries that the imposture is too palpable for any but the most ignorant ages to credit." It is evident then that Romanism has fulfilled this part of the prophecy of the "man of sin," even him whose coming was to be after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders and all deceivableness of unrighteousness. The power of the popes was built up on frauds and deceits of this character, and has been maintained over all the nations subject to it ever since by pretended miracles, spurious relics, lying wonders, and unrighteous deceits. And all these have been employed to oppose the gospel and establish falsehood.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA

Appears once in history—a real person, whose character and function in the execution of the Divine purpose are very briefly, but expressively, portrayed in the Bible narrative. There are four accounts of him; respectively in Matthew xxvii. 57–61; Mark xv. 42–47; Luke xxiii. 50–56; and John xix. 38–42.

From these independent testimonies we learn that he was a rich man, that he belonged to a Jewish city (anciently called Ramah, where the great Samuel dwelt), that he was a counsellor—that is, a member of the Sanhedrim or chief court of the Jews, that he was a good man, and a just; a man of faith also—for he waited for the Kingdom of God.

When Jesus of Nazareth began his wonderful works, and delivered his heavenly message, Joseph was a looker on and a listener; and applying his usual honest tests to that which he saw and heard, he became satisfied that this was very Christ—the Messiah promised to the fathers; and thereupon became Jesus' disciple. He did not occupy Jesus in the wondering crowds with which he was generally surrounded, but took quiet means of learning the progress of his evangelization in the land of Israel, and the further proofs which every day afforded that this was "a teacher sent from God, for no man could do the works which he did except God were with him."

The fear of the Jews was upon him, and he therefore kept secret his acceptance of Jesus as the Christ; waiting his time when it would be wise or safe to declare himself at one with the wonderful Nazarene. Nicodemus was another man of the same rank and in the same station, and of whom the apostles give us some account. He appears three times in the gospel history; not only as a visitor to Jesus by night (John iii.), but as a just and impartial pleader in the Sanhedrim (John vii. 45–52), and afterwards in company with Joseph at the end (John xix. 39).

Of Joseph we have the satisfactory testimony that in the trial of Jesus he boldly resisted both the counsel and the deed of that unrighteous assembly, Luke xxiii. 51. There was an old and well understood law in the Sanhedrim, that they were forbidden to judge a capital offense in the night time—the righteous law of God was too merciful to allow this; and it was also contrary to usage and by-law of the same court to be in haste in judging so serious a matter. How grossly were both of these provisions violated in this case—the popular Teacher and Benefactor is surprised after nightfall, and traitorously brought into their midnight conclave, and by nine o'clock next morning led out to execution! Who, having the heart of a man, or even the barest sense of justice, could stand to see such flagrant perversion of law and equity without entering his protest against it—secret disciple though he be? Joseph gave his vote for the life of Jesus; he "did not consent to the counsel and deed of them."

Let us not allow one thought of disparagement to Joseph of Arimathea because he was only secretly a disciple of Jesus. This resolute stand against the acts of his fellows required more bravery than we may at first suppose. He had heard on a previous occasion the taunt with which Nicodemus had been greeted when he uttered the just and reasonable observation—"Does our law judge any man before it hear him and knoweth what he doeth?" And he very well knew the temper of the rulers of the Jews towards his Master. It is an easy thing to follow the multitude even in the most ridiculous things, to appear a fool in the eyes of respectable people when there are plenty others equally foolish. In the crowd the most bashful can sing revival hymns, or march after the big drum and the flag shouting exciting words, but to stand alone in the Town Council or the Kirk Session against the popular wish requires a courage which comparatively few can exhibit. This was the part played by Joseph of Arimathea, and for it he commands our admiration. Thus he and Nicodemus proved themselves worthy followers of the Just One, "who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth."

The presence of this protest was an important clause in the indictment against that court. They could not be unaware how miraculously and illegally they had prosecuted the mock trial of Jesus; and it was this unrighteous violation of law which gave the special force and sting to the accusation of Stephen, addressed to the same council—"Ye have slain the prophets which showed before the coming of the Just One—of him ye have been now the betrayers and murderers."

When Jesus was apprehended, all his disciples forsook him and fled. This state of desertion is not at all mitigated by the fact of two of them following at a distance and entering into the court of the High Priest's house; for one of these in most cowardly manner three times denied his Lord, and the other, although "known to the High Priest," used no influence with him. No—of Jesus it may be said at this time, "He looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but he found not any." Was his whole work and testimony for these three years and more to end ignominiously? It appeared so. In a few hours he was crucified on Calvary, and the collapse was complete, for to all unbiassed onlookers it was apparent that "he who saved others could not save himself."

"All his acquaintance and the women that followed him from Galilee stood afar off seeing these things." In the last hour of his sufferings, however, there was one man of his friends who came close up to the cross, and three women accompanied him. The mother of Jesus was there, and with her a sister, and the enthusiastic Mary of Magdala. Their love was perhaps stronger than their faith, and the sympathy of these companions for her, through whose soul the sword had now pierced, made them set at defiance all scorn and reproach of the people. Is not woman stronger than man in the hour of trial and desertion?

It is finished! That voice which spoke the words of God is now silent; those hands, whose touch healed every manner of disease, are helplessly nailed to the cross; that face, which had glowed with supernal intelligence and love, is pale and drooping in death. It is finished! What now? There can be no more now. The official witnesses have gone home, the crowd thins away, the soldiers come closer to the malefactors to finish the agonies of the day by breaking their legs and dispatching them before the crosses are taken down. Jesus is saved this indignation, for, happily, he is already dead, and "not a bone of him is broken." Yet a soldier pierces his side with a spear, and thereout comes blood and water. Most unmistakably the end has come; Jesus of Nazareth is dead, and thus his lofty pretensions are for ever silenced—"We trusted it had been he who should have delivered Israel; but"—

It is at this juncture that Joseph of Arimathea appears. He went in boldly to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. The old friends are scattered, they are poor men and strangers—terrified also; what could they do at such a crisis? And as Joseph makes his claim to the governor, his companion Nicodemus hurried off to procure a large quantity of spices—myrrh and aloes, even a hundred pound weight. And soon the two honorable men are busily engaged on the body of their Master. The mangled and bloody corpse of that faithful and Divine One is carefully, tenderly cleansed, swathed, and embalmed; albeit it had not yet quite lost the flavor of that ointment of spikenard which the ardently grateful woman had poured upon it. The tomb of the rich counsellor is at hand—had ever executed martyr more loving burial?—there they laid him. All is perfectly done, but hastily; for the Sabbath hour is at hand. And, with the last streaks of lurid sunset over Jerusalem, the stone is rolled to the mouth of these pulchur, and the door of hope is shut. "And Mary Magdalene was there and the other Mary sitting over against the sepulchre."

And thus unwittingly was fulfilled the Scripture—"He made his grave with the rich."

What did Joseph of Arimathea believe now? and what did those women believe? No eclipse of faith could be more complete. But there are times when love has to fill up the gaps of reasonable hope, and thus preserve the continuity of faith. This was the time for that.

But did not Joseph still believe that Jesus was Christ? If he had heard report of all that Jesus said to his disciples he would have known that the Son of Man came up to Jerusalem with the full knowledge that he would be delivered to the High Priests and Scribes, and be put to death. And, if he had not heard this, still he was not without precedent to carry his faith up to the very last breath of life in Jesus. So did Abraham remain unshaken in his trust in God when he offered up his son Isaac.

The faithful counsellor had long "waited for the kingdom of God," and he could still wait. The circumstance of him so publicly identifying himself with this One whom the tribunal of his nation had cursed with crucifixion, and his not hesitating to take on the responsibility of burial for him who in the eye of the law was a criminal, prove that his was no mere sentimental faith. He had already seen in Jesus such palpable proof of his heavenly mission and divine power, that the possibility of self-reviving from death was not too much for a faithful Jew to believe. Joseph of Arimathea was still a disciple, holding by that great creed—"Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the Living God."

Thus, the short glimpse we have of this servant of the Lord presents him to us as a most noteworthy person—a star of the first magnitude, which shall shine in the firmament of the world to come for ever and ever.—G. Dowie, in Messenger.

"THY WORD IS TRUTH."

It matters not how fine spun the discourse may be; with what amount of rhetorical flourish given; however poetically embellished, if lacking in the essential quality—Truth—not that which passes for truth; for with sadness it can be said—Too much theory, and too little regard for the plainly declared purposes of God have taken the place of "Thus saith the Lord." This was recently illustrated in a sermon I read, delivered at Asbury Park N. J. Text Heb. xi. "Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest," etc. Having given of late, special attention to Hebrews, I feel prepared to ask as to this "rest," and when entered upon. The preacher tells his congregation that "The judgment is deferred until the consummation of all things, and then there may be a revelation of the righteous judgment of God; but in the intermediate state it was shown from Scripture, that the righteous dead have a conscious existence; that they are with Christ; and that Christ has entered into heaven itself, there to appear in the presence of God for us. In the resurrection and glorified state, soul and body will have been saved. There will be the most ennobling worship; there will be blessed employment; we are not to idly sit by purling streams, fanned by balmy airs, and sing psalms. There will be something in heaven to do; it will not be labor, but blessed employment."

To discuss the several points presented above, as they should be, and are repeatedly discussed in THE RESTITUTION, is not my present purpose.

To be taught of God is one thing; and to be taught of man, another thing altogether! therefore, when we desire wisdom, let us "ask of God, who giveth liberally."

Coined phrases, as used in pulpit and on platform, are not to be used, when we undertake to speak for God! Words such as "intermediate"—"The dead having consciousness"—"Conjoining of soul and body at the resurrection," and like expressions should never find utterance; yet these words are current in theological works, and are freely used in public address.

The writer of Hebrews seems very careful to refer all he says about Christ, and God, the worthies named in the eleventh chapter, the Priesthood, the Law and Covenants, the faith and the hope, etc., to that which had been written aforetime.

Briefly let us consider "The rest," and when entered upon. The wilderness of temptation—or testing of Jehovah's forbearance and love, fully proved the character of those with whom he endured; and because of unbelief and disobedience, they were cut off from entering the rest proposed; this however was only final to those who were rebels against Jehovah; his purposes are not thwarted; he has said, "But truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the "glory of the Lord." Tempting Israelites, and alien Gentiles, must yet bow to him of whom it is said "Every knee shall bow."

So long as Israel was obedient to the requirements of Jehovah, so long did he give them rest from their enemies.

We have no warrant from the word of God, that the rest which remained when Hebrews was written, has changed its character, and now the rest is "heaven;" on the contrary—heaven never having been promised the Israelite, nor the Gentile, it is vain to talk about finding our rest in 'heaven.' The rest to which Israel journeyed, was a land bounded and circumscribed; which land remains for all of that people who shall prove their worthiness to enter therein! "The gifts and calling of God are without change of purpose."

So surely as God said they who were disobedient, even to rebellion should not enter into that rest, so surely we who have heard the "Good tidings," and are profited thereby, having faith therein, "Do enter into rest," assured, because of our relation to him who said, "Come unto me all ye that labor—I will give you rest"—This is the promise of our Joshua! "Things written aforetime were written for our learning," and shame on us if we heed not the prophets of God!

"There remaineth therefore a Sabbath rest for the people of God." "Not every one that saith Lord, Lord"—shall constitute one of the people of God; some will be unrecognized, however forcible they may put in their claim!

The rest that remaineth will not consist of an idle life, "sitting by purling streams, and fanned by balmy airs." Rest is not idleness; it often is a change from one kind of labor to another; and thus it seems to me, the future and final rest, at least through the millennial age, will be that of active usefulness, in ministering benefits and blessings, as directed by the King of kings and Lord of lords. "Behold I come quickly;" and "my reward with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Doubtless the great work of the Messiah is even now, before him!

The rest that remains, is obtainable through diligence and obedience, and if the want or absence of those, disqualified Israel, how important the lesson!

We are not left to "think" or "guess" when this promised rest shall come. Paul has said, "To you who are troubled, rest with us; when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with the angels of his power."

The testimonies are numerous, proving when and where this rest shall be! No need of a heaven of ghosts; no need of an intermediate state of conscious existence; these are crooked inventions, made to suit theories wholly human; lacking the first Scripture proof other than by insinuation; and surely, a teaching considered "cardinal" ought to have a better foundation.

As a people, we demand, and what we demand we give, "Thus saith the Lord," it being the only way in which we can "Give to every man that asketh of us the reason of our hope." Oh how thankful we should be, who have fled for refuge to the hope of life that is life indeed! And now brethren, receive ye the apostolic counsel. "Grace to you and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord; seeing that his divine power hath granted unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that called us by his own glory and virtue; whereby he hath granted unto us his precious and exceeding great promises; that through these ye may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust. Yea and for this very cause, adding on your part all diligence, in your faith supply virtue; and in virtue knowledge; self-control, patience, godliness, love of the brethren. For if these things are yours and abound, they make you not to be idle nor unfruitful unto the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ," 2 Peter i. 2–8. R. V. GEO. W. YOUNG.

Announcements.

"The Church of God" in Michigan will hold their Annual Meeting (D. V.) in Dutton, Kent Co., beginning Thursday evening, Aug. 23d, and holding over Sunday. Now brothers and sisters one and all, this meeting means more to us than any previous meeting ever held in Michigan has meant. It means more than meeting for a visit, it means business, and very important business too. It means a reunion of the State of Michigan into one common brotherhood if we are ready for it. Are we ready. If all come for that purpose, with every selfish object entirely left out, only the good of the cause at heart, feeling the great need of earnest united efforts for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, then the object of this gathering will be accomplished. Let every brother and sister in the State who are holding fast to the faith once delivered to the saints be present without fail. God's cause needs your earnest attention. Come with hearts full of love and prayer, come with hands ready to grasp every child of God with a hearty, honest welcome. Come with a purpose high and holy, and this meeting will be heralded to the throne above, with joy sinners will turn to say, "Behold how these brothren love one another," and we will all receive a blessing.

The train accommodations are much better than heretofore. Trains leave G. R. for Dutton over the Michigan Central R. R. at 1:10 p. m. reaching here 1:28 p. m. Another leaving G. R. at 5.40 p. m. reaching here at 6:00. Another leaves G. R. at 11:00 evening reaching here at 11:17 evening. Trains reach here from the East at 5:28 a. m. 9:35 a. m. 2:50 p. m. 9:55 evening.

To the Brethren of the Old Conference in the State of Michigan.

The Old and New Conferences in joint work at their last conference held at Watson, voted to call both annual conferences at the same time in August of this year and at the same place. The New Conference is called to convene at Dutton as noticed in THE RESTITUTION. For some reason there is no call for the convening of the Old Conference at the same time and place. I therefore take the responsibility to request the brethren and sisters of the Old, all who can to meet with the brethren and sisters of the New Conference at Dutton as noticed in THE RESTITUTION, for the purpose of completing the work of union already done.

L. C. CHASE.

The Annual State Conference of the Church of God will meet at Claysville, Bracken P. O., Huntington Co., Ind., beginning on Friday, August 31, 1888, at 2:30 p. m., and last over Sunday. Those coming by the Nickle Plate R. R., will stop at South Whitley. Those coming on the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific R. R., or the Cincinnati, Wabash & Michigan R. R., will stop at North Manchester, where they will be met and conveyed to the place of meeting. At our meeting at Antioch last June the subject of having the churches represented at Conference by delegates was discussed, and a motion was made that each local church appoint, at a meeting of the church held previous to the Conference, delegates who can attend the Conference, and that the Church officers send the names of such delegates to the Conference Secretary, that they may be known as the authorized representatives of such church. It was also urged that at the same meeting the local churches collect such amounts as they can, to send to the conference for purposes of evangelising. Brethren, this work is important. Business is business, and the work of spending the money the good Lord has placed in our hands to the best advantage, requires just as much attention as any worldly affair, and a little more care. So I urge it upon every Church of God in Indiana, to have a meeting soon, and appoint your delegates and make a generous collection, and report the action, and come to the meeting prepared to make a grand good effort to do more this year than last, and do it better, for the time to work is getting very short.

The brethren and sisters at Claysville are able and willing to accommodate all who will attend. Any one intending to attend this meeting, who is not acquainted with the route, etc., will do well to write to A. G. Brookover, or Dr. C. W. Fry, Bracken, Ind., stating what time they expect to get there, and they will be cared for.

A. B. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

The Churches of God in Iowa will meet in Conference and for exhortation, preaching and general business, at Marathon, Buena Vista Co., Iowa, on Thursday evening, Sept. 18, 1888, and continue over the following Sunday, as Brother Gerton and Scott may arrange. We hope to have a good meeting. Let all the brethren come.

A POEM OF FAITH.

Since the Father's arm sustains thee,
Peaceful be,
When a chastening hand restrains thee,
It is he.
Know his love in full completeness
Fills the measure of thy weakness:
If he wounds thy spirit sore,
Trust him more.

Without measure, uncomplaining,
In his hand
Lay whatever thing thou canst not Understand;
Though the world thy folly spurneth,
From thy faith in pity turneth,
Peace thy inmost soul shall fill,
Laying still.

Like an infant, if thou thinkest
Thou can stand,
Child-like, proudly pushing back
The proffered hand,
Courage soon is changed to fear,
Strength doth feebleness appear;
In his love if thou abide,
He will guide.

Fearest sometimes that thy father
Hath forgot?
When the clouds around thee gather,
Doubt him not.
Always hath the daylight broken,
Always hath he comfort spoken;
Better hath he been for years
Than thy fears.

Therefore, wish-ne'er befideth
Night or day,
Know his love for thee provideth
Good always.
Crown of sorrow gladly take,
Grateful wear it for his sake,
Sweetly bending to his will,
Lying still.

To his own thy Savior giveth
Daily strength;
To each troubled soul that liveth,
Peace at length;
Weakest lambs have largest share
Of his tender Shepherd's care;
Ask him not, then, "When?" or "How?"
Only bow!

DEAVER'S, N. C.

Mrs. Carrie Williams:

I have never seen you, but hope soon to get acquainted in the kingdom of heaven. I am one of the Lord's poor who try to preach the gospel of the soon coming of God on this earth, and life only in Christ, which is, you very well know, everywhere unpopular. I was a licentiate of the Baptist organization, and then tried to preach as my father did who was a Baptist preacher. I thank God Brother Bond came down into this country and taught as many as would hear him the truth. I was glad to receive the truth and was baptized by Brother E. M. Anderson about ten years ago. No one would listen to the truth at all in my settlement. About one year after that time I baptized my wife Eliza out of the Baptist church into the Christ. About a year and a half after we moved to Haywood Co., and lived about six years, and are now in Transylvania, about twenty-three miles from there. I have been there twice this spring and preached each time to very respectably good congregations, and saw Brother Anderson baptize Miriam Case, nineteen years old.

About three years ago Brother Anderson organized a church there at Gallemore Gap, of fourteen members, baptized in what is called the "new doctrine of life only in Christ." My dear sister I am glad that our Lord has sent over good Bro. Bond and McLaughlin to this part with such a good message to us who have been raised up in falsehood. Now my good sister let us not stop at this, there are others who ought to be taught.

About forty miles from where I live, in Polk Co., N. C., lives my mother and all my sisters and an only brother, who are also very poor as to this world's goods; but they are and have been studying the truth, and, by the way, are very well instructed in the things concerning the kingdom, and they are the "pious," and the most intelligent element of that community. But my preaching this very unpopular doctrine in Sister Mary's house has made the opposition very strong in that Baptist Church. I want you to help us some if you can, and for our Master's sake solicit others to help this Macedonian cry; for real assured there is not a better element for piety and investigation, than can be found almost anywhere in this mountain country. Please ask some of those who are able and willing to help to send good reading matter into that settlement, either new or old. Please write a letter to my oldest sister, Mrs. Mary Laughter at Dimsdale, Polk Co., N. C. Please send her the "Heir of All Things." She has more influence for good than any woman I know of. Get some of the able ones to give you money to send her THE RESTITUTION. I am not able to pay for it myself. I am getting it on the "Lord's poor list." My wife and children are reading it and loving it. Please send Sister Mary one pound of tracts to read and lend to her neighbors and children and my old neighbors. I am looking for four grown women, all married, and sisters and one brother to be baptized soon. Please send me the "Heir of All Things." May God help us to not be selfish in sowing the good seed. God will pay us in the next life. Let me hear from you very soon.

I would like to report to you and THE RESTITUTION that seven very pious and intelligent persons were baptized at once. I look to you as a good Christian worker; I judge you to know who to ask for help to send some good working papers in there. Let us read a long able article from your pen urging upon all to work while it is day. I would be glad to get something to read and distribute either new or old. I think you should continue to write your practical articles every week. It is truly comforting to read your practical pieces. The good Lord will pay you for it all in the kingdom.

E. M. GIBBS.

TO THE FAITHFUL IN CHRIST GREETING.

"If a brother or sister be naked and destitute of daily food and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit. Even so faith if it hath not works is dead, being alone." James ii.

Brethren and sisters, I send to you through our beloved RESTITUTION the private letter which I received from Brother E. M. Gibbs. I send it because I think you all ought to read it, and too because those here of the faith think as I do. You ought to hear this cry from our own Macedonia, but not to the closing of the ear to the far off Macedonia, for that work lies very near our hearts.

I well remember when I first became interested in THE RESTITUTION with what interest I read of dear old Brother Bond's labors in the mountains of North Carolina, and now behold, though he is dead, he yet speaketh. Yea and as while he lived he speaketh the truth in Christ.

From these white southern fields comes the imploring cry, not for the bread or the water of this life, which the world freely distributes to its votaries and its petitioners. But here comes to us a cry for the word of life, a call to help those who are perishing for lack of knowledge. It is not a demand for highly embellished, finely bound and illustrated literature to please the eye and captivate the fancy. No, they ask even the crumbs that fall from the tables of the rich. They crave the "old, old story," no matter how old the paper on which it is told. Church of the living God, will this appeal go forth unheeded? I trust not. We here in San Diego will respond speedily and according to our means. But the field is large and white and the silent laborers will enter into these mountain homes while you are resting quietly in your beds. Who will send to that dear woman one pound of tracts? Who else will send her one or two copies of THE RESTITUTION? I will do all I am requested, and more too. Many who are in the church can, if they will, do far more.

In all ages our Father has used, and is even now using instrumentalities to accomplish his purposes toward our race. The word teaches us that he is even now "taking out of the Gentiles (or nations) a people for his name—a people to whom will be committed the government of the earth under the One Lord." The means by which these people are being taken out is by obtaining a knowledge of God's plan of salvation as revealed in his word. These people to whom I refer seem to be, according to Brother Gibbs report, like him to whom Philip was sent and who replied to his enquiry, "Understandest thou what thou readest," said, "How can I except some man should show me." They too are reading the Scriptures, but they have on the distorting glasses of sectarian superstition and bigotry, which bedims their vision so that they cannot see the simple beauty of a glorious gospel and a free salvation unless they are assisted to break away from the bondage of tradition. Doubtless many thousand pages of good, enlightening, Bible literature is stored away in the libraries and closets of our brethren and sisters, while these hungry people are asking at our hands the bread of life. Shall we withhold, or shall we send forth the words of life to these people, till songs of praise for new found light shall echo through all that region, and thousands shall arise and put on the whole armor of light.

Let us not sow sparingly. We need not wait one for the other. We are but stewards in our Master's vineyard. From those to whom he has committed much he will require much. Your sister looking for redemption.

MRS. CARRIE WILLIAMS.

THE MORNING WITHOUT CLOUDS.

Who can look around him, and consider the state of the world in which we live, and not be obliged to confess that clouds and darkness are now on every side? "The whole creation travaileth in pain." Rom. viii. 22. Look where we will, we see confusion, quarrels, wars between nations, helplessness of statesmen, discontent and grumbling of lower classes, excessive luxury among the rich, extreme poverty among the poor, intemperance, impurity, dishonesty, swindling, lying, cheating, covetousness, heathenism, superstition, formality among Christians, decay of vital religion—these are the things which we see continually over the whole globe, Europe, Asia, Africa, and America.....

But there is a good time coming which David saw far distant, when this state of things shall be completely changed. There is a kingdom coming in which holiness shall be the rule, and sin shall have no place at all.

Who can look around him in his own neighborhood, and fail to see within a mile of his house that the consequences of sin lie heavily on earth, and that sorrow and trouble abound? Sickness, and pain and death come to all classes, and spare none, whether rich or poor. The young often die before the old, and the children before the parents. Bodily suffering of the most fearful description and incurable disease, make the existence of many miserable. Widowhood, and childlessness, and solitariness, tempt many to feel weary of life, though everything which money can obtain is within their reach. Family quarrels, and envies and jealousies break up the peace of many a rich man's happiness. Who can deny that all these things are to be seen on every side of us? There are many clouds now.

Will nothing end this state of things? Is creation to go on groaning and travailing forever after this fashion? Thanks be to God, the second advent of Christ supplies an answer to these questions. The Lord Jesus Christ has not yet finished his work on behalf of man. He will come again one day (perhaps very soon) to set up a glorious kingdom, in which the consequences of sin shall have no place at all. It is a kingdom in which there shall be no pain and no disease, in which "the inhabitant shall no more say, I am sick," Isa. xxxiii. 24. It is a kingdom in which there shall be no partings, no moves, no change, no good-byes. It is a kingdom in which there shall be no deaths, no funerals, no tears and no mourning worn. It is a kingdom in which there shall be no quarrels, no losses, no disappointments, no wicked children, no bad servants, no faithless friends. When the last trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, there will be a grand gathering together of all God's people, and when we wake up after our Lord's likeness we shall be satisfied, Psa. xvi. 15. Where is the Christian heart that does not long for this state of things to begin? Well may we take up the last prayer in the book of Revelation, and often cry, "Come quickly, Lord Jesus."

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weethee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and numerous wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents fresh and views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great unfailing Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the law of the Uncomprehensible Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1851."

Cloth bound, 192 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 15.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE POST-TERTIARY OR QUARTERNARY AGE.—CONTINUED.

OF JESUS, THE CHRIST.

A notable personage of this historic age is Jesus of Nazareth, who was born in Bethlehem in the land of Judea during the reign of Herod the great, king of Judea. Of apparently humble parentage and birth, he has attained to a notoriety second to no person who either preceded or succeeded him. His name runs parallel with the advance of civilization, and education, and refinement in every country on the earth. By it, and by the name of God, almost equally, the profane and sacred attest the truth of their assertions. In his name and through the merits of his atonement the professor of the Christian religion reposes implicit confidence and trust for the future. The tall spires of churches in this and other lands, pointing heavenward, are increasing monuments in honor of his memory; devoted to the extension and perpetuity of his teachings. Laws for the suppression of crime, and the punishment of the evil-doers are based on his sayings, and the daily and weekly worship of millions of his followers, of all ages, sexes and conditions of life, numerically augmented as the age advances, show forth his popularity. In his name untold wealth has been expended, millions of lives sacrificed, armies and fleets raised, equipped and sacrificed, kingdoms have been established and overthrown, and entire countries convulsed from centre to circumference; yet the time of his public ministry and teachings extended only three and one-half years, and that too among the most humble, ignorant and uninfluential of the Judean population. The combined forces of Judaism, paganism, atheism and infidelity have striven in vain for more than 1800 years to suppress his doctrines, to set aside the miracles with which he enforced his doctrines and even to expunge the memory of his existence from the world's history.

The two names, "Son of man," and "Son of God" are both applied to him in the gospels; the former indicating his relation to the human race, through Mary, his mother, and the latter his connection with God,—his Father,—the Supreme Architect of the ages.

Pre-existing, not as God, angel or man, but, as the Logos,—the Word of God,—he had been the active agent by which his Father had wrought all the age-labors from the foundation of the earth; through which had been the creations of protozoon organisms, the living forms of the mollusean age, the separating uplift of cosoic waters, the establishment of continental outlines and reliefs, and the setting of the lights in the firmament of heaven to give light upon the earth, and the progressive types of flora to beautify and purify the earth and the air, and to give support in its later forms to the animals contemporary with its higher developments; through which the successive dynasties of fish and fowl, and loathsome reptile, mammal and later man in the form of God, had in their turn held away,—but now, in the wane of the Post-tertiary age, to become the visible presence of God manifest in the flesh, and dwelling among men.

In announcing the begettal of Jesus, the Christ, the angel did not wait upon the man,—the reputed father of our Lord,—since there remained in him no principle of life as a germ or nucleus on which to lay the foundation of a perfect character, because the man's disobedience had been a wilful violation of God's law. No. Man having presumptuously sinned merited only death, but, not so the woman; she was deceived and thereby retained within herself the only particle of hope for herself and her death-doomed husband. We find it true that the angel Gabriel was sent from God with his message to Mary, the mother of Jesus, who informed her of her acceptance with God as the mother of a Son of God. "The Holy Ghost," said he, "shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." Luke i. 35.

God's word was no less potent for impregnating the germ within the womb of the virgin mother of Jesus than it had been in creating man with procreative faculties in the beginning; certainly not. "By the word of God the heavens were of old," and, "by the same word the heavens and the earth which are now are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment." 2 Peter iii. "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made," Psa. xxxiii. 6; and it was the word of God that "was made flesh and dwelt among us." John i. 14. It, the word of God, was the quickening, fructifying, germinating principle by which God had ever wrought out his creations; and, clothed with flesh, the same word of God was born of Mary, and his name was called Jesus, as was ordered by the angel at the annunciation, and, we hear Peter exhorting the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, etc. Says he, "Seeing you have purified your soul in your obedience to the truth unto unfeigned love of the brethren, love one another from the heart fervently: having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God which liveth and abideth." 1 Peter i. 22, 23. R. V. John here record that "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made. He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not. But as many as received him to them gave he the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God." John i. R. V.

The kingdom of Israel had for many years been under the control of the Roman power: their prophets had repeatedly prophesied of a Deliverer and Redeemer under whose rule affluence and national prosperity should flourish. Isaiah, in his own beautiful language had predicted his birth, titles and mission, "Unto us," foretold he, "a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Isa. ix. 6, 7.

The characteristics of Jesus had been minutely described by the prophets centuries before his birth as a man, yet when, in the fulness of time he was manifested to them,—when "he came to his own, his own received him not,"—preferring, rather, to remain under Roman domination. A descendant from Abraham through the Davidical line, in him centered all the promises made of God to the fathers,—his progenitors,—and when the wise men from the east enquired, "Where is he that is born king of the Jews?" the truth contained in their question witnessed their wisdom, receiving its answer, when before Pilate Jesus answered, "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and to this end am I come into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth." John xviii. 38. Pilate's inscription on the cross verifies the truth he had learned from Christ, inscribed in the living languages of that day: "This is Jesus the King of the Jews;" confirming, if confirmation had been required, the angelic message to Mary, "He shall be great (said the angel), and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 32, 33. To these testimonies may be added that of Peter in the first gospel sermon ever preached by him. "Men and brethren," he pleads, "let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he, seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ." Acts ii. 29-31.

Throughout his entire ministry his teachings referred directly to the kingdom of God, and it is matter of record that "he showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them (the disciples) "forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God," Acts i. 3, and, having left an abundant promise of his future return to the earth to complete his mission, as pertaining to the closing events of this age, and to the age to come; promising also, that at his return he would reward his waiting disciples by taking them unto himself that they may ever be with the Lord, he ascended to heaven, and is now "the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world;" offering his own blood as a sacrifice for all, that, "whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have everlasting life."

Not only were his own life and teachings devoted to this one grand theme, of his mission,—the one thought of the Creator,—but he sent forth his disciples, twelve at one time and seventy at another, as missionaries to the Jewish people, and instructed them to proclaim "the kingdom of God is at hand," or "come nigh unto you;" and the burden of all the apostolic teachings,—whether closeted in Jerusalem, or, scattered by the persecuting power of Judaic and pagan opposition, or witnessing before the tribunal bar of despotism, or, preaching to attentive congregations of earnest enquirers, or, inditing epistles to the churches,—of the things that pertain to the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus, the Christ, as its rightful king, and God appointed ruler.

Going about all the land of Israel day after day doing good; a king to the manor born, yet declaring to Pilate "My kingdom is not of this cosmos; attesting the truth of his mission by astounding miracles; instructing all classes with pure, holy teachings, and finally yielding up his life a martyr to his cause and for the truth he represented, his example is a notable one to his professed followers, who, like him, are awaiting the coronation of David's royal Son, at a time when he shall have taken to himself his great power and reigned, for the fulness of their reward. In his first advent he labored as a prophet, suffered and died as "king of the Jews," was raised from the dead to the power of an endless life as a priest forever, after the Melchisedecan order of priesthood, and as prince of the kings of the earth, in his priestly office ascended into heaven, the holy of holies, there to appear for us, and, in the fulfilment of the scheme of the ages, will return to the earth as King of kings, and Lord of lords, though still retaining his priestly office, to bless the nations of the earth with peace, love and joy evermore. Betrayed, buffeted, scorned, reviled, insulted, the Christ was tried, condemned and crucified to appease the clamorings of the Jews who thirsted for his blood. Pilate washed his hands, and indicated his innocence from participation in the crime of innocent murder, but the Jews willingly assumed the guilt, exclaiming, "His blood be upon us and our children." The Jews rejected their Savior, their King, and from thenceforth he ceased to be their king. He was their dead king, for they slew him, and caused him to cease to exist. God raised him from the dead, not as king of the Jews, but as a prince of the kings of the earth; and when he shall have assumed his regal power as King of kings and Lord of lords, all nations, Jew and Gentile, will alike yield him allegiance and receive the blessings derived from his universal dominion through the unending age of the ages.

Much that is peculiar pertains to the begettal, birth, nature, private life, character, teachings, death, resurrection, official work and future mission of Jesus, the Christ which space forbids the consideration of in the present article to its full extent. The subject is one of the very deepest interest to the Biblical student, and, though the plainest and simplest of God's creative works when viewed in its true relation to the plan of the ages, priestcraft and superstition have so befogged it as to mislead the searcher after truth and leave him stranded upon the shoals of doubt and mysticism,—a fit subject for the inroads of atheism, or at least of infidelity.

Briefly, he was begotten by the quickening properties of the Word of God, which acted upon and vivified a germ furnished by the only portion of the human race in which any extenuating circumstances were to be found, as an excuse for human guilt. In nature he was not God, neither was he a man of the imperfect, law-breaking Tertiary creation type. He was made in the fashion as a man, being in the form of God, subject to the same temptations and trials that were the common lot of man, yet without sin. He took on him the seed of Abraham, by virtue of his mother's descent, and was made like unto his brethren; made under the law to redeem those that were under the law,—a new creation, the head of the new creature class,—prophetic of the form of life, in its perfected form, which are to flourish as the predominating fauna of the age to come; as clearly as did the man of the Tertiary age foretell the type of life in the present, or, the tiny meso-zoic mammal the mammalian fauna prevailing through the Tertiary age. In his death was extinguished not only his relation to the Jewish nation as their king, but, also, the humanity, or earthy, portion of his nature, and in his resurrection to the power of an endless life, he retained fully his Word of God, Lord from heaven, spirit nature, no longer subject to the infirmities of Adam's race, but now the beginning of the creation of God; the first-born of every creature, to whom be honor and glory age-lasting, in the age for which all the ages were ordained.

SIN IN THE FLESH.

We see so much written about sin in the flesh, that it becomes necessary to know the true meaning of the term, and to understand what sense ought to be conveyed to the mind by the expression. Some writers convey the idea that sin is natural to human flesh; i. e., that it is part of the nature of man. To this the writer cannot agree, for the reason that, when man was created, the Creator saw that he was "very good." And, besides, when man was made and his nature given him, there was no such thing as sin known in the world, for it is stated that by man sin entered into the world. Rom. v. 12. Thus we see that man had his nature before sin was committed, therefore his nature was not sinful, and consequently there was no sin in human flesh. And if not natural to man, sin is not hereditary, and we do not inherit sin from our parents. Then, how did flesh become sinful? The Scripture shows that as all the human family was in Adam when he sinned, all men sinned; and that as Adam was condemned for his sin, so all men were condemned at the same time to suffer the same penalty. See Rom. v. 12, 18, 19; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22. This then is how sin entered into the flesh, and all mankind became sinful flesh, but not by inheritance as claimed by some. Again, if sin was not natural to the flesh, it was not in the flesh; then neither was death natural to mankind, but came upon him by virtue of disobedience, i. e., man disobeyed God, thereby he sinned, and death was the penalty attached to the infraction of the command given Adam to keep.

Now if neither sin nor death was part of man's nature, but was brought on by man's act and God's judgment, then it cannot be heritable. And not being heritable, no one is a sinner, or sinful flesh, and subject to death simply because his parents were.

Then what is the nature of man, if not sinful and subject to death? We have shown that sin and death are no part of his nature, as he had no sin until he committed sin by his act; and that he was not subject to death until he became condemned after sinning; therefore goodness and continuity of life would be natural to man rather than sin and death. But the writer contends that these things are attributes of man's nature and not the very nature itself. Man's nature then is flesh and blood, the opposite of spirit. So one cannot inherit that which belongs to him, as flesh and blood, for he is so constituted, that is his nature. Adam was made flesh and blood without sin, consequently not liable to death; for it is sin that brought death. If no command with penalty attached for its infraction had been given him, he, no doubt, would be living today; for the earth was not cursed as it is now, and it produced Adam's food in abundance; all he had to do therefore was to eat and live. Thus we see that the Adamic or human nature was flesh and blood, not subject to death, therefore Adam had a "free life" until he sinned and the death penalty attached. And as all the human family was in Adam when he sinned and the death penalty attached to him, so it came upon them likewise. But did this in anywise change the Adamic nature? Can it be shown that human nature of today is not the same as it was in Adam? If a child should be born whose father was not in Adam would that child be subject to the Adamic death? If the father of that child was in Adam when he sinned, and was condemned for that sin, then he, the child, was a sinner and condemned to death equally with his father and Adam; but if the father was not in Adam, the child would not be a condemned sinner because he should be born of a condemned mother. For as has been before shown, the child could not inherit sin and condemnation from the mother; it would have been its mother's nature; that is, her flesh and blood nature, but not her sin or condemnation. Therefore that child would not be subject to death until it should commit an infraction of God's law, and thus we might say it had a "free life." But if its father was in Adam, it would be accursed because of the sin committed by it, and the condemnation of returning to the dust in death.

Now we state the proposition that the father alone is the progenitor of the child; which, both reason and Scripture sustain. Let the case of Levi, as shown in Heb. vii. 9, 10, be sufficient to sustain the proposition, for it is there shown that Levi, being yet in the loins of his great grand father Abraham, paid tithes. This shows the father alone to be the progenitor of the child independently of the mother, for Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob begat Levi, thus showing Levi to have descended on the father's side alone; and as we can thus trace him up to Abraham, we can trace him back to Adam, with as much power to eat the forbidden fruit as he had to pay tithes while in Abraham. So then Levi ate the fruit and was condemned as much as Adam. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." In the margin it reads, "in whom" all have sinned. Rom. v. 12.

Being born of "sinful flesh" would not make the child a sinner—it would not have sin in its flesh unless it was condemned on account of sin committed by it, in the same manner that Levi paid tithes while in Abraham. Sin and death not being a part of Adam's nature, the child would not be a sinner if it does have its mother's flesh, Adam's flesh, or nature. Let us suppose that the mother of this child should have her sin and condemnation removed so that she would not be subject to death on account of having been in Adam; and that the father of the child was a descendant of Adam, one who was in him when he sinned and was condemned, and whose sin and condemnation still adheres, would the child be under condemnation of death or not? You will be compelled to reply in the affirmative, as the proposition stated above, supported by Heb. vii. 9, 10, conclusively shows that the child will be descended from Adam through the father alone, and subject to death for the sin committed while in Adam, irrespective of the mother's free life. In this case the child would have the same nature that the mother has, a flesh and blood nature as well as that of its father. Could you say that it inherited "free life" from its mother, and condemnation from its father? This could not be, you will admit.

Now let us say that this child Jesus, whose mother is a daughter of Adam and condemned in him for eating the forbidden fruit while in him, just as Levi paid tithes in Abraham. And that the Father of this child Jesus, is God, in whom the child was until his begettal. Can you now say that Jesus was condemned simply because his mother was, and when he was in God from all eternity, and had no connection with humanity until his begettal? If the father alone be the progenitor of the child, as before shown, then Jesus was not in Adam, although his mother was; and although he had his mother's nature, yet he was without sin; though made of a woman, under the law, in the likeness of sinful flesh, yet he was not condemned to death; therefore he had a "free life," one that no man could take away from him; one that he had a right to give as a sacrifice for the life of the world. Hear him, "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father." John x. 17, 18. If he had been under Adamic condemnation he could not have been freed from Adamic death by keeping the law of Moses—if he could, still he had a "free life" to give for the life of the world. If keeping the law freed him from Adamic death, and he being without personal sin, surely he had a "free life;" then the opposers of "free life" must succumb to the argument in either event. But should any persist in saying that Jesus was under the Adamic curse, we refer them to what Paul said to the Corinthians. "Wherefore I give you to understand that no man speaking by the spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed." 1 Cor. xii. 3.

There are three Scriptures, however, that are used as proof that Jesus was in David's loins, therefore in Adam's. But they are so easily explained that a child may see that they do not sustain the point they are cited to prove. The first is the promise to David, 2 Sam. vii. 12, "And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom." The second is, "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it; of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." Psa. cxxxii. 11. The third is, "Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne." Acts ii. 30.

In the first place then, let it be noted that, when the promise was made to David, his two sons, Solomon and Nathan, were grown men; and the two genealogies, one by Matthew for Joseph, and the other by Luke, for Mary, can offer no proof of the descent of David's "Seed;" if that seed was still in David's bowels when the promise, recorded in 2 Sam. vii. 12, was made to him. Again, this seed was not to proceed out of David's bowels until after his days were fulfilled, and he should sleep with his fathers. Therefore, there must be some person who should be termed David's "bowels," out of whom this seed must proceed. Let us turn to the Greek in the Diglott, where we will find in Acts ii. 30, that it was, "ex" out of fruit of David's loins, God would cause one to sit upon David's throne. See Rom. i. 3, Dia. Now if the genealogy of Mary can be traced back to David, then we see that she was fruit of David's loins, out of whom came Jesus the Christ. She answers also for David's "bowels," from which should proceed the "seed" to sit upon David's throne. She answers also for "fruit of thy body," of which God swore to David that he would set one upon his throne. Joseph's genealogy is for the purpose of showing Jesus' legal right to David's throne. Joseph was a descendant from David through Solomon and the other kings, which made him of the royal line; and Jesus being his legal son, (because Joseph was the legal husband of Mary), was the legal heir to David's throne. So it may be seen that, if Joseph's genealogy gives Jesus' fleshly descent from David, Joseph then was his father, and he was in Adam under the condemnation of death. Again, if Mary's genealogy gives Jesus' fleshly descent from David's loins through Nathan, then Jesus had a human father who must have been Hell, her own father. But as this was not true, it may be seen that the two genealogies cannot be used to support the three quoted Scriptures as proof that Jesus was in David's loins, as Levi was in Abraham's. If the three quoted Scriptures proved that he was in David's loins, they would also prove that Joseph was his father, and that he was under Adamic condemnation, was sinful flesh (by having sinned in Adam) and not the "likeness" of it.

If the foregoing thoughts are deemed worthy of a place in your columns they are respectfully offered to your readers for consideration. Your brother in hope of the kingdom.

Separated from all People.

We have here one of those rare Hebrew words—niphlinu, from palah—which seem to picture or photograph the plan and providence of the Almighty. It is used three times in the Psalms, and four times in the Book of Exodus, and nowhere else in the entire Hebrew Bible. That which is unusual is separated from other objects. But for separation in the sense of being remarkable or wonderful another word was used, the present word denoting separation in the sense of being favored of God. Of this fact the history of the Hebrew race is a continuous illustration. That history, from the beginning till the present time, is the great miracle of the world. Whether we look at the Hebrews religiously, socially, politically, historically, or geographically, they present the same peculiarity of "separation" from "her races as "the favored people." No doubt hangs over their origin, for they trace their ancestry to Abraham, who enjoyed the wealth of learning,—languages, literature, laws, and the arts, of which Ur of the Chaldees could boast. They endured their four hundred and thirty years of bondage in Egypt, proverbial in its severity, without the obliteration of a single trace of those characteristics which distinguished them from other races. How easy for the contrary to have happened! In their desert wanderings, the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, Exod. xiii. 21, were but symbols of the unseen but ever-present arm of Jehovah, their constant defense. In Canaan, where their national life was developed, they could never have maintained themselves, for so many centuries, had not the God of Israel stood between them and the great armies of the East and South, and prevented their annihilation. For the carrying out of their special mission in the world, human wisdom would never have chosen Palestine as the fittest scene; but in God's sight that unique land was the only one where that mission could be best accomplished. The fact that their prophets were to be the heralds of the Messiah, and their country the chosen place of his advent, would of itself, had we not hundreds of other facts, be sufficient to justify their being described as "separate" and "favored" of God. The libraries of the world are full of books that have been written respecting the Jews; the statute-books of all civilized nations abound with laws which affect their welfare; and in the awful annals of persecution the record of their sufferings covers many of the saddest pages. In their history they present the greatest contrasts,—now exalted, now debased; possessed of great riches, suffering undescribable poverty; raised to power, bound in abject slavery; now united, now scattered over the world; never destined to become a ruling race, never sinking into oblivion; thus the shifting panorama of their strange fortunes has moved, and still moves, before the face of the world. Many serious persons are asking what further plans God has in store for this people, the monument at once of his power and love.—Sunday School Times.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 22, 1883.

There being five Wednesdays in August, our next paper will bear date of Sept. 5.

We have not had either time or health to look over pamphlets sent for review. Will look them over carefully and speak of their merits hereafter.

Brother Conner held meetings at Argos on Wednesday and Thursday evenings of last week. One young Sister, Miss Hattie Dickson, yielded the obedience of faith, being baptized into Christ on Thursday morning.

As the health of the Editor became improved his companion in life was prostrated with disease for a number of days. We are both so much better now that there will probably be nothing to hinder the Editor attending the Conference at Dutton. As to lack of editorial this week the want of good health must be our excuse.

PAUL'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 5.

In considering the ecclesiastical aspect of Romanism, we must never lose sight that it is the outcome and climax of the predicted apostasy, whose features Paul describes in Timothy. We must close this lecture with a few remarks on the departure from the faith which occupies so prominent a place in that description. Some should "depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats." The faith must of course here be taken in a broad sense, as including all the doctrines and commandments of the Christian religion. The apostasy was to be marked by a departure from this faith, by the teaching of false doctrines, and the inculcation of anti-scriptural practises. That Popery is completely at variance with the Bible on all the important points of the faith of Christ may be safely asserted, and can be abundantly proved. We can select but a few of the principal points.

1. The Apostle Paul teaches that the Holy Scriptures are able to make us "wise unto salvation," that they are capable of rendering the man of God "thoroughly furnished;" and James speaks of the ingrafted word of God as "able to save the soul." The true doctrine therefore is that Scripture contains all that is necessary for salvation. What is the doctrine of Romanism on this point? One of the articles of the Council of Trent asserts that, not only should the Old and New Testaments be received with reverence as the word of God, but also "the unwritten traditions which have come down to us, pertaining both to faith and manners, and preserved in the Catholic Church by continual succession." In considering this decree, and its fatal effects in exalting the mere human traditions to the level of Divine revelation, one is reminded of the solemn words which close the Apocalypse: "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book." Christ taught, on the contrary, that tradition was to be rejected whenever it was opposed to Scripture. "Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition?" "In vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." "Laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men." "Making the word of God of none effect through your tradition."

2. Again. The Bible teaches us the duty of reading and searching the Scriptures. The Lord Jesus himself said, "Search the Scriptures;" but Romanism forbids the general reading of Scripture, asserting that such a use of the word of God in the vulgar tongue causes more harm than good, and that it must never be practised except by special permission in writing obtained from a priest. If any presume to read it without that, they are not to receive absolution. Booksellers who sell the Bible to any desiring to obtain it are to have penalties inflicted upon them, and no one is to purchase a Bible without special license from their superior. This is extended to receiving a gift of the Bible.

3. The true faith teaches us that every man is bound to judge for himself as to the meaning of Scripture. "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according this word, it is because there is no light in them." But the Council of Trent decrees, that "no one confiding in his own judgment shall dare to wrest the sacred Scriptures to his own sense of them contrary to that which is held by holy mother Church, whose right it is to judge of the meaning." If any one disobeys this decree he is to be punished according to law.

4. Scripture teaches us most abundantly that Christ is the only head of the Church. God gave him to be the head over all things to the Church, which is his body; but Romanism teaches that the pope is the head of the Church on earth. "The pope is the head of all heads, and the prince, moderator, and pastor of the whole Church of Christ, which is under him," says Benedict XIV.; and the Douay catechism, taught in all Papal schools, says, "He who is not in due connection and subordination to the pope must needs be dead, and cannot be counted a member of the Church."

5. Scripture teaches us that the wages of sin is death, and "that whosoever shall keep the law, and yet offend in one point, is guilty of all." "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to them." But Popery teaches that there are some sins which do not deserve the wrath and curse of God, and that venial sins do not bring spiritual death to the soul.

6. The Bible teaches us that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law, and that we are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. But Popery denounces this doctrine. The Council of Trent asserted that whosoever should affirm that we are justified by the grace and favor of God was to be accursed, and so all those who hold that salvation is not by works but by grace.

7. Scripture teaches us to confess sin to God only. "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight." "Every one of us shall give account of himself to God," "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." But Romanism denies this, and says that sacramental confession to a priest is necessary to salvation, and that any one who should denounce the practise of secret confessions as contrary to the institution and command of Christ and a mere human invention, is to be accursed.

8. Scripture teaches us, again, that God only can forgive sins, and that the minister's duty is simply to announce his forgiveness. "Repentance and remission of sins" was to be preached in his name among all nations. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation." He commanded us to preach to the people, that "through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." The Council of Trent asserts, on the contrary, whosoever shall affirm that the priest's absolution is not a judicial act, but only a ministry to declare that the sins of the penitent are forgiven, or that the confession of the penitent is not necessary in order to obtain absolution from the priest, let him be accursed.

9. Scripture teaches us that no man is perfectly righteous, and certainly that none can do more than his duty to God. "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves." "In Thy sight shall no man living be justified." "When ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do." The Council of Trent, on the contrary, asserts that the good works of the justified man, his fasts, alms, and penances, really deserve increase of grace and eternal life, and that God is willing, on account of his most pious servants, to forgive others. It teaches that a man may do more than is requisite, and may give the overplus of his good works to another.

10. Scripture teaches us that faith in Christ removes sin and its guilt, "that the Lamb of God taketh away the sin of the world," that by his death Christ cleanseth us from all sin. But Romanism teaches that the venial sins of believers have to be expiated by a purgatory after death, and that the prayers of the faithful can help them. The Creed of Pope Pius IV. contains the clause: "I constantly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls detained therein are helped by the suffrages of the faithful."

11. Scripture teaches us that "by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified," that he was once offered to bear the sins of many. But Romanism asserts, on the contrary, that in each of the endlessly repeated masses in its innumerable churches all over the world there is offered to God "a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead."

12. Scripture, as we have already shown, teaches us that the marriage of the ministers of Christ is a lawful and honorable thing. Peter was a married man; Paul asserts his liberty to marry, and says that a bishop must be the husband of one wife, having his children in subjection with all gravity, and that the deacons also must be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well. Romanism, on the other hand, teaches "that the clergy may not marry, and that marriage is to them a pollution."

13. Scripture says, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." Barnabas and Paul with horror forbade the crowds to worship them, and the angel similarly forbade John, saying, "See thou do it not." Romanism enjoins the worship both of angels and saints and their relics. "The saints reigning together with Christ are to be honored and invocated; they offer up prayers to God for us, and their relics are to be venerated."

14. The Bible again teaches that images are not to be worshiped. "Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor serve them." "I am the Lord: My glory will I not give to another, neither My praise to graven images." But Romanism teaches her votaries to say, "I most firmly assert, that the images of Christ, and of the mother of God ever virgin, and also of the other saints, are to be had and retained, and that due honor and veneration are to be given to them."

15. And above all, Scripture teaches us that there is one God, and one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus, neither is there salvation in any other. But Romanism teaches that there are other mediators in abundance besides Jesus Christ, that the Virgin Mary and the saints are such. "The saints reigning together with Christ offer prayers to God for us."

I must not go further, and contrast Bible and Romish teachings on the subject of the Lord's Supper, extreme unction, and a multitude of other points, but may say, in one word, that there is no doctrine of the gospel which has not been contradicted or distorted by this system, and that it stands branded before the world beyond all question as fulfilling Paul's prophecy of the apostasy—that it should be characterized by departure from the faith.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

"THE PATIENT WAITING FOR CHRIST," 2 Thess. iii. 5.

The apostle Paul reminds the Thessalonians in his second epistle of what he had fully told them in his first, that the day of the Lord would not come to them "as a thief in the night," because they were "children of light," and he consequently exhorted them to watch together with him, and be sober, and also to comfort themselves with the wonderful thought, that if they were alive upon the earth when the day of the Lord came, of their being suddenly changed, and of their "meeting the Lord in the air," and he concluded that epistle with a variety of precepts for their guidance. Fearing they might be deceived by Satan's false teaching, the apostle in his second epistle revealed to them more fully the particulars of the Lord's coming. He told them that he would personally destroy the man of sin, or son of perdition, with the brightness of his coming, and consume him with the Spirit of his mouth, together with those who had been deceived by him; but he also warned them that the man of sin would not be manifested until there came a large falling away, and until there was a removal of a certain "letting" or hinderance to such a manifestation. That "letting" would of course include "the light of the world and the salt of the earth," of which they themselves formed a portion. He therefore, exhorted them not to be afraid of deceivers and false teachers, and then, alluding to God's faithfulness in preserving and establishing them, he prayed that their hearts might be directed into the love of God, and into "the patient waiting for Christ." Now, in nothing is the amazing power and subtlety of Satan exercised more successfully than in keeping the minds of believers from that safe and happy position of "patiently waiting for Christ."

In Dan. xii. 4 we are taught by the Holy Spirit of God that, in addition to "many running to and fro," at the time of the end, "knowledge shall be increased," and we also learn in 1 Cor. viii. 1, that "knowledge puffeth up." These two facts are plainly visible in the every day business of life. The scientific world is continually adding some fresh fact, developed in nature, which is gradually adding to the comforts and conveniences of mankind, and we may be assured that this will continue up to the "time of the end," which will be "as it was in the days of Noah." The great mass of mankind are in Satan's power, being in spiritual darkness till the light of the Gospel of Christ shines into their hearts, and they are, for his purposes, safe enough in his hands. He will be sure to direct what knowledge they gain by Nature or by the cultivation of their natural intellectual powers to a wrong end, by stimulating their natural spirit of emulation, and thus cause disputations and the giving heed to "fables, and endless genealogies, vain babblings, and oppositions of science, falsely so called," condemned in Paul's epistles to Timothy. In doing this he will illustrate the statement that "knowledge puffeth up." It is only when men are "delivered from the power of darkness, and are translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son," Col. i. 23, that Satan wars especially and individually against them, and to such, and such only, I write.

The command given to Daniel was to shut up the words and seal the book, even to "the time of the end," Dan. xii. 4, and it was only on a like principle that John had revealed to him, Rev. iv. 1; v. 5, that the Lion of the tribe of Judah, seen as a slain and symbolized Lamb, he prevailed to open the "sealed book," and had elicited thereby the new song of redemption, to be followed by the angelical anthem, "Worthy is the Lamb," to be joined in by the "whole creation." A question may now naturally and logically arise, "Is not the sure word of Prophesy described in 2 Peter i. 19, as a 'light shining in a dark place,' to be entertained previous to the opening of the books and seals?" Let this question, as well as every other question of doubt or difficulty, be solved by the written and infallible Word of God. But on this point of appealing to the written Word of God, I wish to press on the attention of all true believers (to use a common expression), that there is more than one way of doing anything, and of course there is more than one way of reading the Bible. All disputants refer to that. How is it then that differences continue to exist? Clearly, because of the way in which the Bible is interpreted. We all know how Satan perverted the word of God in the discussion about it when he tempted Christ, and it is stated in 2 Peter iii. 16, that unstable and unlearned inquirers wrest the Word of God to their own destruction. I think this may be accounted for by the manner in which the Word of God is appealed to. I fear that we are all apt, and I speak to believers only, to treat that word somewhat carelessly, if not irreverently. By this, the spirit that actuates the world creeps in, and the minds of some Christians are drawn into the deluded notion that God has appointed the Gospel to be the means of converting the world in the present dispensation. The idea is so extremely prevalent still that it has now become a common complaint, even with many of the Lord's misinstructed children, that evil is increasing to such an extent that they do not know "what we are coming to." Even the missionary efforts of the professing Church have been frustrated, and owing to the commercial proceedings with which they have frequently been mixed up, a great amount of evil as well as good has been done in some distant heathen countries. In the time of the Apostle Paul the missionaries were called "The messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ," 2 Cor. viii. 23. Even apart from such missions, the idea that God has appointed these well and comfortably appointed missions, somewhat after the manner of State-appointed livings, canonries, deaneries and bishoprics, to be used as a means of converting the world, shows sad dispensational ignorance of what the mind of the Lord is. Many persons are doubtless used of God in a quiet, humble, and unpretending way to bring sinners to Christ. Such may be "the messengers of the churches and the glory of Christ," as in the time of Saul, but it is very doubtful whether the bulk of the missions, as they are now constituted, can be so classed. The words of Isaiah liii. 1 "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" is still applicable. We often hear of the successful efforts of many preachers, in the conversion of their hearers, and the amount of knowledge imparted to "their people," or "their flocks," as they call them, but in the estimation we made the result of the "parable of the sower" should be taken into account. The final result of dispensational Gospel preaching, at "the time of the end," may be inferred by the solemn words, "Nevertheless, when the Son of Man cometh shall he find (the) faith on the earth?" Luke xviii. 8. The largely extended notion among the professors of Christianity, that their efforts will extend the Kingdom of Christ upon earth, and bring in everlasting righteousness, completely dislocates the revealed purposes of God, and forestalls the blessing he has promised, and this in utter disregard to the order and regularity which God will cause to take place, in the due course of predestinated events. The retention of this idea is in exact coincidence with what is described as "the form of godliness denying the power thereof." The manner in which missionary enterprises are conducted in other countries opens the way into an enormous system of false doctrines, and the upholding of priestcraft, and the exaltation of the church, accompanied in some degree with the introduction of intoxicating liquors, and the still more deleterious system of opium poisoning for the sake of "filthy lucre." Let the purest intention be tested by the Word of God. Does not the regularly supplied salaries from the societies to the "messengers of the churches" exert a powerful influence on the missionary spirit of the times, and how can the system stand up against the practice and exhortations of Christ and his apostles? True, the laborer is worthy of his hire, and they that preach the gospel must live of the gospel, but how often do we find the apostles, especially Paul, foregoing that permission, lest their ministering be thereby impaired; and how can that word be applied, "Provide neither gold nor silver, nor scrip for your journey," Matt. x. 9, 19. It is blessedly true that many bright exceptions have gone forth, and have been much blessed, but the general rule is altogether different. A searching investigation may account much more for the failure of missions. The system of worldliness introduced into the works of the Church sadly incapacitates its members for "the patient waiting for Christ," to which they give so little heed. In Luke xxiv. 47 it is written of missions, "Beginning at Jerusalem." How could these words apply at the present time in this country? The conversion of the Jew should, at least, be as important as that of the Gentile. The enormous and increasing majority, in large towns, of those who are not converted to God, might cause a thought to arise in the hearts of true and thoughtful disciples that these words are not applicable to the present times. The failure of missions would appear to be owing to the substitution of the plan that coincides with worldly ideas of the combination of the professing church and the world, for the plain and simple plan of Christ. The plans, maxims, and practices of the world have crept in, and caused a blight which has increased the confusion; which the church, in her shattered condition, is unable to rectify. This religious medley, which every attempt to put to rights only increases, will be the condition in which the professing church will be found, when these decisive words will be carried out into actual practical effect: "One shall be taken—and the other left." Then the Lord shall send his angelic messengers to gather in the firstfruits of his spiritual harvest. Because they are ready and "patiently waiting for Christ." Such will escape the sore trials of the "last great tribulation," which will commence its work immediately after the removal of "that which now letteth." On the other hand, the unready believer, dangling in the world, like Lot in the midst of Sodom, will effectually compose that vast multitude described in Rev. vii. 14, as "having come out from the great tribulation," but with only palms in their hands, and not crowns; and will be temple servitors. This distinction in believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, which the Scriptures so plainly reveal, is not only neglected in the numerous systems of Christianity prevailing throughout the world, but in many instances is denied by erroneously contending that their carnal interpretation of the unity of the spiritual body of Christ is the correct one. The difference between Unity and Uniformity is not maintained. Such Christians typified by Lot, are scarcely in a condition to be "always abounding in the work of the Lord" up to the time of his coming for his watchful ones, nor for "patiently waiting for Christ."—Henry Meymott, Surgeon, Ludlow, in Prophetic News.

FROM BOSTON.

There is joy in the home when the old cradle is pulled out from its silent corner, dusted, and prepared for use again. A new baby has come to think, a new heart to love, new hands to help, new feet to walk the pathway of progress, another unit is added to the sum of human life, an added force to the home and State.

"The Cradle of Liberty," Faneuil Hall, has been pulled out and dusted and rocked. Massachusetts has a new baby, "The Public School Question." Judging by its screams it is a lusty boy, by its activity there is no lack of vitality. Last Wednesday evening, Faneuil Hall was packed. There are a few seats in the galleries and under the galleries, but the main floor furnishes only standingroom, and this was covered with a closely-wedged mass of humanity, from half-past seven to eleven o'clock at night. Hundreds went away unable to find room. An overflow meeting was held in Tremont Temple. Standing on the platform I learned the meaning of the phrase "a sea of faces." Looking down upon the eager throng, only the heads and shoulders were in sight, a vast mass of upturned faces, pink flesh fringed with hair, punctured with flashing eyes and noise-producing mouths, the whole surging and working under the swell of the hour, like the ocean scourged by the wind. Several times the band played to allay the excitement. The speakers were Dr. Miner (Universalist), presiding officer, Drs. Townsend and Ela (Methodist), Dr. Plumb (Congregationalist), Pastors Moxom and Gifford (Baptist). An orchestra of many pieces, playing one air. The occasion of the meeting was the transferring of a public school teacher, by name, Travis, and the dropping of Swinton's text book on history from the school. Teacher and book were unsatisfactory to the Catholic element of the school board, because of certain teachings concerning indulgences. The boy taught, reported through the confessional, and his spiritual father, Metcalf, a member of the school board, protested, hence the removal and excitement. In the eight articles on Indulgences, by Prof. Fisher, of Yale, in the Congregationalist of a recent date, Dr. Dexter concludes that "Swinton's statement of the subject is one of those inaccurate and misleading generalizations, which are to be found in too many of our short school histories." But the Boston Herald, after a careful study decides that "the statement made by Prof. Swinton is fully sustained by all acknowledged authorities, whether secular or religious, though the Roman Catholic authorities generally accessible in English are rather shy of giving all the facts of the case, while Protestant writers are often so sure of them that they present a very distorted record."

The question of correct statement is one for scholars to settle. If the statement were incorrect it should be corrected. But the real point at issue is not Swinton, or Indulgences, but public against parochial schools. The Baltimore council condemned our Bible, several of our text-books, and finally the whole public school system as Godless. The question is before us and must be met. Roman Catholicism, like Lot's wife on the plain, toes one way and faces another; her ideals, her home, her policy are in the past tense.

> Now occasions teach men duties,
> Time makes ancient good uncouth,
> They must upward still and onward,
> Who would keep abreast of truth.

Two systems stand face to face. The open Bible and the public school confront the catechism and the parochial school. The Republic rests on Plymouth Rock, the Catholic church rests on St. Peter as a rock. The American people must choose.—O. P. Gifford, in Christian Inquirer.

JESUIT'S OATH.

"I, A. B. now in the presence of Almighty God, the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Blessed Michael the Archangel, the Blessed St. John the Baptist, the Holy Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul and the saints and Sacred Host of Heaven, and to you my Ghostly father, I do declare from my heart, without mental reservation that the Pope is Christ's Vicar General and is the true and only Head of the universal church throughout the earth, and that by virtue of the Keys of binding and loosing given to his holiness by Jesus Christ he hath power to depose Heretical Kings, Princes, States, Commonwealths and Governments, all being illegal without his sacred Confirmation, and that they may safely be destroyed. Therefore, to the utmost of my power, I will defend this doctrine and his holiness's rights and customs against all usurpers of the Heretical or Protestant authority whatsoever, especially against the now pretended authority and church in England and all adherents, in regard that they be usurped and heretical, opposing the Sacred Mother Church of Rome.

"I do renounce and disown any allegiance as due to any heretical King, Prince or State, named Protestant, or obedience to any of their inferior Magistrates or officers.

"I do further declare the doctrine of the Church of England, of the Calvinists, Huguenots and other Protestants, to be damnable, and those to be damned who will not forsake the same. I do further declare that I will help, assist and advise all or any of his holiness's agents, in any place wherever I shall be, and to do my utmost to extirpate the heretical Protestant doctrine, and to destroy all their pretended power, regal or otherwise. I do further promise and declare, that notwithstanding I am dispensed with to assume any religion heretical for the propagation of the Mother Church's interest to keep secret and private all her agents' counsels as they entrust me, and not to divulge, directly or indirectly, by word, writing or circumstance whatsoever, but to execute all which shall be proposed, given in charge, or discovered unto me, by you my ghostly father, or by any one of this convent.

"All which I, A. B., do swear by the Blessed Trinity, and Blessed Sacrament which I am about to receive, to perform, on my part to keep inviolably; and do call on all the heavenly and glorious Host of heaven to witness my real intentions to keep this my oath. In testimony whereof, I take this most holy and blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist, and witness the same further with my hand and seal, in the face of this holy convent."

Japan papers give full details of the terrible eruption at Bandai Sean. The number of lives lost are still estimated at 500. Nearly 4000 people were injured. At the latest reports the mountain was still smoking and to add to the misery of the many hopeless inhabitants the river Nagasaki, in the vicinity, has been so dammed up by sand and ashes that there is immediate danger of an inundation.

The Supreme Court of Justice in Spain has dismissed the appeal of two Protestant professors who were sentenced to imprisonment for refusing to salute a Roman Catholic priest who was carrying the Host through the public streets. It has, however, ordered that the Roman Catholics be brought to trial who lately entered a Protestant chapel with their hats on, and, having insulted the pastor, threw the Bible on the floor and trod on it.

Sofia, August 12.—The train inaugurating the direct railway service between Paris and Constantinople arrived here today. A grand banquet was given in honor of the occasion, at which Prince Ferdinand presided. Among the guests were a large number of prominent persons representing various countries of Europe. Prince Ferdinand in a speech said that the completion of this splendid work concluded solely through the efforts and resources of Bulgaria in the first year of his reign, filled his heart with legitimate pride and satisfaction, and he hoped that the country which had chosen him ruler would henceforth be better appreciated and more clearly judged. He thanked all present and congratulated them upon the success of the enterprise. Great enthusiasm was manifested throughout. A reception at the palace followed the banquet. The train will proceed in the morning.

Rome, August 13.—An official despatch received from Massowah contains the following startling intelligence: Three hundred and fifty auxiliary troops under the command of Italian officers have been destroyed by Abyssinians. The killed included all the officers. An attack was being made by the auxiliaries upon Saganeiti. The catastrophe was due to treachery on the part of native allies who joined the enemy while fighting.

Another despatch says: Reports have been received here of a terrific slaughter of Italian troops near Massowah. The garrison, hearing that Debela, an Abyssinian chief, had gathered a force in the neighborhood, started an expedition consisting of 400 Bashi Bazouks against him. On the way to the place of attack 200 Assertins turned traitors and reinforcing Debela, decided the battle in his favor. Three hundred and fifty of the Italians were killed, including most of the officers of the expedition.

Rome, August 14.—A despatch from Massowah says a French missionary who has arrived from the scene of the massacre at Saganeiti reports that four of the Italian officers who were in command of the auxiliaries were killed. He does not know the fate of the fifth. He says that De Bab, the Abyssinian chief whose troops overcame the Italian command, had a force of 780 men, of whom 350 were armed with muskets. The report that the Assertin allies proved treacherous is denied. Four hundred stragglers from the defeated column have arrived at Massowah.

On Thursday Aug. 30 the L. M. & W. will run a special cheap excursion to the Soldiers Home Dayton O Train will leave Plymouth at 5:46 a. m. and arrive at Dayton at 3 p. m. Tickets good for 5 days and only $3.50 for the round trip. An excellent chance to visit friends at Indianapolis, Rushville, Connersville, Hamilton O. or the Cincinnati Exposition. Everybody go.

MANAH.

"The hand of the Lord is gone out against me." Ruth i. 13.

The hand of God against thee? No;
Oh, say not, Christian, this is so,
To stay thy doubts when winds are rough,
The past survey, 'tis sure enough;
'Tis he who led thee all along,
'Tis he who filled thy mouth with song,
His kindness gleams in all thy way;
The hand of God against thee? Nay.

Because the hour is dark with gloom,
Is that fair reason to assume
That he in anger turned away
From thee he loved but yesterday?
The treasure thou mayst not obtain
Doth he withhold for greater gain;
His love is just as strong in woe
As when the fount of joy doth flow.

If thou couldst only understand,
Against thee never is his hand:
The winds and storms he gives them force
To drive thee homeward in their course;
If sun and soldiers blend all day
They might become thee on thy way,
Thy vessel tossed upon the tide,
Has still a pilot, port and guide.
His chastisements are sure no sign
That he's forgot his love divine;
Thine eyes with sorrow he makes dim,
That thou mayst grope thy way to him;
In all his dealings thou mayst trace
His love, his mercy and his grace:
If thou canst only understand,
Against thee never is his hand.

LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE PATRIARCH JACOB.—No. 2.

So Jacob wanders forth alone, poor and helpless, and all through his life is written the divine motto, "my strength is made perfect in weakness" but the ingenuity of human perverseness has been traced to the uttermost to malign him, he is even accused of trying to "strike a bargain with God" in offering to give him a tenth of all that he received from him. I confess I have hardly patience to wait to refute such an absurd charge that has been urged with all the solemnity of ponderous sermonising, and the moral drawn that not a tenth of our property but all our lives and all our property ought to be devoted, and so forth and so forth. It will usually be observed though that many who have devoted themselves to the "cause of God" are very ready when a special call for financial help is made, to announce the fact to their congregation hoping that the "Lord will open the hearts of the hearers." You dear reader, the man that puts down the cash is the person to be relied on; he is the result of the happy union of faith and works, of which Jacob was an illustration, for when the Lord Jehovah made the promises to him the first thing he thought of was to work for his great Master and do something in return.

When Jacob at the end of his journey falls in love with the little sheep tender Rachel, and here the tender softness of his nature shows itself, he had no thought of wealth or aggrandizement, he offered seven long years of service for the hand of his lady-love, and my pen is entirely insufficient to express the proper indignation at the trick that the treacherous Laban played on him under the excuse that it was the "fashion in their country." What would Esau have done in such a case? Why, his disappointed passion would have reverberated throughout all the vales of Syria, his tears would have been as the "Abana and Pharpar rivers of Damascus," and Uncle Laban would have had to keep close for some time to come; as for poor Leah it would have fared hard with her I think.

But it was quite otherwise in this case. Laban well knew the soft and gentle character he had to deal with or he would never dared to have practiced such an imposition, and the patience and integrity of long-suffering Jacob shine forth in other seven long years of service, but I expect he made sure next time and took a peep "behind the veil" to see if there were any more "customs of the country" that he was not acquainted was with, and when he had secured his long toiled for treasure the next thing he wanted to do was to leave. The treatment he had received at the hands of his uncle had estranged him. He had found him with a "few sheep in the wilderness," attended by a little girl, and he had made him a large stock owner, for which services he had been married to all the females in the family.

And we now come to the greatest and the gravest of the accusations against the character of Jacob, to an incident in his life that has been held up by sneering infidels as a taunt against the God of Jacob, and by warped minded theologians as an instance of duplicity that is to be greatly and ponderously regretted and which led to future misfortunes, etc., from which moral lessons, firstly, secondly and thirdly are to be carefully drawn. I refer to the agreement which he made with Laban for all his marked sheep and the means which he took to mark them. I will pass over the fact that Jacob as a sister's son had a right to blood relationship with Laban, that as a daughter's husband he had a certain claim to consideration, and that as the actual maker of Laban's fortune he had a right to demand whatever shares in the business he thought proper. I say I pass these facts over lightly and quickly, but insist at the same time that they shall be recognized in passing, and proceed to consider the justice of Jacob's dealings.

Now the first thing that Jacob did when the agreement was ratified that all the "speckled and ring-streaked" of the flock should be his was to remove those that were thus marked away from the flock that he tended and give them to his boys to care for and keep, three days' journey away, in order that there would be no contamination from the only natural source. The means that he employed for securing his share is one that is entirely supernatural. No man since his day has ever succeeded in accomplishing the like, in fact it is so explicitly stated in the record, and Jacob allows himself that not his own skill but the divine blessing had accomplished the result, Gen. xxxi. 5, 13; to affirm that Jacob "took a mean advantage" of Laban is to say that Gideon took a mean advantage of the Midianites, first crawling up under the cover of night and eavesdropping, and secondly by scarring them at midnight with flashing light and breaking crockery, or that Samson took a mean advantage of the poor, dear Philistines when he rushed at them so suddenly with the jaw-bone of an ass. For my part I doubt if many of Jacob's accusers, in Jacob's place, would have relied upon the blessing of a kind Providence and the doubtful expedient of "pilled rods" when different flocks of sheep so easily and so accidently stray together sometimes.

But at last Jacob leaves Laban. Robbed and beat out of the various agreements made, he gets tired of being connected with his parsimonious uncle, and even the daughters are disgusted and glad to leave the paternal roof that offered no shelter, and here we have now before us a picture of human helplessness and divine aid, an instance of "man's extremity, God's opportunity," that has never been surpassed if equaled in the history of the world. Jacob surrounded by flocks of sheep, perhaps a few shepherds, a lot of timid women and babies and some overgrown boys just old enough to get him into trouble and not old enough to fight him out, is escaping away from a man of some military power of which he boasts Gen. xxxi. 29, and who is armed in hot pursuit. His road leads through the territory of numerous tribes of Canaanites strongly armed and the end of his journey is to meet a foreign brother who considers that he has been wronged and who starts out to meet him with 400 men. Foes behind, foes around, foes coming up in front, one almost trembles to venture into such a situation in imagination unarmed, yet Jacob with calm courage and a fortitude that leans upon the "God of his father Isaac" keeps on his way. It is a matter of conjecture what could have been the motive of Esau in bringing out such an enormous array. It does not seem as if he harbored any of his old grudge, and even if he had such armament would have been unnecessary; a dozen armed men could have probably murdered, frightened away and taken prisoners the whole of Jacob's company. The probability is that Esau, knowing what sort of people the Canaanites were, thought it best to err on the safe side, and at least have enough men to take care of him. He even seems to have been surprised at Jacob's lonesomeness in the way of defenses, and kindly offered to leave some of his "folk" as a guard, which, however, Jacob declined; his Guard was unseen and to Esau unknown. Still along through the story of the return of Jacob, warped spiritual vision, called sentiment, sees nothing but cowardice and fear; cowardice in propitiating Esau, cowardice even in the arrangements for his meeting, and some of the same theological authorities who disparage the conduct of Jacob take occasion to speak of the treacherous action of Simeon and Levi as "gallant conduct!"

In the story of Abraham we have revealed to us the God of promise and the pledge of a future inheritance. In the story of Isaac we have the God of hope, but in the story of Jacob we have illustrated the ever-present God, the God of help in time of need, and the God of succor in time of trouble, the God of the present as well as the God of the past, the "Living God." The lesson of Jacob's life for all time is living trust for the present life as well as hope for the future. Poor and alone he went forth trusting; rich and "spread into bands" he returned still trusting and putting no confidence in the arm of flesh. Would that we could all take the lesson to heart and practice the spirit of Jacob.

The Gathering of the Nations; or, the Judgment of the Sheep and the Goats.—Matt. xxv. 31-46.—No. 4.

Observe next, the destiny of those who neglect to care for the needy. "Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into the eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels." Here we have additional evidence that the judgment of these passages is prior to the thousand years' reign, for it is at the end of the thousand years' reign that the devil is cast into it; and hence the force of the word, "prepared for the devil and his angels." Before Satan is cast into this fire, he is bound for a thousand years, and then loosed for a little time. These wicked persons, these neglecters of Christ's brethren, are cast into it about the same time that Satan is bound, and before the Millennium commences, and therefore the fire is spoken of simply as "prepared for the devil and his angels." This is clear proof that this gathering and judgment of the nations is previous to the establishment of the Millennial kingdom. And it is at this gathering and judgment that the beast and the false prophet are "cast alive into the lake of fire," according to Rev. xix. 20; and it is after the finishing of the thousand years that the devil is "cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where are also the beast and the false prophet," according to Rev. xx. 7-10.

The casting of these unrighteous, hardhearted individuals into the eternal fire, as here taught, agrees with other passages referring to the same period. "For, behold, the Lord will come with fire, and his chariots shall be like the whirlwind; to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire will the Lord plead and by his sword, with all flesh: and the slain of the Lord shall be many." "A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened. I beheld at that time because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and he was given to be burned with fire." "For, behold, the day cometh, it burneth as a furnace; and all the proud, and all that work wickedness, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch," Isa. lxvi. 15, 16; Dan. vii. 10, 11; Mal. iv. 1. The same time of judgment is referred to in the 14th chapter of Zechariah, and the 14th and 19th chapters of the Revelation; and the context of the above passages and the entire scope of these chapters show that this gathering of the nations and this judgment upon them, is not the great white throne judgment of the dead at the finishing of the thousand years' reign, but the judgment of the living when that reign is about to be established.

Just at this point two thoughts are very important to be borne in mind. One is, it is a sad mistake to conclude, as many do, that because the wicked shall be cast into the eternal fire, they will, therefore, have an eternal existence. One Scripture, specially if it is liable to be misunderstood, must always be read in the light of others and be interpreted by others that are analogous. Now various other Scriptures show that the wicked when cast into the fire, will perish, or be consumed. The passages just quoted from Malachi declares that they shall be burnt up, which is fatal to the awful theory that they shall live for ever and ever in the fire. Another thought, important to be remembered is, that those on the left hand can only include those entirely destitute of faith in the Son of God, and therefore, destitute of love and beneficence as the fruit of faith, or those who are wilfully disobedient. For various other Scriptures show that multitudes will not come under this judgment of condemnation, but will be spared, and will be brought to serve the Lord. Then, in that solemn hour, come when it may, there will be in the world millions of little children who have not reached the age of responsibility, and also millions of boys and girls in whom the moral faculties are only just developing, to say nothing of millions of others—Bible Under who, while they may not have taken the decisive step, and chosen whom they will serve, have assumed no open attitude of opposition against the Christ. These, we think, will not, can not, come under this curse. Certain it is, that numerous passages teach that after this judgment of the living nations, vast multitudes will be brought to a saving knowledge of the Lord, and if they do not come from these classes, whence can they come?

From verse 46, "And these shall go away into eternal punishment: but the righteous into eternal life;" it is plain that there will be no more reversal of this judgment, no change of this sentence. Hence the eternal destinies of some will be fixed before the thousand years' reign. As the life of the righteous will be eternal, so the punishment of the wicked will be eternal. But nothing is said here of the nature of this punishment, which other passages show is death, destruction, perishing; indeed, this is abundantly proved by the analogy of Scripture on this point. It is the opposite of life. The life of the righteous will always continue; it will never be bounded or limited by death: so the punishment of the wicked, which is death, will always continue; it will never terminate by a resurrection to life. Professor J. H. Meyer says, "The images which Jesus employs, and the threatening that they shall perish, signify that the sufferings of the lost must issue in a horrible and total destruction both of soul and body. There cannot be two kinds of life eternal. The just alone will continue eternally." It seems to us that it would be a moral impossibility for Jehovah to continue the existence of millions of millions of sinners; as an endless life in sin would produce endless suffering, and cause grief to untold millions of holy beings.

It is a thought that often causes sadness to us, that notwithstanding such clear and abundant light has been so widely spread upon this subject, and some of the greatest scholars have expressed the same view which we have now given, and this view has been acknowledged to be in harmony with the general scope of Scripture by vast numbers of intelligent and Bible loving laymen, there are still so many ministers in the large denominations—especially in the Methodist denomination—who, bound and fettered by their subscription to the creeds, and afraid of losing their standing and position, adhere to the teaching we see, and sometimes have the pain to hear, defended by unsound arguments and by distorting and perverting the words of Holy Scripture. It is assumed without the shadow of a proof, by these preachers and theologians, that numerous words have one meaning in literature and ordinary discourse—the lexical meaning—and in the Bible quite another meaning. In ordinary conversation they use the words death and destruction to mean the extinction of life, to waste, to bring to naught, or put an end to; in sermons they use these words to mean living for ever in misery. In common discourse they use the words to perish, to be consumed, to be burnt up, to signify to waste away, or come to nothing; in solemn discourse in church or chapel they use these words to signify perpetual preservation in the lake of fire. Now the language generally used by the great Teacher and by the inspired writers, when they refer to the doom of the impenitent, conveys the idea that their suffering will end in the utter extinction of life. Death or destruction coming upon them, there can be no further conscious existence. Certainly they would not have used such words and phrases as death, the second death, perish, utterly perish, perdition, destruction, eternal destruction, and the like, had they intended to teach unending, conscious, and indescribable suffering.

But let none think lightly of eternal punishment, because that punishment is not eternal suffering, but the eternal destruction of body and soul, or the eternal extinction of being. No words which we can command could adequately describe the anguish of undergoing that death in the lake of fire. It will be too awful for any language to tell. And in that death is involved the eternal loss of God, and the glorious kingdom of God; the eternal loss of the happy society of saints and angels; the eternal loss of all that is true, and good, and great, and beautiful, and blessed.

This solemn thought ought at once to awaken consideration, and constrain to repentance, and lead to faith in Jesus for justification and purity of heart. Since the eternal salvation of the soul is involved in this matter, since interests of untold importance are at stake, and since a single day's delay may put your power of choice into stern necessity, or seal your doom, indifference is madness.

Our New Catechism.

Those of our people who have any care for the work of instructing the young have realized how much we needed a systemized form of instruction. We have the Scriptures of course, but we cannot teach every thing at once, neither can we always prepare elaborate lessons suitable for childrens' minds. The lesson papers in THE RESTITUTION prepared by our competent and painstaking committee are very valuable but they are adapted to older people. Adults whether old or young can learn much from them, but they are beyond the reach of little ones of eight or ten years. We gain nothing by crowding a child's mental capacity even a little. In order to make the work more profitable it should be more simple than is necessary rather than even a trifle more advanced.

We were more than rejoiced to receive from Sister Carrie Williams advance sheets of her new catechism, for in the language of country newspapers "it fills a long felt want." To any one who is acquainted with Sister Carrie's work, words of commendation are unnecessary, but to others we would say it is concise, simple and comprehensive.

While many adults could gain much information by a careful study of its pages, a little one of six may learn two or three questions and answers for a lesson and with a little help from the mother or teacher the lesson thus learned may be understood, and the foundation laid for an intelligent understanding of the truth. Let our Sunday schools supply themselves at once. Let every isolated family who wish their children to learn the truth send for one or more copies, and let the little ones devote half an hour or an hour each Sunday in learning one question, one page, or one lesson according to their ages and ability. The price is only twenty five cents per copy and we understand it will be finished up in the neat style which is customary at THE RESTITUTION Office. Sister Williams address is Cypress Cottage 445 Olive Avenue, San Diego, California. The first edition ought to be sold and the next one in course of preparation during the next six months. Every one needs it either for themselves or their neighbor. Let us take hold and do something for the children, for the work has been too long neglected. Send orders immediately.

MRS. H. V. REED.

[The Catechism is all ready, and orders will be filled at once. See advertisement elsewhere in this paper.]

BADGER, W. T. Aug. 7, 1888.

Editor Restitution:

Today is my 83th birthday anniversary—am now on the down hill side of the present life. My work in this dispensation is nearly completed, my pathway has been strewn with many pleasant and enjoyable events; as also, many that were unpleasant. I have had very much affliction, have had many sad partings with the dearest of friends, who have gone under the dominion of death, that great enemy of the race.

But few of my early associates are now living. Some made an effort to secure the right to immortality and eternal life in the world to come, while many seemingly were only interested in the present world. The great day will reveal who will be entitled to the great reward.

Our opportunities are rapidly passing by. We are now living on our farm near Badger P. O. Douglas Co., Washington Territory, came here for health, and thus far have been successful.

Crops here this season are very good, both of grain and hay. The vegetable crop is also very good.

On account of the heavy emigration to the "Big Bend Country" it is fortunate there is such a good crop.

Two Rail Roads are being built through this country from Spokane Falls to Seattle and Tacoma on Puget Sound. Steamboats are now making regular trips on the Columbia River above Priest Rapids to the mouth of the Okanogan river near the Salmon River Mines. These thorough fares will soon bring this, heretofore isolated country, into notoriety.

There is a large extent of rich prairie land not yet taken up; but at the present rate of influx of settlers it will all soon be taken.

I have been preaching some at Waterville, the county-seat of this county only one and one half miles from my house. Some are taking some interest in the gospel proclamation, but the majority do not appear to give them any serious thoughts.

To get rich, is the aim of so many. We are rapidly approaching the grand crisis in human affairs. We are undoubtedly near the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, when the kingdoms of this world will be ruled in righteousness by our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. May we be prepared for that event whether we be numbered among the living or dead, when the Lord comes.

Announcements.

"The Church of God" in Michigan will hold their Annual Meeting (D. V.) in Dutton, Kent Co., beginning Thursday evening, Aug. 23d, and holding over Sunday. Now brothers and sisters one and all, this meeting means more to us than any previous meeting ever held in Michigan has meant. It means more than meeting for a visit, it means business, and very important business too. It means a reunion of the State of Michigan into one common brotherhood if we are ready for it. Are we ready. If all come for that purpose, with every selfish object entirely left out, only the good of the cause at heart, feeling the great need of earnest united efforts for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, then the object of this gathering will be accomplished. Let every brother and sister in the State who are holding fast to the faith once delivered to the saints be present without fail. God's cause needs your earnest attention. Come with hearts full of love and prayer, come with hands ready to grasp every child of God with a hearty, honest welcome. Come with a purpose high and holy, and this meeting will be heralded to the throne above, with joy sinners will turn to say, "Behold how these brethren love one another," and we will all receive a blessing.

The train accommodations are much better than heretofore. Trains leave G. R. for Dutton over the Michigan Central R. R. at 1:10 p. m. reaching here 1:28 p. m. Another leaving G. R. at 5.40 p. m. reaching here at 6:00. Another leaves G. R. at 11:00 evening reaching here at 11:17 evening. Trains reach here from the East at 5:28 a. m. 9:35 a. m. 2:50 p. m. 9:53 evening.

MARY A. WOODWARD, Sec.
JACOB LEMON, Pres.
WM. MOSES, Vice Pres.

To the Brethren of the Old Conference in the State of Michigan.

The Old and New Conferences in joint work at their last conference held at Watson, voted to call both annual conferences at the same time in August of this year and at the same place. The New Conference is called to convene at Dutton as noticed in THE RESTITUTION. For some reason there is no call for the convening of the Old Conference at the same time and place. I therefore take the responsibility to request the brethren and sisters of the Old, all who can to meet with the brethren and sisters of the New Conference at Dutton as noticed in THE RESTITUTION, for the purpose of completing the work of union already done.

L. C. CHASE.

The Annual State Conference of the Church of God will meet at Claysville, Bracken P. O., Huntington Co., Ind., beginning on Friday, August 31, 1888, at 2:30 p. m., and last over Sunday. Those coming by the Nickle Plate R. R., will stop at South Whitley. Those coming on the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific R. R., or the Cincinnati, Wabash & Michigan R. R., will stop at North Manchester, where they will be met and conveyed to the place of meeting. At our meeting at Antioch last June the subject of having the churches represented at Conference by delegates was discussed, and a motion was made that each local church appoint, at a meeting of the church held previous to the Conference, delegates who can attend the Conference, and that the Church officers send the names of such delegates to the Conference Secretary, that they may be known as the authorized representatives of such church. It was also urged that at the same meeting the local churches collect such amounts as they can, to send to the conference for purposes of evangelising. Brethren, this work is important. Business is business, and the work of spending the money the good Lord has placed in our hands to the best advantage, requires just as much attention as any worldly affair, and a little more care. So I urge it upon every Church of God in Indiana, to have a meeting soon, and appoint your delegates and make a generous collection, and report the action, and come to the meeting prepared to make a grand good effort to do more this year than last, and do it better, for the time to work is getting very short.

The brethren and sisters at Claysville are able and willing to accommodate all who will attend. Any one intending to attend this meeting, who is not acquainted with the route, etc., will do well to write to A. G. Brookover, or Dr. C. W. Fry, Brooken, Ind., stating what time they expect to get there, and they will be cared for.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

The third annual conference of the Church of God for southwestern Nebraska will convene (D. V.) Thursday, Sept. 20, 1888, to Brother D. N. Prime's grove, five miles southeast of Arapahoe and two miles southwest of Edison. Now dear brothers and sisters we expect this to be, with the Lord's help, one of the most successful meetings ever held in the State and we want you all present. Let us remember that excuses will never prepare us for that glorious kingdom which we are striving for. We earnestly request every member in the State to be present at this meeting. Don't let any trivial circumstance keep you away again. We say come, and come praying. Those coming by rail should notify the Pres. or Sec. at Arapahoe what day they will arrive, and they will be met and conveyed to the place of meeting. The place of meeting is situated on the banks of the Republican River, in a beautiful natural grove. The brethren expect to take advantage of the excellent opportunities for camping and make it their home during the meeting. All who can should bring tents; those coming with teams should cover their wagons; but if you cannot do either do not stay away. You are welcome and will be taken care of as one of God's dear children. Remember we are all one common household. There will be hay on the ground free of charge for teams and bedding purposes. Brother A. J. Eychaner will be present to preach the word. ALBUS ADAMS, Pres.

GILBERT MISNER, Sec.

P. S. To the brother in Kansas that spoke in THE RESTITUTION some time ago of uniting with this conference, we will say, be present at the meeting, and we will try and complete such arrangements. If any information is wanted write to me and I will reply at once. A. A.

The Churches of God in Iowa will meet in Conference and for exhortation, preaching and general business, at Marathon, Buena Vista Co., Iowa, on Thursday evening, Sept. 13, 1888, and continue over the following Sunday, as Brother Gerton and Scott may arrange. We hope to have a good meeting. Let all the brethren come.

HYMN OF THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

Fighting the battle of life
With a weary heart and head,
For in the midst of the strife
The banners of joy are fled!
Fled and gone out of sight,
When I thought they were so near,—
And the murmur of hope this night
Is dying away on mine ear.

Fighting alone tonight,—
With no one even a stander-by
To cheer me on in the fight,
Or to hear me when I cry:
Only the Lord can hear,
Only the Lord can see
The struggle within, however it may appear,
Though quiet the outside be.

Lord, I would fain be still
And quiet, behind Thy shield;
But make me to know Thy will,
For fear I should ever yield,
Even as now my hands
Are cloth my heart with Lie waiting thy commands
Without one soul to thrill.

But as we, in sudden wrath
My hands unfold as I clasp,
So doth my will stand up again
And taketh its old high grasp.
Nothing but perfect trust,
And love of thy perfect will,
Can raise me out of the dust,
And fold my fears be still.

O Lord, thou bidest thy love,
And the battle almost prevail!
O grant me thy sweet grace,
That I may not utterly fail!
Fighting alone tonight,
With what a beating heart!
Lord Jesus, in the fight,
Oh, stand not thou apart!

THE AGONY OF GETHSEMANE.

The story of our Lord's passion in the Garden of Gethsemane has no parallel in any part of his antecedent life. Matthew, Mark and Luke tell this story. All the recorded facts are ascertained only by reading the three narratives together, Matt. xxvi. 36–46; Mark xiv. 32–42; Luke xxii. 39–46.

Jesus, previously to going into the Garden of Gethsemane late at night had spent several hours with his disciples in an "upper room" in Jerusalem. He there kept the Jewish passover, appointed the Lord's Supper to commemorate his death, predicted the denials of Peter and the dispersion of his disciples, pointed out Judas as the traitor, and uttered those memorable words which are recorded in the fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth chapters of the Gospel of John. Nothing appeared in his conduct or language, during all these hours, to indicate the slightest consternation or dread in view of what he knew to be immediately impending over his head, and what he had foreseen and predicted when making his last journey to Jerusalem. There was no change in the outward facts and circumstances, at the time of his agony, with the single exception that he was in the Garden of Gethsemane, whither he had voluntarily gone, and not in the "upper room." The whole change, whatever it may have been, was in himself.

And yet this calm and self-collected Jesus, whose life had been one of perfect purity and the most intimate companionship with God the Father, had no sooner entered the Garden of Gethsemane than he began to exhibit the signs of extreme mental suffering. He "began to be sorrowful and very heavy," and "sore amazed." He described his own condition by saying to Peter, James and John: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death; tarry ye here and watch with me." Going a little distance from them, he "fell on his face and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." He repeated the prayer at three different times. Luke tells us that, "being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly," and that "his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground," and that an angel was deputed from heaven to strengthen him. The Epistle to the Hebrews refers to this scene, and says that Jesus "offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears." The words describing his agony are few and simple; and yet words never painted a scene of greater apparent distress.

This agony came upon Jesus suddenly, without any change in outward circumstances, and then left him just as suddenly. He suddenly passed into it from a state of complete serenity, and as suddenly passed out of it and resumed his usual serenity. No sooner did Judas and the soldiers appear for his arrest than this agony came to an end. It was instantaneous in its coming, and equally so in its departure, while overwhelming during its continuance.

It is worthy of special notice that the Evangelists simply state the facts of our Lord's passion—when it began and when it ended; what he did and what he said, and how he appeared—thus setting the scene before us without a single word explanatory of its direct cause. They did not attempt to be philosophers, and, as such, to account for the facts which they state. Christians had better imitate their example in this respect. They will best impress their own hearts by simply reading the narrative, and, in contemplative thought, vividly seeing their Savior just as he is presented in the narrative. It is enough to know that in the plan of God suffering was appointed to this Savior, and that in the Garden of Gethsemane he was a sufferer in the extremest form of mental anguish, without attempting to be curiously wise above what is written. Mere human speculation here is out of place, and had better be omitted altogether. Next to the simple record itself, we prefer Tappan's lines to anything we have ever seen or read in regard to the agony of Gethsemane:

"'Tis midnight—and on Olive's brow
The star is dimmed that lately shone:
'Tis midnight—in the garden now
The suffering Saviour prays alone.

"'Tis midnight—and from all removed Immanuel wrestles there with fears;
Even the disciples that he loved,
Heed not his Master's grief and tears.

"'Tis midnight—and for others' guilt
The Man of Sorrows weeps in blood;
Yet he that hath in anguish knelt,
Is not forsaken by his God.

"'Tis midnight—and from other plains
Is borne the song that angels know...
Unheard by mortals in the strains
That sweetly soothe the Savior's woe."

This hymn, while beautiful and touching as poetry, has its basis in the facts of the Biblical record, and, like the record itself, sets before us Jesus of Nazareth as he was when enduring the mysterious agony of Gethsemane. Let us never forget that our Savior was a sufferer. Let his words be our guide when we are called to suffer: "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." The Christian should thus qualify every prayer he makes. The example of Jesus should be followed in even the bitterest anguish of his earthly life.—The Independent.

THE BABY'S BURIAL AT SEA.

The saddest sight of life we ever witnessed was on an ocean voyage, in the death and burial of the child of a lowly German woman. Her husband had been smitten by consumption, and, with that longing so peculiar to this form of disease, thought if he could breathe the air of his own boyhood's Rhine cliffs, he would be well again. But being poor, he had to cross in February in the steerage. The cold winds, scanty fare, and hard bed were too much for him, and he had but scarcely reached his home when hemorrhages attacked him, and he sent to St. Louis for his wife and only child, a son, that he might see them again. The wife sold her scanty household outfit, and taking her babe, set out to see her husband's face ere she should know what penniless widowhood and orphanage meant.

She wept night and day, and worst of all, she knew not what would become of the fatherless child. But soon she learned God's purpose. The child wasted away; his mother's grief had robbed him of his natural nurture, and she could secure no other. The poor people with her taxed themselves, and the little milk left from cabin use was procured, but the child closed its eyes in its mother's arms. She sat with it in her arms, bemoaning her sad fate until the ship's officers compelled its burial.

The ship carpenter prepared the rough box with the weights to sink it to its ocean bed; tender hands clipped the golden locks from the little head, to be carried to the dying father, and what remained was buried over the pale brow. No wraps enfolded it but the faded calico gown. A poorer neighbor spread her linen handkerchief over its face, and the carpenter filled up the space with clean shavings, and as he did his work he groaned and said "God bless this poor mother; God be thanked the was born in safe."

The captain came down to read the committal service, according to the law. He was a hard-faced, swearing, blustering Englishman, but beneath had a manly heart. He said to the carpenter, "Screw down the lid." "O no, captain," said the heart-stricken mother, "let me look at my baby once more."

He turned away and waited. Again he said to the grief-stricken mother, "I am sorry to deprive you of any comfort. God knows you have had few enough. But I must read the service."

She lifted herself, and the carpenter screwed down the lid, amid the sobs of the poor around her, and the tears as well, of those happier in this world's goods, looking down from the upper deck. The captain read in pitiative tones the service, and faltered as he read, "I am the resurrection and the life." Poor man! Why he faltered at the anchor of human hope we could never tell. He took the box to be lowered into the billowy bed; "the mother shrieked: "O captain!" and laid hold once more of her treasure; the captain stood waiting for her to kiss that rough box, and then she said in broken English, "Father, thy will be done." And the little casket dropped into the sea, which took it quickly to its bosom, and a bubble rose, the sea's last messenger to tell us that all was well.—Dr. Buchmore in "Dumb Animals."

The Service of Love.

Obedience beyond the strict limits of command will always be given by love. It is a poor, grudging service that weighs obedience as a chemist does some precious medicine, and is careful that not the hundredth part of a grain more than the prescribed amount shall be doled out. A hired workman will fling down his lifted trowel full of mortar at the first stroke of the clock, though it would be easier to lay it on the bricks; but where affection moves the hand it is a delight to add something over and above to bare duty. The artist who loves his work will put many a touch on it beyond the minimum which will fulfill his contract. Those who adequately feel the power of Christian motives will not be anxious to find the least they durst, but the most they can, do. If obvious duty requires them to go a mile, they will rather go two than be scrupulous to stop as soon as they see the mile-stone. A child who is always trying to find out how little will satisfy his father cannot have much love. Obedience to Christ is joy, peace, life. The grudging servants are limiting not only their possession of these, but limiting their active surrender of themselves. They seem to be afraid of having too much of these blessings. A heart truly touched by the love of Jesus Christ will not seek to know the lowest limit of duty, but the highest possibility of service.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Weethee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprise, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar forces, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, history, monarchy, republics, policy, all are shown to be used by the great Molding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 340 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 17.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE POST-TERTIARY OR QUATERNARY AGE.—CONCLUDED.

The historic age draws near its close. Already the lengthening shadows are cast over the descending slopes and inclines of the past. The blood-stained, tear-washed pages of the book of history of purely human governments is nearly filled to its final page, and ready to be sealed up; all of its tales of woe and sorrow, ambition, avarice, lust, pride, contention and strife; all of its debauchery, and shame, and ignominy, and death; its maxims, and its laws, its national oppression and individual intrigues; its lofty spires, its printing presses, and its other varied industries, await the voice of the angel who shall stand "upon the sea and upon the earth, and sware by him that liveth forever and ever, who created heaven and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer."

The prophecies of the age seem to have been nlfilled by its historical developments, literally and completely, and the impending age-judgment is at hand. The "signs in the sun, and the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming upon the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken," are matters of past history, and their fulfilment admonishes us, upon whom the latter days have fallen, to watch for the next event in the order of prophecy, to-wit, the coming of the Son of man in a cloud with power and great glory, and the near approach of the redemption time. Paul, adverting to the present state of things, and contrary to the commonly expressed opinion that the world is more and more nearly approaching millennial peace through the preaching of the gospel, says, "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trace-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof." 2 Tim. iii. 1–5. Christ speaking of the same period says, in speaking of the social relations peculiar to it, "as it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark. Likewise, also, as it was in the days of Lot, they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." Luke xvii. 26–30. "Evil men and seducers," says Paul, shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived," and he exhorts Timothy, warning him that "the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap unto themselves teachers having itching ears; and they shall turn away from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables."

The toes of the image beheld by Nebuchadnezzar in his vision have been reached in the historical fulfilment of prophecy, and the smiting stone's manifestation is certainly a near event in the future. The house of Israel has been sifted "among all nations like as corn is sifted in a sieve;" dispersed and scattered, until the times of the Gentiles are overpast, for a return to the land of their fathers, the lot of their inheritance, and national salvation. The peculiar features of the present time indicate in plainest speech that,

"We are living, we are dwelling,
In a grand and awful time;
In an age on ages telling;
To be living is sublime."

Socialism, nihilism, communism, and organized anarchy, threaten the existence of every form of government. The crowned heads of Europe and of the world, sit unsteadily on their thrones, fearing, dreading the next move of their restless subjects, who with powder-blast, and dynamite, and mob parade are ready to institute a reign of terror and destruction fiercer far, because more wide-spread, than that which shook the very foundations of France from center to circumference, in which human life was wantonly sacrificed, and the blood of her best citizens flowed like water through her capital's streets and thoroughfares. Drunkenness, wantonness and blasphemy are prevalent and increasing. Bolts and bars yield only slight security to human life and treasure. Theft, arson and murder have become so common that their details scarcely receive ordinary notice among the current events of the day. Mob law abounds, and loose rein is given to all the baser qualities in man, not only in their moral and social associations, but also in the discharge of public duties. Strikes, failures, defalcations, treachery and bribery mark the career of industry, finance and legislation. Capital and labor, instead of combining to enhance the public good, are pitted against each other for selfish and ambitious aims and ends. Accidents and casualities on sea and land strike terror to the hearts of the earth-dwellers. Earthquakes, cyclones, hurricanes and tornadoes, desolate vast tracts, destroying human life and property beyond a parallel in human history, while tidal waves and holocausts envelop immense areas in utter confusion and ruin. Death-dealing agencies everywhere are pitted against human existence, and against the perpetuity of human institutions. Nor are the phenomena confined to the earth alone; sun spots and atmospheric and celestial peculiarities have attracted the attention of all classes of persons as they never have done before. The mind of the scientist is baffled in attempting to account for all these signs; yet they are facts for scientific investigation even though unaccounted for.

In religious matters too, complaints of many kinds occur, in reference to lack of zeal and loss of practical piety. Church fairs, lotteries and festivals take the place of earnest search-ing after truth, holiness and purity of life. The tall spires reaching heaven-ward, the costly pews with their heavy frontals and the elaborate furnishings of their interior, denote a service essentially different from that of him who had not where to lay his head, in the churches and in their appointments.

The inventions of the past few years astonish us with the rapidity of their occurrence, and by the completeness of their adaptation to the labors and functions of each. The electric telegraph, the telephone, and steam navigation all have an important place to fill now, and, also, in the actual closing scenes of this age. The locomotive steam engine graphically described by the prophet, as "the chariots," which, says he, "shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation, and the fir trees shall be terribly shaken. The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall justle one against another in the broad ways; they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings. He shall recount his worthies; they shall stumble in their walk; they shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defense shall be prepared," Nah. ii. 3–5, has its share of the work to perform, while iron-clad and turreted ships of war, covered with almost indestructible armor, and the remarkable advance of the nations in the science of warfare and defense, and the sunken torpedoes and battering-ram-beaked torpedo boats, together with the inventions and new discoveries of new missiles and explosives, forecast the terrific character of the warfare of the future.

Proposed railways in countries heretofore untraversed save by caravans with camels and dromedaries; while surveyed and their roadbeds located for immediate pecuniary gain on the part of the countries by which the proposed routes are engineered and located, only hasten the completion of Post tertiary age-work, and the final age-crisis for which the student of prophecy is waiting, watching and earnestly praying.

Earnest searchers after the truth are now, and for years have been on the alert, watching the footprints in the onward march of events, feeling well assured that the end of this, the Post-tertiary age is at hand, and that their redemption undoubtedly draws nigh,—that it is even now at the doors.

For eighteen centuries God has been taking out of the Gentile nations a people for his name; a class of persons, who, regardless of nationality, sex, or condition in life, through faith in him, and in the name and official work of Jesus Christ his Son, as recorded in the gospel of the kingdom of God to this age, shall so reform their characters, by repenting of past offences, and by ceasing to remain willful transgressers of the requirements of that gospel, and by obeying from the heart the form of doctrine contained therein, and by subsequently walking in newness of life,—as to be worthy of life, and kingly honor in the age to come.

In such persons "the Word" (which was made flesh and dwelt among us), becomes the power of God unto salvation. It quickens them, and through it they receive the adoption into the household of faith. Obedient to it, their characters are matured by adding to their "faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." 2 Peter i. 5–7. Treasured through life, and retained at death, the same Word insures their resurrection from among the dead ones, to the power of an endless life, and the enjoyment of all the blessings Adam lost by his transgression; a participation in all the honors and powers promised to Abraham: and a joint heirship with the Son of God in all he possesses and inherits, as well as the free and equal association with the holy, pure, and good, and saved ones, from every land and nation, from righteous Abel and translated Enoch to the close of Post-tertiary time.

Students of prophecy are everywhere on the alert watching the onward march of events, knowing that soon the Gentile times will be fulfilled; that soon Jesus the mediating priest, having fulfilled his mission in heaven, will leave the Father's presence, and close the gospel dispensation; that soon the elect will be gathered from the earth nations; that soon the resurrected and changed ones will be caught away to meet the Lord in the air; and that very soon the era of judgment on the historic age will begin, with Jesus, the Christ, coronated King of kings and Lord of lords, upon his throne in Jerusalem restored, and only close with the subjugation of "all rule, and all authority and power," and the full fruition of Christian faith and hope in the everlasting kingdom of God.

"For Ye Serve the Lord Christ."

"For ye serve the Lord Christ," is my comfort day by day. Men may find fault with my work but I am not in their service; they are not my masters. What I do, I do unto the Lord and not unto man. He is my judge as to the quality and the quantity of my labor, and from him I expect the reward of the inheritance.

So dear brethren and sisters let this be your comfort. You have done much for the cause. You have given of your means. You have spent your time and your strength to build up the dear flock of God. You have traveled through heat and cold that others might have the precious truth.

Your work may not be appreciated as you feel that it should be, but the Savior appreciates it; he remembers you, and it is he whom you serve. Put self out of sight. Let the slights all go; the Master loves and cares for you. May he comfort you with his grace as he has comforted me and prepare you for his heavenly kingdom as he is preparing me, is my prayer.

S. ROXANA WIRES.

When he raised his Son from the dead, he showed us that life and not death was his purpose, both for him and for us. Resurrection is at once our faith and our hope.—Bonar.

Selections.

JOHN'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 1.

In the three preceding lectures we considered first the political character and relations of Romanism, as prefigured in the prophecies of Daniel; and next its ecclesiastical character and relations, as predicted in the epistles of Paul.

We have now to consider the combination of these two aspects, or the politico-ecclesiastical character of Romanism, as presented in the prophecies of John.

The Apocalypse, or "Revelation of Jesus Christ," is an advance on all other prophecies. It gives the complete story of Christ's kingdom, exhibiting it both from an external and an internal point of view, and unveiling its political as well as its ecclesiastical history. In its faithful reflection of the future it gives central prominence to the Roman power and apostasy. On this subject it enters into detail, and exhibits the mutual relations of the Latin Church and Roman State, using composite figures for this purpose,—figures one part of which represent the political aspect of Romanism as a temporal government, and the other its religious aspect as an ecclesiastical system.

Two great forefigures of Romanism are given in the Apocalypse, the one concerning its rise and reign in chapter xiii., and that relating to its decline and fall in chapters xvii.,-xix.

Both of these prophecies are double. The first is the prophecy of "the beast" and the "false prophet;" the second is that of "the beast" and the "harlot." The false prophet acts for "the beast," the harlot rides upon "the beast." In each case there are two powers, perfectly distinct yet closely connected. The "beast" and "false prophet" can neither be confounded nor separated. Similarly, the "beast" and "harlot" are associated. The beast carries the harlot during all her long career of crime and cruelty, and they both come to their ruin in the same judgment era of the vials of God's righteous wrath which terminate the present dispensation.

Before considering the interpretation of these wonderful Apocalyptic visions, it will be necessary to devote a few moments to the relation which exists between the prophecies of Daniel and those of John. We are exhibiting the prophecies of Romanism as a whole, and in order to this it is necessary to trace the simple yet profound connection between the foreview granted to the Jewish prophet in Babylon in the days of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, and that given to the Christian apostle in Patmos, in the days of Domitian.

The prophecies of Daniel and the book of Revelation may be considered as two parts of a single prophecy; their subject is the same, and their symbols are the same. They reveal the course of cruel, idolatrous Gentile empires, followed by the eternal kingdom of God; and in doing this they employ the same symbols. Daniel revealed the four empires; John the fourth only, for the first three had in his time passed away. Babylon, Persia, Greece had fallen; but Rome was still in the zenith of its greatness, destined to endure for many ages, and to rule, even to our own day, a large section of the human race. To John therefore was shown with considerable fulness, the future of the Roman power. The Apocalypse contains a marvellous foreview of the rise, reign, decline, and fall of the Roman Papacy, of the sufferings and triumphs of the saints of God during its continuance, and their enthronement at its close.

The Roman empire is presented to Daniel and to John under one and the same striking and special symbol, a ten-horned wild beast. Daniel saw the Medo-Persian empire as a two-horned ram, one horn being higher than the other, Dan. viii. 3. He saw the Grecian empire as a four-horned goat, Dan. viii. 8–22; and he saw the Roman empire as a ten-horned wild beast. Thus these three great empires as seen by Daniel were two-horned, four-horned, ten-horned. This is remarkable and easy to be remembered. Now Daniel's ten-horned beast reappears in the Apocalypse. Here we have an important link between the Old Testament and the New, and a clue to the meaning of the last book of Scripture. Let us try to be clear on this point. The four wild beasts represent Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome. The fourth is ten-horned. This ten-horned beast of Daniel reappears in the Apocalypse, the divinely given symbol of the fourth and final earthly empire. You see in chapters xii., xiii., and xvii. of the book of Revelation. Compare now the passages.

First, Daniel vii. 7: "I saw in the night visions, and beheld a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had ten horns." Next, Revelation xii. 3: "A great red dragon, having ten horns." Revelation xiii. 1: "I saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having ten horns." Lastly, Revelation xvii. 3: "A scarlet colored beast, having ten horns."

It is universally admitted that this fourth, or ten-horned beast, represents the Roman empire. The angel himself so interprets it. I want you particularly to notice the fact that we are not left to speculate about the meaning of these symbols; that the all-wise God who selected them, and gave them to us, has condescended to give us their interpretation. All these principal visions are divinely interpreted.

First, as to the vision of the four-fold image there is an inspired interpretation of a most detailed character. You remember the words with which it begins, "This is the dream, and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king."

Then in the vision of the four wild beasts there is the interpretation beginning thus: "So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things." So with the vision of the second and third empires in Daniel viii., there is the interpretation. Daniel says: "I heard a man's voice.... which called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision," and so forth.

The same method is followed in the Apocalypse. The opening vision of the seven candlesticks is interpreted. You remember the words, "The seven candlesticks which thou sawest are the seven Churches." And similarly, the vision of the woman seated on the seven-headed, ten-horned beast, in chapter xvii., is interpreted: every part of it is interpreted. Observe the angel's words: "I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns." Mark in your Bibles, if you will, these four sentences in the angelic interpretation:

"The beast which thou sawest."
"The ten horns which thou sawest."
"The waters which thou sawest."
"The woman which thou sawest."

These four sentences are the key to the Apocalypse. The beast, the horns, the waters, the woman are all interpreted; and their interpretation involves, or carries in it, the interpretation of the Apocalypse. The seven heads of the beast are also interpreted, and so interpreted as to tie down the symbol to the Roman empire. For the angel mentions an important note of time; he says of the seven heads, "five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come." The heads of this beast then, when the vision was revealed, were past, present, and future; five were past, the sixth then existed, the seventh was not yet come. This demonstrates the power in question to be the Roman empire. The then reigning power of John's day was symbolized by the sixth head of a seven-headed beast. This is certain. And the then reigning power was that of the Cæsars of pagan Rome. This is equally certain. Therefore the Roman Cæsars were represented by the sixth head of the symbolic beast. Now, to make assurance doubly sure, mark the closing sentence in the angelic interpretation: "The woman which thou sawest is that city which reigneth over the kings of the earth." Note the words, "which reigneth" (ἡ ἔχουσα βασιλείαν), or as it is in Latin, "quæ habet regnum super reges terræ:" and the woman which thou sawest is the great city which has (or holds) the kingdom (or government) over the kings of the earth." The great city "which reigneth," not which did reign, nor which shall reign, but "which reigneth," or was actually reigning then. What great city was reigning then over the kings of the earth? Rome, and none other. Rome then is the power which is signified.

We have now got the key to the Apocalypse; we are no longer lost in a crowd of uninterpreted symbols. The beasts of Daniel and John are empires. The ten-horned beast is the Roman power. This beast appears three times in the Apocalypse; it is expounded by the angel. This expounded symbol is the key to the entire prophecy.

"And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy. And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion: and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority. And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast. And they worshiped the dragon that gave power unto the beast: and they worshiped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him? And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations. And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

The head is the governing power in the body. The heads of this beast represent successive governments. Mark the "deadly wound" inflicted on the last of its seven heads, and the marvellous healing of that wound, or the revival of the slain head or government, then mark the tyrannical and dreadful doings of this revived or eighth head. It becomes a great and terrible enemy of God's people, a Roman enemy—not an early Roman enemy, not a pagan Cæsar, not a Nero or a Domitian, but one occupying a later place, a final place; for none succeeds him in that empire, since it is foretold that his destruction will be accomplished at the advent of Christ in his kingdom.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

Training Value of Hardship.

Hardship may be a means of developing a noble character; but hardship does not in itself give nobleness to a character. When we consider how large a part in the shaping and direction of this or that man's highest personality has been connected with his meeting and enduring hardship, we are inclined to fear that those children who have no call to similar experiences of hardship may lack the training which would bring them to their worthiest manhood. But the men who have profited by hardship have simply done the best they could do in the circumstances which surrounded them—in the providence of God. And the child who does the best he can do in his God-chosen circumstances, whose there is no call to hardship, is likely to gain a better development of character for the work God has for him to do, than he could have gained through any hardship sought merely for its training value. There is no better school for any human soul than the school of God's choosing for that soul.

It is announced that Lieut. Wissmann, who is now in Egypt, en route to Zanzibar, is a member of the Emin Bey Relief Committee. If the relief expedition proves successful, it is intended to form and maintain a commercial highway with stations from the lakes eastward. For this purpose the "German-African Lakes Company" will be formed.

Nejia and Mariba—A Jewish Residuum.

These two names denote extensive districts in the Arabian peninsula, which have of late been annexed to the dominions of the Sultan, without any bloodshed, at the instance of the Emirs themselves. The Judische Presse reproduces the decree published in the Sana, the official journal of the province of Yemen, ordering the annexation of the two districts. It tells us that Seba is the Sheba of Scripture, and the spice spoken of in 1 Kings x. 10 is the cinnamon from which the natives produce scented oils and salves, instead of using it as a condiment in the way in which it is used in Europe. It appears that the sacred oils that were used in the Temple of Jerusalem were also prepared from cinnamon and conveyed to Palestine by caravans of Arab merchants. Hitherto no European has yet found his way to Seba, but now this province forms part of the Turkish Empire, it is probable that travellers will not henceforth have to pay their curiosity with their lives, as has been the case hitherto.

From the paper quoted it would appear that the district of Mariba offers more interest even that the district of Seba. Mariba extends right up to the great desert of Arabia, and in it is to be found a people of nomads, who profess to be descended from the tribe of Dan. According to their own account they were forced to emigrate to Northern Arabia long before the destruction of the first temple, and after living for a length of time in the North they proceeded to the south of the peninsula, which now bears the name of Yemen. The account proceeds as follows:

"By the tribe of Dan are not to be understood the whole of the descendants of the eighth son of Jacob, but only a portion of it which, by its timely flight into Arabia, escaped the general fate of its brothers, and was not sent adrift right into the world, like the rest of them. Such fractions of Jewish tribes are also to be met with in other parts of Asia. Thus, David Reubeni, the political fanatic of the 16th century, professed to be a scion of the tribe of Reuben that was settled in Northern Arabia. The Jews of the Caucasus and of the Russian province of Daghestan on the Caspian lake boast their descent from the two and a-half tribes originally settled on the left bank of the Jordan (Reuben, Gad, and one half Manasseh). Lastly, the few Jews living in Afghanistan profess to belong to the tribe of Benjamin, and cannot consequently have any connection with the ten lost tribes, seeing that Benjamin remained faithful to Judah when the remainder of the children of Israel seceded from the kingdom of the house of David.

"Genealogical pretensions of this kind need not necessarily spring from more pride and vanity, for most likely there is an historical foundation to them. Probably several families belonging to one or another of these tribes mentioned would form a caravan between them and betake themselves to the interior of the peninsula of Arabia, feeling confident that neither the armies of the Babylonians, nor of the Assyrians, nor of the Egyptians would follow them to the districts that were very difficult of access. They certainly were not disappointed in their expectation, for in Arabia they were safe from any inroads of the conquerors of the Holy Land. It may be added that the claim of the Jews of the Caucasus to be descended from the two and a-half tribes that lived to the East of the Jordan, has a great deal of plausibility about it. True, the Caucasus is as far distant from the Jordan as morning is from evening, and there are a great many different countries and peoples in between; still there is some historical evidence that the Circassians, who likewise inhabit the Caucasus, first went to live in that district, coming from Syria in the days of Joshua.

"The nomads of Mariba, who claim to be descended from the tribe of Dan, will now have no alternative but to recognize the rule of the Padishah, or to retire further into the interior of Arabia. Most probably they will submit to, and become subjects of, the Sultan. In that event they will, like the rest of the Jews of Yemen, be placed under the religious authority of the Mufti of Sana, who is the spiritual ruler of all the Jews of Southern Arabia."

LET all Churches and Associations of brethren take immediate action regarding a General Conference of the Brotherhood, to be held this fall as proposed by Bro. Geo. F. Work in our paper and in circulars which have been sent out. Some are already responding. As our Association meets about Nov. 10, and as the Presidential Election, with all its excitement also comes off early in November, this meeting could not so well be held at an earlier date than Nov. 16. This is, however, merely suggestive, as it is left to a majority to choose both place and time.

The American is the title of a new paper just started at Marlboro, Mass. —No. 1. Vol. I., having just come to hand. The two great enemies of true civilization and Bible Christianity—Rum and Romanism—are held up in all their true colors in this specimen number. The great principles advocated are, the perpetuation of our Free School System, the employment of unmutilated text books and the Bible in the instruction of the young, and, in a word, all the great principles of "free thought, free speech, free press," as claimed by enlightened Protestantism. It is a large paper well worthy of American and Protestant patronage. Terms $2.00 a year. Address Pratt Brothers, Marlboro, Mass.

The Daily News, of Jeffersonville, Ind., of Aug. 23, 1888, published the following brief memorial sketch of the life and death of Dr. Nathaniel Field. Although our acquaintance with the deceased was not the most intimate, yet we had the very best reason to regard and esteem him as a true friend. When nothing was further from our thoughts than the idea of Editing a periodical he suggested that we should assume this responsible and difficult calling and take charge of a paper with head quarters at Indianapolis. Sensible of our lack of qualification, training, and experience for a position so responsible we could not at the time gain our own assent to seriously entertain any such idea. While the Doctor was tolerant toward others of honestly differing views, he had no sympathy with exclusive fanatics or their distracting hobbies. Regarding Israelitish restoration and our views of the Coming Age, the Doctor held quite differently from the Editor and readers of THE RESTITUTION.

Not to be too lengthy with our preface, we will give room for the full account of the remarkable career of a personal friend, and a remarkable man. The Daily News speaks as follows:—

This morning at 10 o'clock, the venerable and beloved Dr. Nathaniel Field closed his eyes upon earth. Dr. Field had been ailing for some time from some injuries received during the terrible Flood of 1884. Saturday, August 18, he was seized with a severe chill, caused by an abscess on the arm, which degenerated into erysipelas. From that time on he was confined to his bed, but hopes were entertained for his recovery until yesterday, when he began to sink rapidly.

He died surrounded by his children, whose tender care was exerted to make his last hours as comfortable as possible. The venerable Doctor at last fell asleep like a child in the arms of its mother. He never faltered nor feared as he passed the vail which separates mortality from immortality.

Dr. Nathaniel Field was born in Jefferson county, Ky., November 7, 1805. He studied medicine and graduated at the old Transylvania Medical School, first institution of the kind west of the Alleghany mountains. He was married in the Grayson House, in Louisville, November 27, 1827, and located in Jeffersonville, Ind., in the summer of 1828. He was a delegate from Jeffersonville to the great Southern Railroad Convention, which assembled at Knoxville, Tenn. July 4, 1836, and the object of which was a railroad made from Charleston, S. C., to Cincinnati, with a branch to Louisville. He was a member of the Indiana Legislature in 1838 and 1839; President of the Indiana State Medical Society in 1868, and of the Third Congressional District Medical Society in 1875. He was a surgeon of the Sixty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry; was at the battle of Richmond, Ky., on August 30, 1862, remaining on the battle field twenty-five days after the battle, attending a large hospital of wounded men in the Madison Female Seminary, sleeping on the floor in a small room in the building, and experiencing great hardship and privation. He underwent the same at Perryville, having charge of another improvised hospital for nearly a month after the bloody battle.

Though born in a Slave State and of a slave holding family, he held anti-slavery views and wrote a tract against it. He was one of the vice presidents of the anti-slavery society and president of the first anti-slavery convention held in Indiana, as well as president of the first Free Soil Convention held at Indianapolis 1850. In June 1854 he voted against the entire population of this township on enforcing the black laws of the State, requiring negroes to give bond for their behavior.

At that time it was worth a man's life to take the stand the Doctor took. He pleaded with the people, but it availed nothing, the blacks were expelled. Yet the honor due courage was rendered to the venerable Doctor and he earned not only personal esteem but the respect of the people.

He had been warned, that he would have to share the fate of the negroes, but he determined to sell his life dearly rather than succumb. He stored his house, the one he died in, with ammunition, fortified it and sent the leaders of the mob word that he was ready and they might come.

He was not molested. The old log house still stands, one story high, boarded and provided with a front porch. The chimney nestling against its sides.

In 1854 Dr. Field came into possession of a number of slaves through the death of his mother, which he immediately manumitted, proving thus the sincerity of his principles.

He was a voluminous and forcible writer on many subjects and issued several volumes of medical and theological works.

He was also a minister of the Gospel and preached about sixty years, without fee or earthly reward. He has made the Gospel free of charge, as did John the Baptist, Christ and the Apostles. He constituted the first Christian church in the State of Indiana in the old Court House in Jeffersonville, on the first Sunday in March, 1830; and a second church in August, 1847, of which he was a pastor ever since, never failing, notwithstanding his professional business, to be always at his post if his health permitted. He has baptized not less than a thousand people.

His wife preceded him but a few years, dying June 24, 1885. He leaves four children, Mrs. Penelope Ferrell, Dr. David Field, Pope and John Field, ten grand children and one great-grand child also survive him.

He has been in every essential identified with the progress of this city and Southern Indiana and traces of his efforts will long survive his death.

The Church of God in Cleveland took action Sunday, Aug. 26, on the question of a meeting of representatives of the Churches.

We are heartily in favor of such a meeting, and we are in favor of the place being Philadelphia. A delegate will be chosen and his name sent in due time. For the Church of God in Cleveland. P. NEILL, Sec.

THE FINAL CONFLICT.

From the earliest period of human history war has been the trade of all organized tribes and nations. Warlike implements are the most perfect examplars of savage skill. Advancing civilization in its progress beyond barbarism has been marked mostly by warlike inventions of a more destructive character. As enlightenment has made the still more advanced nations better acquainted with destructive forces, this very boasted enlightenment has been employed to devise the most perfect means to destroy human life. Mechanics, chemistry and mathematics are taxed to the utmost by scientific investigators to perfect the arts of war. With the military drill and equipments of modern soldiers, a few battalions would hurl an army like that of Xerxes the Great to destruction so quickly as to scarcely regard it more than a trifling drill evolution. The "War of the great day of God Almighty" is now impending, and earth's millions are drilled as soldiers were never drilled, and armed as soldiers were never armed for that final conflict of the ages. Judge Gresham, who was prominently before the late Republican convention as a candidate for the Presidential nomination, and who would, in our opinion, be undoubtedly elected had he been nominated, has been interviewed lately in Paris regarding current and coming events both in this country and in Europe. As the cable dispatch is a copyright by James Gordon Bennett, we cannot, in justice to that gentleman and to the Chicago Tribune from which we copy a few sentences, do more than make the following brief extract:

Speaking of a European war he said: "The consequences of a war between any of the European Powers might be so terrible that none of these Powers are apt to rush heedlessly into such a conflict. With the present means of warlike destruction a nation might be utterly exterminated in a short time. It cannot be denied that Germany is stronger today than France, but the unexpected sometimes occurs in war as well as in politics, and nobody knows that better than the German statesmen. The readiness with which the German Emperor expresses himself might indicate a willingness on his part to see Germany again measure her strength with France, but the Emperor is young and is surrounded by conservative influences, which he will not be likely to disregard. He seems as free in making speeches as an American politician. It must, however, be admitted that he is clever and that his speeches are not commonplace."

While at the late Indiana Conference, Brother Dwiggins handed us the following clipping which he had taken from some late paper, of which we have no means of making out the name, as we would like, for due credit. It shows that causes for national disaffection are becoming world-wide, and that the final conflict will be waged on sanguinated battle fields in every quarter of the globe. Overwhelming catastrophe the most destructive will mark the transition across the bordering line from this dispensation into millennial glories. The lurid clouds are gathering for a tempest that will sweep the world with the besom of destruction. Let us watch and pray. The following is the extract:

"To the people of the Great Flowery Kingdom, by the Holy Will of the Son of Heaven (term used for the emperor of China): Owing to the continued ingratitude and unreasonableness of the peoples of the Western nations, especially of Great Britain, toward the Emperor of the Great Flowery Kingdom in regard to the national rights of his subjects upon British soil; notwithstanding the fact that sacred compacts have been entered into from time to time regulating such matters between the respective rulers of the two great empires, that Chinese subjects should have the same rights and privileges upon British soil as Englishmen upon Chinese; recently under one pretense and another the English Government, or the colonial branches, under the sanction of Her Majesty, the Queen of England, have suddenly terminated that compact by imposing a heavy import tax of $50 or more upon the head of each Chinese subject who lands upon British soil, making not only a burdensome tax upon the people but also a disgrace upon this Government in the face of other nations.

"The agents of this Government having failed to bring the agents of Great Britain to any compromise that might maintain the dignity of both and subserve the interests of all, as a last resort we now call our own subjects' attention to the following decree: The merchants, traders and all subjects of the Chinese Empire are hereby notified that on and after the fifteenth day of the fifth moon (it is the fourteenth year of the reign of the Emperor Kwong Suey (about July 16, 1888) to the fifteenth day of the fifth moon in the seventeenth year of the reign of Kwong Suey (about July 16, 1891) they are prohibited, under the death penalty from landing any merchandise or goods of whatsoever nature upon British soil for the purpose of barter or any other use, but that three years of grace is given them to dispose of their merchandise or other property already on hand preparatory to leaving British soil, on or before the fifteenth day of the fifth moon, in the seventeenth year of our reign as above mentioned. Those who fail to take heed will have no claim upon this Government thereafter.

"Given out from the Tsoon Li Ya Mon, this twenty-first day of the fourth moon, in the fourteenth year of our reign, in the presence of His Imperial Majesty, the Kwong Suey."

THE HISTORY OF ZERO

"Zero," on the common thermometer, like the fanciful names of the constellations, is a curious instance of the way wise men's errors are made immortal by becoming popular. It may be worth while to say that the word itself (zero) comes to us through the Spanish from the Arabic, and means empty, hence nothing.

Gabriel Daniel Fahrenheit from a boy was a close observer of nature, and when only nineteen years old, in the remarkably cold winter of 1709, he experimented by putting snow and salt together and noticed that it produced a degree of cold equal to the coldest day of that year. As that day was the coldest that the oldest inhabitants could remember, Gabriel was the more struck with the coincidence of his little scientific discovery, and hastily concluded that he had found the lowest degree of temperature known in the world, either natural or artificial. He called that degree zero, and constructed a thermometer, or a rude weather-glass with a scale graduated up from the zero boiling-point, which he numbered 212, and the freezing point 32. Because, as he thought, mercury contracted the 32nd of its volume on being cooled down from the temperature of freezing water to zero; and expanded 180th on being heated from the freezing to the boiling point.

RUM DID IT.

Michael Flaherty, of Jersey City, recently murdered his mother, Mary Flaherty. A little child ran into the station and told about the crime.

Flaherty was arrested. His mother was found lying on the floor in the back room of her apartments. She was badly hurt internally, and there were many black and blue bruises on her body. She said she had been asleep on her bed when her son came in drunk and pulled her off the bed by her feet. He picked up a chair and struck her with it, and then jumped on her with his heavy boots. She screamed for help and begged him to stop. Finally he left her and started out for more drink. Mrs Flaherty was 65 years old, and died of internal hemorrhage during the night. When arraigned in court Flaherty expected to see his mother appear against him, and when Justice Stilsing said solemnly: "Flaherty, you are accused of having murdered your mother," he stepped back as if shot and nearly fell to the floor. When he had recovered himself he turned to Roundsman Cowan and said in a low voice:

"So the old woman is dead, is she?"

"She is," replied the roundsman.

"Too bad! too bad!" exclaimed Flaherty. She didn't deserve this at all. Rum, the cursed stuff, did it. That was the cause of it."

Is there any need to comment upon this terrible temperance sermon?

One of the most horrible and fiendish crimes that ever came to our notice was that of the saloon-keeper on Long Island, who a few days ago deliberately blinded his wretched wife. He had put out one of her eyes a few months before in a fit of drunken rage, but she refused to make a complaint against him, and he was allowed to go unpunished. In another drunken rage he rewarded her wifely devotion by putting out the other eye. The details of the crime are too revolting for repetition here. They are enough to make the flesh creep and the blood grow cold. This is one of the crimes that may be fairly laid at the door of the saloon. The husband was probably a brute by nature, but it is impossible to believe that he could ever have committed such a fearful act when in possession of his senses. He was inflamed and maddened with drink, and in that state committed the awful deed. The law provides no adequate penalty for crimes like this. The only way to put an end to them is to put an end to the saloon, the modern juggernaut, whose wheels are ever dripping with the blood of the helpless and innocent.

Youth's Column.

ARE YOU READY?

Willie brought his little Bible,
With a grave and thoughtful look
In the eyes he lifted to me
From the pages of the book,
"Tell me what this means, dear papa!"
And he read me from God's Word
What it says of being ready
For the coming of the Lord.

When I told him of the meaning
In the words that he had read,
He was silent for a moment,
Then looked up at me and said,
Gravely, "Are you ready papa?"
Ah! the child could little know
How the simple question thrilled me
As in shame I answered "No."

"If you can't tell when He's coming,
I should think you'd want to be Always ready," said my Willie.
Looking thoughtfully at me.
"If he came to-night and called you,
You would have to say to him
'I'm not ready,' Think dear papa,"
And his eyes with tears grew dim.

Then I clasped the darling closer,
Smitten with a sudden fear
For the words that he had spoken
Seemed to bring life's end so near
And my heart cried, "O my Master!
There shall be no more delay;
Make me ready for that coming,
Be that coming when it may."

THE STORY OF ISAAC LEVINSOHN.

My soul was now perfectly satisfied that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah of Israel, and also the Savior of all men, who truly believe on him. But I could not possibly realize that he was my Savior and that he had redeemed me; and this filled me with sorrow. I was convinced that none but Jesus, once crucified, now exalted by God to his right hand in heaven, could save my soul; yet when I remembered how I had hated,—yes, how many times I had cursed that holy Name, I could not believe that he would extend his mercy or his salvation to me.

Mr Stern comforted me; he assured me the more sinful I felt, the more certain he was Jesus the Lord would pardon me. He often knelt and prayed with me, and his prayers sank deep into my heart. "If Christ does but pardon my sins," said I, "I must make a public confession of his name, and of my faith in him."

Mr. Stern requested me to write him a letter expressing myself openly, and this I did, upon which he appointed a day for my baptism—Sunday, February 4th, 1872.

My desire to publicly confess my faith in Jesus of Nazareth made me long for the day to arrive, but my heart was still hardened with thoughts of my beloved parents cutting me off from them. I wept bitterly at the prospect of being cut off from the love of my beloved mother, and the temptation became very great, but, thanks be to God, he enabled me by his Almighty grace, to triumph. I read these words of Jesus—"He that loveth father and mother more than Me is not worthy of Me," Matt. x. 37, and, as I considered the great love of my parents towards me, I considered also the unutterable love of Jesus. I meditated upon the manger in Bethlehem—the carpenter's shop in Nazareth—the hall of Herod—the scorn and the mocking of Jews and Gentiles—the crown of thorns upon his royal brow—the rugged nails piercing his hands and feet—the spear opening his side—and, more, the grave wherein his holy body, that never saw corruption was laid; and—as I thought of his love, I asked myself, "Can there be greater love than this?" The words of the hymn were certainly in my heart—

"Alas! and did my Savior bleed?
And did my Savior die?
Did he devote that sacred head
For such a worm as I?

"Was it for sins that I had done
He died upon the tree?
Amazing pity! grace unknown!
And love beyond degree!"

On Friday evening (the Jewish Sabbath), February 2nd, 1872, I visited Mr. Stern, who engaged with me in earnest prayer; and also on the evening of the Lord's day, on the morning of which Jesus my Redeemer arose from the dead, I renewed my devotions in the house of my true Christian friend.

The service was conducted in Hebrew, and I received Christian baptism in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. A large number of Jews attended the service, drawn together by curiosity.

After the service was over they followed me, throwing stones and old slippers at me, reproaching me with bitter things, so that I was glad to escape to the "Home." Yet, as I looked at the crowd of Jews following me, I could but pray for them. They were my own people according to the flesh. "Lord, have mercy on them, for they know not what they do."

One evening after this I visited an old Jewish friend, who, opening the door shook hands warmly with me. Then he enquired where I lived and what I was doing. I hardly knew how to answer him, for to confess Jesus I knew would offend him, while to deny Christ I dare not. Then those words of his came to my mind, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and of My words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he shall come in his glory," Luke ix. 26.

"What do you think of the Messiah?" I enquired of him.

"Do you believe in the impostor?" he cried.

"Whom do you call an impostor?" said I.

"Why, Jesus Christ."

"My friend, you may call him so, but he is my own blessed Savior and Redeemer," I said, and I sought to show him the truth.

My friend then spat in my face, and commanded me to leave his house, slamming the door upon me. This was a great discouragement, but I prayed for grace and courage.

A few days later I met a young Russian acquaintance. He was so delighted to see me that he fell upon my neck, in the middle of the London street, and kissed me. After a little conversation, he found I believed in Jesus, and in a moment his whole manner towards me changed. "Away, you dog! Away, you wretch!" he cried, and spitting in my face, he turned away.

No one has a just idea what trials a Jew, who really becomes a Christian, has to pass through. I received several threatening letters, warning me of death unless I gave up my Christianity. The following instance will show the intense hatred the Jews have against any one of their number who becomes a Christian. I called upon a family of pious Jews, after I had become a Christian, and introduced the subject of the Messiah to them. They did not speak ill of his name like others, and were apparently kind towards me, asking me to visit them again and again, which I did with pleasure. But I began to suspect something was wrong, and felt I must be on my guard. One afternoon a young Jew met me, and promised, if I would vow not to declare his name, that he would tell me something of importance. He then said a plot had been made to poison me in the house of this old friend, and that I was to be offered a glass of wine, which would be my death.

God thus intervened and spared my life, and I realized the truth of the words of Jesus' "They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service," John xvi. 2.

But far more bitter than the hatred of the Jews in England, and their attempts on my life, were the letters I received from my home. My beloved father wrote: "Oh, woe is me! woe is me! you have filled us with eternal shame and disgrace. Since we heard that you are a believer in the bastard we have not ceased to weep. Cursed is the hour when I was married! Better far had it been if I had been born a stone and not a man! Woe is me! bitter is me! Will you not have mercy upon us? Oh, do be mindful of us, and repent and turn away from the Christian faith. Think of your father and mother, sisters and brothers, whose days you have darkened.

"Remember, my beloved Isaac, you cannot find a father or mother in the world. I cannot rest because of my sorrow. Oh, Isaac! Isaac! Isaac! through you I shall never be able to enjoy it even. What is my life? better he I never been born. Your brothers and sisters, oh! would it not be better for God to take their lives away than to leave us to go in old age in shame to the grave? My prayer is that God may cut off our whole family rather than we should live in the misery you have brought upon us, or else I pray God to cut you off.

"What is the hope of a Jew but to have his good sons in remembrance in after generations? But woe is me! for the remembrance that I brought you up will be shame and eternal disgrace.

"Your brother Hessel is most prosperous in the province of Grodno and Kovno, but when I think of you I wonder why the Lord God has cursed me with such a curse.

"....It was on the feast of Purim that we received the bad news. Imagine how we received it! Your mother became sick and sightless; I fell fainting to the ground; all our children stood about weeping and lamenting. Then many people gathered around us; they lifted me up from the ground and called me to life, asking me what had happened. What answer could I give?

"Your mother prays each day to God to end her life, and wishes every minute she were dead, for her son is meshumad.

"....You have time yet to repent, and, then, at least, you will be saved in the world to come. Return home and become a pious Jew.

"But if you will not do this—if you will not repent—then we will not have anything more to do with you. We want neither your money nor your photograph; nay, we will not count him to be our son who has become a meshomad.

"If you do as I write you, may great happiness be yours, and may God bless you, but if you do not, then farewell! farewell! farewell! I am not your father, your mother is no longer yours, your sisters and brothers are no longer your relatives, and you can no longer claim the name of a Jew."

My sister wrote in the same pitiful strain: "Dear, tender and loving brother, have compassion on us and let us not be covered with everlasting shame and disgrace. Remember, we are only children; destroy not our world. Oh! pour not out our blood in shame, for we are your little sisters, and your brothers are young children."

I wrote some twenty-five letters to my father after receiving this last one from him, but he never answered them, and the last he would not even receive, and it was returned to me.

How can my anguish be described upon receiving this last letter from my father, for my parents were dearer to me than my life. Yet it was so—my parents, for whom I could shed the last drop of blood, had cut me off. But it was necessary. I had to take up my cross and follow Christ my Lord. Oh! how I have wept when at my work as I considered the state of my beloved parents.

My brother wrote to me in the same strain, concluding his letter thus: "Once more. Do turn! do repent! but if you do not, then good-bye, good-bye for ever. Never shall we know, never shall we wish to know, anything about you, either in this world or that which is to come.

"Unless you repent and become a Jew, I ask you not to write to me, for I count you to be dead, and would to God that it were so. I must tell you that our darling brother Josiah Abel is dead, and that we are all convinced that had you not sinned against the great God, by turning away from him, our house would not have been visited by the angel of death. Remember that our beloved Josiah Abel has died because of your sins. Oh! bitter, bitter is our life! One has become a meshumad, the other is dead. Would to God we all had died, or else that you might be cut off by death."

But most affecting to me of all was the letter of my mother.

"....I ask you, darling Isaac, to consider the step you have taken, for remember your soul will be damned forever. Oh! how grievous to me to think of my child, my own flesh and blood, for whose happiness I would sacrifice all that I could, damned—eternally damned! Better, it were better, if the Almighty had dealt with me as with Lot's wife; better if I had never been born than to live to old age to see my most beloved son fall into the hands of the devil and be forever lost.

"Isaac, through your perversion, I fear that our family will also be condemned, for there will always be a curtain between the throne of God and our family. Think of your loving and tender mother, and your devoted father, through you cursed by God! Think of your two little sisters clothed with everlasting shame and disgrace. They are even now ashamed to go out in the open street, for the children of the neighbors cry after them, 'Sisters of Isaac, the meshamad.'

"If you refuse my advice, and do not turn, I am no longer your mother. Do not write again to me unless you repent, and if you do not, I shall not want to think of you, but my prayer is, may you repent, or may God take your life and ours."

The most delightful magazine for the little folks, Our Little Men and Women for September, has reached our table. A brief glance shows us twenty-four large pages filled with pictures and stories. The children from five to nine have every reason to thank D. Lothrop Company, Boston, for such an addition to their pleasures. We suggest to every parent that a sample copy be sent for before the matter is forgotten. A sample costs but five cents.

The services of the "Church of the Second Advent," Montgomery Ave., west of Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., are held each Sunday morning by the Pastor, Elder C. G. Ramsey, who also leads the services at the "Blessed Hope Mission," at Twelfth and Dickenson Streets, each Sunday evening, the morning service being led by Elder Wm. H. Steel.

The baby is ruler of the household, and as is befitting, "Babyland" is the official organ of the baby's kingdom. It is a charming little monthly of eight pages filled with pictures to please baby's eye, and little jingles and stories to please his ear. It is a marvel of enjoyment for fifty cents a year. D. Lothrop Company, Boston, will send a sample for five cents.

Communion, or, "A Little Talk with Jesus."

A little talk with Jesus—
How it smoothes the rugged road!
How it seems to help me onward,
When I faint beneath my load!
When my heart is crushed with sorrow,
And mine eyes with tears are dim,
There's naught can yield me comfort
Like a little talk with Him.

I tell Him I am weary,
And I fain would be at rest,
That I'm daily, hourly, longing
For a home upon His breast:
And He answers me so sweetly,
In tones of fondest love,—
"I am coming soon to take thee
To My happy home above."

Ah, this is what I'm wanting—
His lovely face to see,
And, I'm not afraid to say it,
I know He's wanting me!
He gave His life a ransom
To make me all His own,
And He can't forget His promise
To me, His purchased one.

I know the way is dreary
To yonder far-off clime,
But a little talk with Jesus
Will while away the time;
And yet the more I know Him,
And all His grace explore,
It only sets me longing
To know Him more and more.

I cannot live without him,
Nor would I if I could:
He is my daily portion,
My medicine and my food.
He's altogether lovely,
None can with him compare—
The chief among ten thousand,
The fairest of the fair.

I often feel impatient,
And mourn his long delay—
I never can be settled
While he remains away!
But we shall not long be parted,
For I know he'll quickly come,
And we shall dwell together
In that happy, happy home.

So I'll wait a little longer,
Till his appointed time,
And glory in the knowledge
That such a hope is mine.
There in my Father's dwelling,
Where "many mansions" be,
I'll sweetly talk with Jesus,
And he shall talk with me.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Having just returned from a tour in Western Ohio and Eastern Indiana, I desire to give the readers of THE RESTITUTION a brief report of my visit to these places, being the fields of my humble labor in former years. Well do I remember the scenes that were enacted almost twenty years ago, when the truth for the first time began to arouse the people in Miami Co., O. The struggles between tradition and truth were fierce, but truth triumphed and a little band of earnest believers was organized for the Master's work. But alas for human expectations, death and other causes reduced the little band; yet for this we need not grieve, but a state of things prevails that is just cause for grief. The little band had ceased as a living organic body. While the members still live and love the truth, the vitality of the body was gone. O! church of the living God, how can you slumber when the Master is so near the door? God demands a work of you, will you refuse to do it? Remember that from you must sound out the word of life to dying men. Do not forget that you are the pillar and ground of the truth. If you refuse your support who shall sustain it?

Christians are God's light bearers. Hold aloft the torch of truth, let the light fall upon the path of honest seekers after truth, and God will bless you. Notwithstanding this state of coldness and inactivity the little band was strengthened by the addition of four. Now take courage and work for the salvation of others who are almost persuaded.

After holding seven meetings with the brethren in Ohio, with kindly admonitions to duty I left them for my appointment in Blackford Co., Ind. Here a cordial greeting awaited me and five discourses were delivered and good interest shown; may God bless the humble effort. During this trip and the meeting at Claysville the ties of Christian love and friendship have been greatly strengthened; I am stronger through mutual sympathy, feeling that my labor however humble and imperfect is warmly appreciated. The meeting at Claysville caused reflections that I cannot forbear expressing. Why is it that when appeals so powerful are made that they seem to fall powerless upon such an audience. Similar appeals once brought thousands to their feet with the agonizing cry, "What must we do?" Now they fall as unheeded as the flake of snow. Where is the fault if fault it is? Is it the lukewarm of heart in the people? If so, we are not to blame. Or is the number that constitutes the ruling element for the kingdom just completed? If so let us rejoice for our redemption then is near. But O, it is some fault on our part? Is there some accursed thing in the camp? Do we fail to do our whole duty? Is our preaching of that character and is that spirit that will stir the depths of the human heart, or is it too cold and speculative? These are questions, dear brethren, that are knocking at the doors of at least some hearts for an answer. Let us each have a self investigation, and humbly ask, 'Lord is it I?' With a heart full of love for all the dear ones I ask an interest in your prayers.

"CONSOLATION IN CHRIST."

"If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfil my joy, that ye be likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind; let nothing be done through strife or vain glory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than themselves." Phil. ii. 1-3. This, to my mind, is good advice. We should never do anything in the Christian life through strife or vain glory, but all to the glory of God. If there be any consolation in Christ. Dear brother, sister, did you ever see and feel the full force of Paul's words, consolation in Christ? Dear ones, all of our consolation is in Christ. Paul says, There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus; in Christ Jesus, is every one in Christ Jesus? Let us see Paul in Gal. iii. 26-29, for ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus; for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. And if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's children, and heirs according to the promise.

Now dear friendly sectarian, are you in Christ? You say, I have been baptized, therefore I am in Christ. Stop a moment and examine the record. Did you believe the gospel when you were immersed? See Acts viii. 12: And when they (the Samaritans) believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women. Then when we are in Christ, according to the Scriptures, then we have consolation, and not till then. Paul says if any man be in Christ Jesus he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold all things are made new. We are now men and women in Christ, our resurrection is in Christ, our hope is in Christ, our life is hid in Christ, our victory is through our Lord Jesus Christ, our anchor is in Christ, our immortality is in Christ, our eternal inheritance is in Christ, our reward is from Christ, our house that is in heaven will come with Christ, our crown will come with Christ, our inheritance that is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fades not away is reserved in heaven with Christ, and when the Chief Shepherd shall appear then shall we appear with him in glory. Therefore, says Peter, gird up your loins, and be sober and hope unto the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Now dear soldiers of Christ, is there not consolation in Christ? Is there, dear ones, any true consolation out of Christ? Paul in Eph. ii. 12, says to his brethren in Christ after they had been connected to Christ, tells them when they were Gentiles in the flesh, at that time ye were without Christ, having no hope, and without God in the world. Dear sinner, think of dying out of Christ. No God, no Christ, no hope. But Jesus says, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. Daniel says, precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. And again, the Lord knoweth them that are his. Again Paul says, I am persuaded that nothing is able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, either height or depth, nor things present, nor things to come, nor angels, nor even death itself can separate us from the love of God. While the saints sleeps in Jesus, God's love still extends towards him and will raise him up again at the last day.

Now dear toiling saint of God, is there not great consolation in the dear Lord Jesus Christ? Dear ones take away the coming of Christ and the resurrection, then my consolation is gone. But that blessed hope of the appearing of the glory of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ, then my hope is full of life. Again Paul in Phil. iii. 20, 21: For our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body.

O, is there consolation in Christ Jesus? I for one can say, yes. I find strong consolation in Christ amid the sorrows and trials of this life. I can look beyond these trials and disappointments to the new world that we will enter by a resurrection from the dead, or a change at the coming of Christ. Where is the consolation of the one that says there is no God; nothing but the dark night of eternal oblivion can settle down on that man's mind, and his last words will probably be like others, I am about to take a leap into the dark. But the dear saint of God, though poor in this world's goods, is rich in faith, and can say like Job, I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter days on the earth, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God. Job xix. Or like David, As for me I shall behold thy face in peace, I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness. Take courage, dear ones, for in due time we shall reap if we faint not.

An August Morning Talk.

I must admit that I am an invalid, but then I am convalescent. What a blessing to feel that every day brings a little additional good in the way of gain towards health and strength! We have been out among the hills—and breathed air as pure as the world contains I suppose. It was a relief to get away from the sound of carpenters' hammers, and the crying of children. (There are ten in the two houses nearest on the west). Sick people do need and love quiet. And then the screeching and booming of the whip-factory and iron foundry whistles, is no special entertainment. Three or four times a day the discordant storm greets the ears of weak and strong, sick and well alike. There is something wrong in this liberty allowed the manufacturers. The public,—the people, are compelled to suffer—when if the piping and shrieking and bellowing were mellowed and subdued to a much milder cadence, every necessary purpose would be sufficiently served, and a grand relief gained. But let this pass.

Yes, we went to the hills. A kind hearted friend gave us a grand entertainment. What a bountiful table she spread, and how nicely and relishingly and wholesomely everything was cooked! Things clean, and palatable, are as welcome to invalids, as to the stout and able-bodied. Neatness is an almost priceless virtue, and good cookery is convenient and beneficent and remunerative. Who can deny that? What chapters could be written—chapters of dire and dreadful experience in the horrors of bad cookery! In these depths of gloom, lurk dyspepsia, headaches, melancholy and a host of evils. I have seen things put on a table that were not an atom too good for swine to eat—things that my soul loathed for they were utterly unhealthy and even detestable. And the people were kind-hearted and hospitable too. Such matters imperatively need correcting. It is a sin and a shame for civilized human beings to so ignore the necessities of our being, and violate the conditions of health.

I said we had lovely air—and we had clean beds, and rooms well ventilated. What a blessing this of cleanliness, of purity! What a comfort and satisfaction to draw air uncontaminated into the lungs, air that can aerate the blood, and vitalize it! But I must picture a contrast to this. It is painful but necessary. Many people are shockingly ignorant, or culpably negligent upon the most important matters. Some will say—"O, this is only a mere temporal matter; we seek higher good." But what is said about being faithful in little things. And really, is health a little thing? If any one thinks so let him try a few months of poor, low, weak invalid life, and see how he likes it. Now I will show you where and how to find ill health. I will give you counsel and instruction in that direction. One of the many ways is to harbor impurities in the house. For example I will take you to a room with quite an external aspect of comfort. But it is all full of the secret mystery and mischief of disease—or if you like the word better—say, unwholesomeness. The room may be a hundred years old for aught I know—but there is no necessary wrong or harm about that. The windows are open for ventilation—but this can not cure the difficulty. There is here, deeply fixed in every thing the odor of a pernicious oldness. Here is the residuum of long years, of human being and breathing, never thoroughly cleansed away. It is in the ceiling, in the wall paper, in the floor, in the carpet, in the books, in all the furniture, and in all the articles of apparel improperly hung up here, when they should, after thorough cleaning, be put into closets. I have said what going into such a room, "must I stay here tonight? How can I stand it? Who can sleep peacefully in such an air? Must I breathe this contaminated air eight or ten hours? Well—I will have my head by the open window, at any cost. I can swathe my head with some covering—and I will have the air from God's great laboratory. If I must breathe poison, it shall be diluted as much as possible."

The people are kind-hearted, but very unwise. The debris of millions of respirations—of many thousands nights of exhalations from the lungs and pores of the skin, are accumulated here. If I owned this room, what a revolution I would make! What an instant clearing out I should have! Every solitary thing should go out into the cut door air, instanter. The bed, the pillows, the quilts, that contain a concentrated essence of foulness—should be aired, and aired and aired—and by every suitable means thoroughly cleansed. The poison of oldness in things, of old and deep-seated impurities should be wrought against, and fought against, and discarded. I would white-wash the ceiling, I would thoroughly renovate the walls. I would paint the woodwork. I would put the old moist, sticky and unwholesome carpet through a course of disciplne. I would cleanse and if need be, paint the floor. I would take every old, musty book out of the room, and keep it out, for books are often most unwholesome. If you doubt it put them to the test of a thorough investigation. (I would even sponge the covers and edges, if they were worth preserving). I would take out every garment unwisely hung up, to become both the recipient and distributor of impurity. In short, I would wage war to the death on the hands of bacteria, bacilli, micrococci, and every other secret, invisible enemy to health. I would show no mercy or quarter to antiquities of whatever kind that were the storehouses of poison. I would welcome air and water and friction and art and good sense to drive out and keep out all the miserable foes to life and health and efficiency, for life is too short to be needlessly and foolishly imperilled. The air that floats around the human face, nostrils, mouth, ears, and all the avenues of life, should be pure. Disease may come in at any door. If any one should say this is not a topic for a religious paper, I beg emphatically to say—I say sure it is. Many things are most unfortunately overlooked, by even good people. The laws of health will certainly have attention in any epoch deserving the title of millenntium. And there is abundant room and need for reform now. Air and water are pure and free and abundant. And why should there be so much neuralgia, and consumption and maladies whose name is legion? People are sick or ailing, often, simply because they constantly violate the laws of their being. Terrible head-aches, and awful melancholies are due to indigestion—and who can digest some of the things—erroneously call food—or at least not properly worthy of the designation? Some sicknesses are unavoidable, but preventable illness ought to be prevented, and there is such a thing as correction and instruction in righteousness in things involving health and life and peace and usefulness.

Conference Report.

The Church of God in Indiana met at Claysville (Bracken P. O.), Ind., Aug. 31, and continued over Sunday following. At the business meeting on Saturday, on call of churches it was found that delegates were present from Plymouth, Antioch, Argos, Mary, Pierceton, Claysville and Ronesselaer. Officers were elected for the next year as follows: R. S. Duiggins, President; J. L. Winse and L. E. Connor, Vice Presidents; A. R. Underwood, Secretary; E. K. Barnhill, Treasurer.

The treasurer's quarterly report showed $11.05 in his hands, no money having been paid out during the quarter. The Evangelist made a verbal report of work done, showing $25 due him, which sum was ordered paid. Pledges from the different churches insures a good working fund for the next quarter.

The Committee on Bible Lessons was complimented for good work done. The new committee for next year is Mrs. S. Roxana Winse, Mrs. Ettie Fry, Mrs. Nancy Roberts, S. A. Chapelle, Robert Hallabaek and Josiah Hoffman.

The question of a national Conference as suggested by Brother Geo. F. Work, was taken up and discussed at length, the result being the following:

Resolved, That we favor the holding of a National Conference, as suggested by the Church at Philadelphia, and that we favor the holding of such Conference in the city of Philadelphia, Pa.

We therefore recommend that each church in the State take immediate action with reference to the matter, and report such action to THE RESTITUTION Office.

It being suggested that this Conference send a State Delegate to the National Conference, Brother R. S Duiggins was selected to act as Delegate at Large for this State.

No definite time was named for holding this meeting, but the middle of October was mentioned as the best time; as that will bring it right at the heat of the political campaign, it may not be best to hold it at that time. We would like a suggestion from the Philadelphia church as to time. The object of this General Conference will be the uniting of the "littles" for more vigorous and earnest effort in promoting the cause of our blessed Master; and as every lover of our Lord will favor every move in this direction, there can be no reasonable objection to the holding of a National Conference. Let each church then, act on the matter now, for the time to work is short, and what is done must be done immediately.

The preaching brethren present were R. W. Woodward, of Michigan, L. E. Conner, S. A. Chaplin, J. F. Wagoner, R. S. Duiggins, J. L. Winse and H. R. Carter. The audiences were large at all the meetings, and excellent order was maintained throughout.

A resolution was passed thanking the owners of the church building for their kindness in opening their house for us. Our next meeting will be held at Plymouth, in November.

To the Churches of God in the United States and Canada, and Sister Churches Affiliating with them, by Whatsoever Name they may be Called.—Greeting.

"The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of Light."

An anxious retrospect by many thoughtful members of the Church reveals the fact that during the last twenty years, Churches, some large, some small, have been formed, existed for a brief period and then gone out of existence; that in other cases Churches would have been formed, but for the fact that the evangelist has been driven away from the field with his work half completed, because there was no aid rendered him, and his family necessities required him to abandon it and return to his daily labor.

In many cases Churches, built up on the doctrines first taught them, have had fatal discords introduced among them by later and unauthorized preachers, teaching contrary doctrines. To correct these and other errors of the past, and to increase ten-fold the good now being accomplished, it is the belief of many that the time is full ripe for an organized Union of the Church in all places, and for concentrated, persistent effort in proclaiming the Gospel to the many who have never had it properly presented to them. To bring about a union of all the Churches into "one body," it has been proposed to have a general conference of the Church, to be held this year, each Church in the country to be represented by a delegate under about the following conditions.

Let each Church of twenty or more members (or a group of smaller Churches to the number of twenty or more members) meet, vote upon, and send to the Editor of THE RESTITUTION before October first, 1888, the result of the vote, as to when and where this general conference shall be held; and also the name and address of a delegate of sound judgment and discretion, (not necessarily a preacher, unless the Church so prefers it), who shall represent, and cast the vote of that Church on the business matters brought before the conference.

Each delegate to take with him to the conference a written certificate from the clerk or presiding officer of the Church, stating that he is the accredited delegate representing, and entitled to vote for the Church, in the General Conference of the Church of God and Sister Churches wherever it may be held.

This meeting, when held, should extend for ten days, over two Sundays, say from Friday evening to the second Monday morning, and the time and place for holding it will be announced by the Editor of THE RESTITUTION as he shall find best represents the choice of a majority of the Churches writing to him before October 1st. The questions each delegate will have power to vote upon will be:

a. A Covenant, the same in all Churches, short and scriptural, which shall be subscribed to by all members as they are received into the Church.

b. The arrangement of the best and most permanent form of collecting the income needed for the support of each individual Church; of State and other Association of Churches; and of providing a fund for general evangelistic work; and who shall administer to that fund.

c. How weak and needy Churches can best be fostered and cared for.

d. How, and under what authority shall general or special evangelists represent the Church.

e. The power to make rules for the government of this and future yearly general conferences, and to decide when and where the next general conference shall meet and how delegates shall be appointed.

f. If any other propositions are presented at this general conference, they may be voted upon by the delegate subject to subsequent ratification by his Church.

That lack of means may not prevent any Delegate from attending this important conference, the Church at Philadelphia agrees that, where a Church is not able to bear the entire expense of sending its delegate, each of such delegates shall receive from this Church a contribution of $10.00 to varda his expenses, wherever it exceeds that sum if the general conference is held west of Harrisburg, Pa., or of $20.00 each, if it is held east of Harrisburg, and such expenses account to $20.00. The Phila. Church also offers, if the conference is held in Phila. that each delegate shall be provided for without cost, during the time the conference is held in Phila. Doubtless other cities would do as well. This call meets the approval of Elder C. C. Ramsay, our Pastor in Phila., of Elder Geo. R Kramer, Pastor of the Church of the Blessed Hope in Brooklyn, and doubtless of many others in the Churches of God at Brooklyn, Baltimore, Winchester and other places. The eastern Churches do not insist on this conference being held in the East, if in the judgment of the Church, it is best to hold it anywhere in the West. For the Church at Philadelphia,

GEO. F. WORK.

Announcements.

The third annual conference of the Church of God for southwestern Nebraska will convene (D. V.) Thursday, Sept. 20, 1888, in Brother D. N. Prime's grove, five miles southeast of Arapahoe and two miles southwest of Ellison. Now dear brothers and sisters we expect this to be, with the Lord's help, one of the most successful meetings ever held in the State and we want you all present. Let us remember that excuses will never prepare us for that glorious kingdom which we are striving for. We earnestly request every member in the State to be present at this meeting. Don't let any trivial circumstance hinder you—come again. We say come, and come praying. Those coming by rail should notify the Pres. or Sec. at Arapahoe what day they will arrive, and they will be met and conveyed to the place of meeting. The place of meeting is situated on the banks of the Republican River, in a beautiful natural grove. The brethren expect to take advantage of the excellent opportunities for camping and make it their home during the meeting. All who can should bring tents; those coming with teams should cover their wagons; but if you cannot do either do not stay away. You are welcome and will be taken care of as one of God's dear children. Remember we are all one common household. There will be hay on the ground free of charge for teams and bedding purposes. Brother A. J. Eychaner will be present to preach the word. ADDIE ADAMS, Pres.

GILBERT MISNER, Sec.

P. S. To the brother in Kansas that spoke in THE RESTITUTION some time ago of uniting with this conference, we will say, be present at the meeting, and we will try and complete such arrangements. If any information is wanted write to me and I will reply at once. A. A.

The Churches of God in Iowa will meet in Conference and for exhortation, preaching and general business, at Masathon, Buena Vista Co., Iowa, on Thursday evening, Sept. 13, 1888, and continue over the following Sunday, as Brother Carton and Scott may arrange. We hope to have a good meeting. Let all the brethren come.

R. J. HILL.
T. J. WHITESITT.
A. J. EYCHANER.

The annual conference of the Church of God, for the Northwest, will meet at Sebell's Ferry, Oregon, commencing Friday evening, October 19, 1888, and holding over the following Sunday.

This being during the time for the "Mechanic's Fair" at Portland, those attending conference can take advantage of the reduced railroad fare at that time.

Teams will be at Portland to meet those from a distance. Please notify us if you wish to be met.

We hope to see all who attended last year and many more besides.

If we are among those whom the Lord, when he comes, shall find doing his will, happy shall we be. If meeting in conference and building each other up, and planning for the spread of the Gospel, is his will, happy indeed will we be in that day if we have done what we could in that direction. By order of Executive Committee.

W. W. JAQUITH, Sec.

Members and friends of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, are earnestly requested to attend the Fifth Annual Meeting which is to be convened in the "Church of the Second Advent," 12th and Dickenson Sts. Philadelphia, Pa., beginning Friday eve, Sept. 28, and closing Sunday eve, Sept. 30th. We expect to have a feast of good things. Good speakers will address the meetings. Those who intend to be present will please notify the Pastor of the Church, Elder C. C. Ramsay, 1009 South 11th St. Philadelphia, Pa., so that proper arrangements can be made for the accomodation of all visitors.

INDIANA'S GREAT EXHIBIT.

There is no event that so forcibly reminds us of the "whirligig of time," as the near approach of the State Fair, to open up September 17th.

Visitors will be astonished at the sight of the grand stand, 400 feet long, 80 feet wide and two stories in height, on the new addition.

Fifteen wells are provided on the fair grounds for drinking water, besides the City Water Works, which supplies the Exposition Hall, machinery and fountains.

More stabling, stock pens, and room for machinery are provided to meet the demand.

Fifteen acres of machinery will be on exhibition.

The improvement in the breeds of horses as demonstrated at the State Fair, is amazing.

Every breed of imported cattle in the United States will be represented.

The head center for the swine breeders of the nation is at the Indiana State Fair.

The Woman's Department of the Fair has acquired a national reputation for extent and superiority.

The florists of the State have organized and something extra in that line may be expected at the Fair.

The natural gas mains that supply the city are laid alongside of the State Fair grounds. Display of the gas light will be made and the gas utilized in many ways at the Fair.

Evening entertainments are provided for in the Exposition Building. Concerts by Baldwin & Co's Music House, Wednesday evening, and by the Model Clothing Store on Thursday evening.

The September Wide Awake opens with a story of the Harrison campaign of 1840; by Mrs. F. A. Humphrey, entitled "Two Conspirators," and illustrated by Smedley. Another seasonable story, and very amusing, is "Ned's Base-Ball Club" by Mary C. Crowley. Still another, delicious in its fun, is "Jormicky's Sacrifice," by Mrs. Katharine B. Foot. "A Little Lombard Hero" is a touching Italian story by Edmond de Amicis. There is a brace of suggestive stories by Mrs. Margaret Storer Warner, entitled "Two Opportunities." Miss Risley Seward has an entertaining paper, "An Abyssinian Monkey." Edward Everett Hale writes of some of the great visitors who have "received" on Boston Common. There is a fine article by Rev. H. O. Ladd, the president of the University of New Mexico, describing the Ramona Industrial School for Indian Girls. There is a beautiful art-article for young painters entitled "Summer Lines;" it is by Miss Mabel Robinson. The serials are very interesting; in Mrs. Crowninshield's training-ship story, "Pinky" and "Pandy" have a rather damp experience with the life-buoy; and in Mrs. Sherwood's "Double Roses" both Phyllis and Wilhelmina show the best qualities in their natures. There is an excellent article on Daniel Defoe by Oscar Fay Adams, and another on the odd people of Corea by Mrs. Isaacowens. The poems of the number are by Edith Thomas, Mary N. Bradford, Mrs. Butts, and Herbert Wild Bradley. Wide Awake is $2.40 a year. D. Lothrop Company, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

The Model Prayer Meeting.

It was a cheerful chapel, above ground, filled with settees, wide enough apart to kneel down between them if one wanted to do so, well warmed, and well ventilated.

At the time fixed for the meeting, first of all comes Brother Punctuality. His watch and actions are always regulated to the minute by the town clock. Sometimes the minister comes with him, and that is well. Once they came together thus, waited one minute for others, who came not, and then each prayed, talked and sang. They spent fifteen minutes thus and then left. On their way home they met the rest coming, who said, "Why, are we not to have a meeting?" "Oh, we have had one," was the reply. That cured all, except the most incorrigible, of their delay. Some people are chronically tardy. You can never change them; they are always too late for work, too late for dinner, too late for church, and they may be too late for heaven. They disturb the devotions of others. Not so Brother Punctuality; only he has one troublesome fault. When the hour is done he opens that inevitable hunting watch of his and snaps it to with such a nervous jerk that it says very plainly to all, "Now shut up and go home." This is well enough in ordinary, and especially dull, times. But when hearts are warm, and prayers are strong, and the current of love flows fully, let there be a little more latitude.

Congenial with this brother is Brother Promptitude. When the leader opens the meeting he is always ready to rise. He shudders at these awful pauses. They are ice-cakes clogging the current of love, hindering the wheels of power. Yet he would not rush things. I have known him to count seven, the mystic number of the Scripture, and then if no one rose to speak or pray, he always did. He is thus a minute man, ready for action in a minute, and hating to lose the minutes. Slower natures than his are prompted and impelled by him, though they complain he does not give them time to think before his song or prayer breaks in. No matter, they will learn at last from him to be spry.

In the other seat sits Brother Brevity. He has something to say, and having said it he sits down. When some over-stocked divine, or some thin laid layman drags wearily along with a chain of dull platitudes, he is very twitchy, wondering why people will waste so much good breath and use so many poor words in saying nothing. Brother Pointedness sympathizes deeply with him. He wants to see people take good aim at the mark, and hit it—not try to see how near they can come and not do it. Brother Round-the-Circle greatly distresses him, who, if he have a fact, an incident, or an illustration, has so many minor details to dwell upon that he smothers the infant-truth under its mass of old clothes.

Unlike him, but welcome to Brother Pointedness, is Brother Spirituality. He has the life and power of the Truth, and his words are as canisters full of solid strength. Watery goodishness are not his. He does not say, "I feel to say that I feel a desire to have you feel," but his feeling itself tells in his tearful voice, his glowing features, and his burning truth. Let him but join his hands with Brother Liberty and he is sure of triumph. He is the brother whom he most loves, because the Spirit of God dwells with him. Stiffness, formality, iron rules, and wiry systems are his abhorrence. But equally he abhors hobbies and eccentricities, and offences against taste and courtesy which some indulge, calling that freedom. Heartless license is not healthful liberty. That tramples iron-hoofed on others. This breaks their chains and says be natural, be true to yourself, do rightly, speak boldly, sing joyfully, but forget not that others claim the same, and so give room and time for them. You are not surprised with these brethren present, that the meeting was a good one. It is always so.

Bring these, punctuality, promptitude, brevity, pointedness, spirituality, and liberty, to the place of prayer, and you are certain to find a model prayer-meeting.—C. F. Penney, D. D.

The Inquisition in Boston.

It seems almost impossible that such a state of affairs as that revealed in the following extract from the Boston Transcript, could exist in an American city, and least of all in a city that has been regarded in the past as representative of what is highest and best in our American life. If any one has doubted the wisdom of those citizens of Boston who recently declared so vehemently against further interference by the Romanists in the common schools, how they can doubt it now after reading the following shameful recital:

"For some years now the text-books which are used in our schools have been submitted to the examination of Catholic priests here, and until they are mutilated and modified to suit them gentlemen they cannot be used. The only history of England permitted in our grammar-schools is Stone's, a very dry, tedious little book—hardly more than a chronology—written many years ago, a book which would be superseded were there freedom of choice. A few years ago the school committee authorized supplemental use in the schools of Dickens's Child's History of England, and this entertaining and harmless little book, a great improvement on the other, was used for a time, but the priestly expurgators found something in it—we know not what—distasteful to them, and at their dictation its use has been abandoned. There is another book, Miss Thompson's 'History of England,' one of several volumes known as 'Freeman's Historical Series,' which was introduced into the schools some years ago as a most valuable aid to pupils in English History; but the inquisitors objected to this also, and it has for that reason been withdrawn. Not long ago a school history of England was prepared by a master in our public schools, and efforts were made by his publishers to introduce it into the Boston schools. It was, as usual, handed over to the Boston Inquisition for their opinion. It came back from them with twenty or thirty alterations. The publishers were, of course, anxious to have the work adopted, and applied to the author to accede to the expurgatorial demands. This he did, and the book, as altered, was again submitted to the priests, who again returned it with a demand for further alterations, which would have made such contortions of history that no self-respecting writer could submit to them; and as this writer refused to do so, his book was kept out of our schools. Well known standard histories, books which are accepted as ornaments to literature and as authorities, are not permitted to be used in the schools of this birthplace of freedom, and the histories of Macaulay, of Green, and of Knight, are as absolutely tabooed as if they were as ribald as Rabelais, or as libellous as Burton's 'Arabian Nights.' Swinton's 'Outlines of History' we have seen excluded, because it contained some trite but unpalpable facts. Even lectures in the schools are inquisitorially watched by the priests, who look over the notes which the pupils are required to take, and write such comments on the historical facts stated there, as 'This is false,' and sometimes prepare answers for the pupils to make at examinations."

The Italians at Massowa.

An entirely new speck of war has arisen on the Southern European horizon, one with which Bulgaria has nothing to do, nor Russia nor Germany. And yet the relations between the great continental powers are so close, and the treaty compacts so extensive, that a general war might about as well arise out of one thing as another; as well from a little quarrel over the little island of Massowa as from the pretensions of Prince Ferdinand at Sofia.

Africa is the great, barbarous, undivided continent. England possesses South Africa, and hopes to secure the remainder of the northern coast. The rest of the territory, inland and seacoast, is in the scramble between Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal and Belgium. Of all the dwellers on the coast the Italians are the most ubiquitous, but only lately have they begun to feel themselves a great maritime power, which can have colonial aspirations. Every year one or two hundred thousand Italian emigrants sail for the United States and the Argentine Republic. They are all lost to Italy. If, now, they could be diverted to their natural destination, on the fertile and neighboring shores of Africa, they might build up colonies which would be a strength to the mother country. It is, then, the part of great political statesmen, which is played by King Victor and Signor Crispi, in securing control of a strip of coast near Massowa, in the neighborhood of the Abyssinian kingdom, and founding an African state. This Italy can now safely do, for Germany and Austria are in the closest treaty with her, and she has only France to fear.

But here France is the jealous power. France has shadowy claims in the neighborhood, and is by no means ready to allow Italy, her Mediterranean rival, to do on the Red Sea coast what she did on the Barbary coast. For some years a jealousy, not to say hostility, has arisen between the two powers. The Italians in Marseilles have suffered from the attacks of mobs, and the French would be glad to drive out the Italian colony bodily. Minor diplomatic disputes have been constantly arising, and the blood is hot. But Italy has now much the better case. She can afford, with Germany and Austria at her back willing to see her increase her strength, snap her finger at France. She is united and strong, with a popular government, and an enthusiastic people, on the threshold of a career which the consolidation of the peninsula has made possible: and we may expect a rapid progress in colonial as well as in home development. Italy is naturally a colonizing nation. It was so in the days of old Rome; it is so now. France colonizes only with difficulty, and against her nature. It will be to the benefit of Africa to have the Italians colony on the Abyssinian coast It does so much to give peace to the interior from slave catchers.—The Independent.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weather.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. Interests with consummate ability a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and keenness with employed to counteract every project, the marvels of modern invention, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, in which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar issues, point strikingly to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Ages the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, is one of careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations and presents instructive views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of futurity in prophecy, and shows that the end is near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age in shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that its supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, politics, piety. All are shown to be used by the great Overruling Hand to work out the stupendous plans of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Wherever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the supreme Majesty and the resistless power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, handsomely bound in cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this book.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or abolished the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, every body interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth 16mo, 198 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

REMARKS ON CHRISTIANITY AND SCEPTICISM. No. 1.

Many religions have appeared and invited the acceptance of mankind, but none has spread itself so widely over the world, among different peoples, as the religion of Jesus. Several other religions have had a large following, as Buddhism, and Mohammedanism, but they have been confined almost exclusively to the several countries where they originated and where they were first taught and spread. They are not suited to other nations, and it is not anticipated that other nations will ever receive them. In an important sense, they are not suited to any nation, as they are unable to meet the real necessities of man's spiritual nature. But Christianity is adapted to all nations. It can meet the needs and satisfy the desires of all.

Though Christianity, in respect to the number of its adherents, is numerically smaller than Buddhism and Mohammedism, yet it is vastly more powerful for good,—for promoting civilization, progress, virtue, goodness, benevolence, and happiness,—than these systems. And Buddhism and Mohammedanism are destined to go down; and Christianity,—specially as a divine life and a divine principle of love,—is destined to go up. For when the Savior comes again, he will have no nobler principles to enforce than those which he taught at his first coming. Though the theocratic rule will then be established, and the laws of the government of the world will be vastly different from what they are in this gospel age, yet there will then be nothing higher than supreme love to God, and pure and fervent love one to another. But this love will then be unceasing and unfailing.

Christianity, when it began to spread, soon made an attack on barbarism; it raised the fallen and degraded; it introduced a higher type of civilization; it raised the standard of morals; it introduced new principles of virtue and excellence. Love was to take the place of hatred, and acts of kindness were to be shown by him who had received bad treatment from his brother. It taught that evil was to be overcome by good. This was one great secret of its power, one cause of its marvellous success. Of what use would have been the first disciples had they gone to spread the new religion among the Jews and the Greeks and the Romans with carnal weapons, with swords and spears and arrows? To conquer enemies by love was a new idea, and it found its way to men's hearts. Many yielded to the power of love who would have resisted the sword with the sword.

The early disciples multiplied at a rate truly astonishing after the endowment of power received at the Pentecost. This was the secret of their numerous spiritual victories. They spoke, and divine power made their words quickening words. Men of worldly wealth felt themselves poor in the presence of heavenly riches; men of worldly wisdom felt themselves ignorant in the presence of the wisdom from above. There was an unseen energy, there was an overwhelming influence, there was an enchantment, there was a sweetness—the sweetness of love—in their preaching of Jesus, which subdued men, held them as in a chain, and won their hearts. Men found in Christianity what they could not find in any other religion,—bread that satisfied the hunger of the soul, and living water that was in them as a well of water springing up into everlasting life. It has put a new meaning into existence,—into human life, and quickened all its activities. Humanity is seen with a new face put upon it, the end of being is discovered to be worthy of the Creator, and the resurrection from among the dead, and immortality, and how to attain these blessings, are revealed unto us.

Who can imagine what the world would have been today without Christianity, without the New Testament Scriptures, without churches and Sunday schools, without Christian teachers and other Christian laborers, without Christian books, or tracts, or papers? What would have been the condition of our homes, and what the type of family or social life? What would have been the state of the peoples, and the kingdoms, and the governments of the world? Without the teaching and the influence of Christianity, and the perfect example of its Founder, the dark and hopeless state of the world could not be conceived.

But divine and true and lovely and beautiful and benevolent as Christianity is, some men misrepresent it, mar it and disfigure it. Some, in handling it, have taken from it, have explained or frittered away some of its teachings; others, in handling it, have caused accretions to be made to it which have deformed it. Men make a great mistake when they bring their own light to enlighten God's light, when they set themselves up as teachers of the Great Teacher.

In the present day we hear and read a great deal about a "liberal Christianity." The phrase is written and spoken thousands of times by Unitarians, by writers and preachers of what is called the advanced school, and by many who are advocating the "larger hope" and universal salvation. But why add the word, liberal, to Christianity? Does it need that addition to make it acceptable? Is it not good enough and perfect enough without that adjective? Is it not liberal in the truest and best sense of that word? By Christianity we understand the teaching, or doctrine of Christ, the religion of Christ, the truth as he spoke it and lived it. By Christianity we understand the gospel, or glad tidings,—glad tidings concerning redemption for captives, forgiveness for sinners, immortality for the dying,—glad tidings concerning the kingdom, and how to become inheritors of it. But what are we to understand by a liberal Christianity? Well, if we are to interpret the phrase by the liberalism which many of those actually claim who make such constant use of the phrase, it is Christianity without the pre-existence and divinity of Christ, without the miraculous conception, or the Holy Spirit begettal of Jesus, and the incarnation of the divine Son, without the propitiation or expiatory sacrifice for sin. It is Christianity without the miracles of Jesus, Christianity without the resurrection of its Founder, Christianity without a perfect example, Christianity with a fallible, erring author, whose words we ourselves must judge. A liberable Christianity! That is, a Christianity that is liberal enough to attend the opera, and the theatre, and the ball, and any kind of amusement,—a Christianity that is liberal enough to remove the line between the Church and the world,—a Christianity that dwells much on the Fatherhood of God, and overlooks his justice as a moral governor, and on the brotherhood of all the race, and on heaven as the final home and condition of every human being, of every child, however disobedient, of the great infinite Father. However such a liberal Christianity may accord with the perverted judgment and selfish emotions of fallen humanity, give us the Christianity of the four gospels, the Christianity of the Great Teacher, the Christianity of the inspired Apostles as set forth in their Epistles and in the Acts of the Apostles.

Universalism and Unitarianism and scepticism now shake hands with each other; they are on terms of intimate friendship. Indifference to the truths taught in Holy Scripture, judging not only the teachings of ordinary men but even the teachings of Christ and his apostles, and fraternizing with those who have got off the lines of Christian truth;—these things are misnamed Christian liberalism, freedom, charity.

Dr. G. Vance Smith, in a discourse lately published, teaches that the "Bible ideas respecting God have been corrected, enlarged, and purified by the revelations of modern science regarding the working of Divine wisdom and power in outward nature;" and this sentiment is endorsed and commended by the Unitarian Journal. Think of that. Bible ideas of God wrong; and modern science corrects them. Bible ideas of God impure; and modern science purifies them.

Unitarians make a loud boast about standing for a new religious reformation; but the reformation they are standing for is destructive of Scriptural views of the Gospel. Their profession of regard for Christian truth is great, and they affirm that they contend for a pure and simple faith once delivered to the saints, but let them handle that pure and simple faith, and from their handling it will come to you quite another thing. It will bear the marks of unfair criticism; darkness will be put in the place of light; that which is straight will be made crooked; human philosophy will be substituted for that which is divine.

SILAS HENN.

AN AUGUST MORNING TALK.

We visited a brook, full of rocks, huge and little. There I sat and listened to the roar of the water, threading, crowding and brawling its way, and coveted all the power that might be treasured in it, to put a little more strength into my nerves, muscles and bones. I thought of a bridge built across the chasm, strong enough to hold up a kind of summer dwelling, and there an invalid could lie and be forever soothed by the lullaby of the water. But then the monotonous cadence might be wearisome after a while.

Up in Blandford we had a clean, well-aired sleeping room, but in the morning I was reminded that in that room, not many years ago, died a girl of seventeen, in the agony of despair. What? How? Wherefore? Simply this. She had been reared in the teaching of orthodox theology, and so when death came, supposed she was going to hell. Ah, thought I, what may not even New England preaching have to answer for! Let me be the judge of no man who conscientiously tries to do his duty, but I have sometimes in querying as to the meaning of the dragon, here and there in Scripture, thought it might be error in authority. If there is any better definition in a general way, let us say welcome! But there is a dragon of fear and doubt in good people's minds, as to how and what to speak to poor, weak, dying friends, who have no light or hope. O, how sorry I am that I did not know better in other days how to cheer the downcast dying! Why did't I say to them, "Dear soul, God loves you. His mercy endureth forever. Didn't Jesus always say to the troubled, fear not? Didn't he always say to the dejected, be of good cheer? I remember a poor, crippled woman slowly failing. Why didn't I tell her squarely, "Be calm, be quiet, rest in God." The trouble is, that when the devil fear gets into the heart, he is the hardest demon to conquer or cast out, in the universe. Or, if you please, one of the hardest. So the poor girl died, an amiable creature, one of three that died at the same time in the same family, and one of six that were simultaneously sick. O the height and depth, and length and strength of powers and possibilities of hope for those who are ready to die, and who need comfort, if they will lay hold of them. Take the fifth chapter of Romans.

We did not go to Otis. I heard that it was retrograding. That the farms were growing up to bushes, and that the people were not as thrifty as formerly. Then I thought of what I saw in the paper of that versatile, diligent and useful man, H. L. Hastings, who made a plea for some he saw in England, who might find homes in America, and I said in my heart, would to God the honest English farmers were helped and encouraged to come! I would give them a hearty welcome; for one, I would say, let the hard-handed sons of toil come and find homes in these old New England towns, and get and give good, bless and be blessed. What a joy it would be to help them to a better estate, and to give them worthy preference over the poor, vicious creatures that Italy or Bohemia sifts into our midst, the wretches that make us nationally wickeder and weaker by every shipload that is disgorged.

We are reading Gough's books. They have plenty of pathos. Now and then one finds something to laugh at. And a laugh is good for an invalid; and if well people would laugh more, within the limits of reason, there would be fewer sick, and that's a fact. There would be less consumption and liver disease, less constipation and fretfulness and discouragement. But aside from a little humor, Gough's books, I say, have pathos in plenty, and when I try to read a few pages aloud, it takes all my strength and sunniley to read and not have a real break in my voice. The tears come, but if one is going to read aloud he has to fight them back, rather. One keeps saying and thinking of Gough, "What a wonderful, what a masterful man! God made him and God raised him up. It would be as impossible for an ordinary man to say, 'I will be Gough. I will fill the world with my utterances on temperance, and thrill the public heart with my eloquence'—just as impossible to say it and do it, as it would be to go to the moon in a balloon. God raised him up." As for people inferior to Gough and called to fill commoner spheres, we can all say, let us do something, and in what we do, and in all we do, we can recall to mind how blessed it is to forget ourselves, and be filled with the love of the knowledge and glory of God, and be filled with the wish and hope that that shall fill the world, that the grand end may be realized, God all in all.

I have been reading of Blondin, the wonderful rope-walker. I remember distinctly when he walked over the chasm at Niagara with a man on his back. I thought then, and always thought, it was the most wonderful and daring act ever performed publicly by any gymnastic or acrobatic character since the world was made. I didn't see it, or I only saw it mentally. The man who rode was the bravest man I have heard of, for he rode by faith as well as in fact. What a lesson for us, to trust in our Captain of salvation! And this Blondin is alive and well and vigorous today. And what I want to mention now, is this. In a recent conversation he declared emphatically that his steadiness and elasticity and perfect self-command are all due to his perfectly correct habits of life. No intoxicating liquor, I suppose, goes down his throat, not a drop. And I rejoice in the testimony. Would to God that the liquor was all emptied into the Atlantic Ocean, and that a law as imperative and powerful as fate, would forbid the making and selling of the great poison of the world! And if I may be pardoned I would that the utterly reckless and irreclaimable, if they really do exist, were deported to some island in the Pacific Ocean, and obliged to stay there. Of course they would need law and force to govern them. But how much better for the teeming millions of this country, if the bad heaven of a million or two of the irreclaimably vicious were weeded out, and put under discipline by themselves.

And this leads me to speak of another and great subject. Opinions differ. Some say the world is growing worse, and some say, better. And both sides have strong arguments. The wicked do wickedly enough, and that is plain enough. The liquor power is most grievously bold and grievously strong. Profanity rages like a torrent, and rises like a flood. War smooths its wrinkled front only for a moment, and then looks blacker and grimmer than ever. Count the bayonets in Europe. How they bristle like a forest! How they gleam in the sunshine! Look at the cannon gaping open-mouthed and grim, horrid in their very silence, implements of slaughter. Yes, brothers will go out with the most finished and deadly weapons to kill each other. What a calling, and what a career, this of death-dealing! It is a trite saying, the European magazine only awaits the spark to fill the world with the roar and smoke of an explosion, and carry havoc and woe all abroad. There is that new German Emperor with his too speedily or speechful tongue and his high military head. What will it all amount too? Well, we can wait and see.

Still, on the other hand, with all the ill omens of the time, candor constrains to say, the world is in many ways wonderfully improved. Look at the blessings of liberty, the cessation of martyrdoms, the hospitals, asylums, retreats, and all the provisions for the unfortunate, the comforts often, for the wounded in battle, the amazing speed and convenience of travel, the innumerable devices for labor saving, the vastly increased diffusion of intelligence, and things too numerous to mention. A very sad and painful fact it is, though, that while intelligence is increased, an almost infinite amount of pernicious literature is distributed. Still, great is the multiplication of Bibles and missionaries, and if the gospel is imperfectly preached, nevertheless much good is certainly done. Now to what is all this tending. I prophesy not. A crisis is apparently at hand. A terrible struggle impends. I might cite Joseph Cook at Chautauqua and Saratoga, on the coming struggle between the friends of temperance and the liquor men, a struggle even to blood, if there is no change soon in the aspect and attitude of things. I would not be a prophet of evil. Looking at Scripture, it seems as if even the very triumphs of civilization must be subsidized for a brief period to the service of a bad master, and all the world be under a cloud for a short space. But let every one form his own opinion. There is a multitude of voices. I prefer to keep silence.

So Seth Green is dead. A useful man was he, helping to fill the lakes and ponds, seas and rivers, with a greatly increased number and multitude of fishes, for the sustenance of the millions. A useful man and a useful life! Every useful life should help to make us better. It should bring us nearer to God. We should come to rest in God for strength, and wait on him for wisdom. What do we without God? O, that breath and power may come to us, as we ever anew come to him.

"CONCERNING THE SOUL."

Not very long ago there was an Editorial in the Christian Standard under this head-line. In that article we read, "Those who teach that in death the spirit of man becomes extinct are in the habit of quoting freely from the book of Ecclesiastes. They find in this book several passages that seem to suit their purpose, and which they quote with much popular effect."

We also read, "Such persons confine their thoughts to that book, to prove silence in the death state." Then the Editor charges the writer of that book as being a man not in a right frame of mind to advance lessons on so important a subject. A review of that article was sent to him, but did not appear in his paper. How hard it is to reach the minds of persons, who are so firmly fixed in the traditions of men. I therefore ask a place in THE RESTITUTION for a brief article on this subject, if according to your will.

Now a question arises, Do not people who do believe in consciousness in the death state frequently quote from the same book, when they want to prove their theory? How often do we hear the text used? "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit return unto God who gave it," chap. xii. 7. Thereby trying to prove consciousness in the death state, but fail before a correct interpretation.

If we examine the book of Ecclesiastes we shall find that it harmonizes with all other books in God's holy word. The general thought of this book is directed to man in his mortal state, and that as such like the beasts of the field, he is subject to death, still the writer did not fail to see the possibility of an immortal state hereafter. For he says, "Keep thy feet when thou goest to the house of God," etc. chap. v. 1.

If we compare Scripture with Scripture, we will see that Solomon stands not alone among the Bible writers in his positions "concerning the soul."

After God made man, he tested his loyalty, and said, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," (margin) "Dying thou shalt die," but man did not and became the subject of death, and God said unto him, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." The same is meant in each case. It was the "thou" that could sin, the "thou" that was of the dust, the "thou" that could die, the "thou" that could return to dust again.

Now the question arises, What is death? Is it not cessation of life? So the testimony of the King of Israel is in harmony with God's word to Adam. For "He died" not his body died, and his spirit or his soul as it is called remained conscious as we are taught now by the theologians, but that "He died." The "He" or "thou" that God made of the dust of the earth.

Again we read, "And flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beasts, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man. All in whose nostrils was the breath of life, all that was in the dry land died," Gen. vii. 21–22.

Here we see that man is catalogued with the birds, beasts, and reptiles of the earth. So Solomon was not far wrong when he said, "That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts, even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other: yea, they all have one breath, so that man hath no pre-eminence above a beast," etc. "For the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything." Let it be remembered that this is not the only place where such language occurs. We read in the Psalms "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish," Ps. cxlvi. 3–4. So the thoughts of Solomon are like the thoughts of his father David.

Then in said article we are told, those who quote, "the dead know not anything" to prove unconsciousness in death, should also quote, "neither have they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten."

To this we say, that man forfeited all rights to life and rewards by his disobedience. For "The wages of sin is death," Romans viii. 23. "And sin when it is finished bringeth forth death," James i. 15. "They shall be as though they had not been," Obadiah xvi.

Read again, "He (God) will keep the feet of his saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness," 1 Sam. ii. 9. "Let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave," Psa. xxxi. 17. "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence," cxv. 17. "For the grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee: they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth," Isa. xxxviii. 18.

Sometimes death is represented in the Scriptures as a sleep. For example, "And the Lord said unto Moses —Behold thou shalt sleep with thy Fathers," Deut. xxxi. 16. "So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David," 1 King ii. 10; Acts ii. 29; and xiii. 36.

"Asariah slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David," 2 Kings xv. 7.

Many more Scriptures can be referred to, but to be brief we omit them.

What consciousness can there be when asleep, if we speak of man in a natural sleep, he knows nothing; so how can he know any thing when sleeping the sleep of death. "For in death there is no remembrance of thee, in the grave who shall give thee thanks," Psa. vi. 5.

Thus we see that Solomon was not alone in showing unconsciousness in the death state.

Death was introduced into the world by sin, and sin was introduced by the devil; and Adam the representative of mankind was the victim, so all men became sinners. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: ....Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression," Rom. v. 12–14.

Therefore, if God had left man to himself, death would be an eternal sleep, and man would remain in silence for ever and ever. But God promised that the "seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." For that reason God sent his Son into the world to undo or to destroy what the old serpent had done.

Jesus said, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly," John v. 10.

So Jesus having taken upon him our nature, to restore man to his primitive state, and thus more than his pristine glory will be given to him. For Jesus died and rose again from the dead: and left the gates of the grave ajar, that when he shall come again, the gates of hades shall fly open, and the saints shall come forth to eternal life, then shall the "living soul" be immortal, by becoming a "partaker of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust," 2 Peter i. 4.

So in conclusion we say, We may look for consciousness in the future, if obedient: but not in the death state. Let us join in with the Psalmist and say, "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." Psa. xvii. 15.

Dear Restitution:

As this is a time when politics is uppermost in the minds of many and reform much talked of, I would like to say a few words about the greatest of these reforms, and tell the readers of our paper why I am not a prohibitionist. I believe in the principles of prohibition. I believe the people of this land have as much right to vote down the terrible curse as they have to institute any other reform in the laws of the country. I am deeply interested in the contest, my sympathies are all on one side. Though only a woman I have the heart of a giant when I think of the terrible wrongs that are perpetrated under the cloak of the law, when I think of the slimy folds of the deadly serpent that is twining itself about and defiling the pure and innocent, leaving scarcely a home in all this broad land untouched, oh I have no words to express my feelings or the eagerness with which I would join this crusade against the enemies of Christ. But I hear the voice of the Master, "Put up thy sword." My kingdom is not of this world, if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." We are pilgrims and strangers here. "Our citizenship is in heaven." The weapons of our warfare are not carnal. Of what use is a vote without an arm behind it. Be patient then you of "the little flock" who are panting to rush into this fight against the enemies of "God and home and native land."

You will be called cowards and traitors by those who in their misguided zeal fail to understand your position, but never mind "to obey is better than sacrifice," wait for orders, judge nothing before the time. Let us hasten that time by prayer, renewed consecration and a more faithful use of the sword of the spirit which is the word of God, our only weapon, and rest assured that when the time comes we will not be held back. "This honor have all the saints," Psalms cxlix. 9. Yours hoping for the soon coming of our great commander and the orders to move forward. ALICE ADAMS.

Members and friends of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, are earnestly requested to attend the Fifth Annual Meeting which is to be convened in the "Church of the Second Advent," 12th and Dickenson Sts. Philadelphia, Pa., beginning Friday eve, Sept. 28, and closing Sunday eve, Sept. 30th. We expect to have a feast of good things. Good speakers will address the meetings. Those who intend to be present will please notify the Pastor of the Church, Elder C. O. Ramsay, 1909 South 11th St. Philadelphia, Pa., so that proper arrangements can be made for the accomodation of all visitors.

JOHN DONALDSON, Sec.

Without faith, it is impossible to please God. We may have organization, activity, benevolence and zeal, but if faith be wanting, there is a body without spirit. The following is to the point:

If suddenly, and now, the chief prediction of the New Testament should be fulfilled, and the Lord Jesus Christ should appear in all his glory to the world, what would he find among the churches that bear his name? He would find many "Societies," of many names. The A. B. C. and the D. E. F. and the G. H. I. and the X. Y. Z.—but would he find FAITH? If this question appear to any one impertinent, or out of place, let him reflect that the Son of man himself asked it. It is not our interrogation.

Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

IT IS VERY ASTONISHING!

What Is Astonishing?

The fact that many of our subscribers let their subscriptions run out, and go on owing us for months and years, and when written to about it pay no attention to letters.

Another astonishing fact is that many others write and say they will pay as soon as they harvest their grain, or at some other set time, and when that time comes pay no attention to the promise they have made, and feel really hurt if we suggest that they redeem their pledge.

Look at your label, and see if you owe us something, and if you do, please send it to us today. We need it, so don't put off writing another hour. Are you poor? Can't you pay? Then write and say so. We want to hear from you. Write something, and that immediately. We wish to be very kind to the poor, we feel to sympathize with you, for we know how it is ourselves. No poor person has asked for our paper and not received it. So you need not be afraid, we will not harm anyone. But don't let the matter run any longer.

PLEASE ATTEND TO IT RIGHT AWAY.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 10, 1888.

WE think the probabilities are that the contemplated National Conference will be held, and so a beginning be made in this direction.

NOTHING is so pleasing to God as exact obedience to all his requirements. Saul lost a kingdom through his disobedience, and Moses failed to enter the land of promise by going beyond the simple requirement of God in his over-acting zeal and impatience. We have a crown of glory at stake, and let us be careful to win it lawfully—as it can be won no other way.

LET us be very careful in these days of political strife to not lose our interest in the cause of our Savior. There will be a tendency to neglect assembling ourselves together as well as to leave off prayer and reading the Scriptures daily, unless we are carefully on our guard. Our Redeemer knew well the dangers of the last days when he said, "Watch and pray."

FROM the Department of the Interior we have been favored with the Report of the Commissioner of Pensions for which we tender our grateful thanks. As items of interest to our readers we note that the whole number of pensioners remaining on the rolls at the close of the fiscal year was 452,657; the amount of money expended for pensions was $78,775,861.92; the cost of disbursements, etc., was $3,202,524.67, making a total of $82,038,386.59. As the total expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year were $267,924,801.13, it will be seen that pension expenses are quite a large proportion of the entire outlay of the Government. The cost of war should make us desire the reign of the Prince of Peace.

Some two or more years ago we copied an item purporting to show that the last revolutionary pensioner—a widow—had died. That person was, as we suppose, an actual revolutionary woman. Of later marriages and old veterans the report says, "The last two surviving revolutionary soldiers who were allowed pensions under a general act were William Hutchings of Hancock Co., Me., who died May 8, 1886, aged one hundred and two years, and Samuel Downing, of Saratoga County, N. Y., who died February 18, 1867, aged one hundred and one years. The following soldiers were granted pensions by special acts, dated February 29, 1867: John Gray, Noble Co., O., who died March 28, 1850, aged one hundred and five years, and Daniel F. Bakeman, of Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., who died April 5, 1869, aged one hundred and nine years. On the 4th of June, 1887, there were, drawing pensions as widows of soldiers of the revolutionary war, thirty-seven persons. Since my last report, the names of Nancy Bustin, widow of William Bustin, of Tennessee, aged eighty-four years; Mary Casey, widow of John Casey, of Ohio, aged eighty years; and Freelove Barnes, widow of Jonathan Seeley, of Michigan, aged ninety-two years, have been added to this roll), which was during the year reduced by the deaths of Margaret T. Brooks, (Georgia), aged eighty-two years, Fanny Chance, (Indiana), aged eighty years, and Judah Harris (North Carolina), aged eighty-eight years, as reported from the pension agencies, leaving thirty-seven widows of revolutionary soldiers drawing pensions at the present time."

How passes the world away! The Editor can look back to the days of childhood and youth, and recall the names and faces of a number of revolutionary veterans and their wives who were then engaged in all the common activities of life, and who had lived and suffered through the war that severed this country from British rule. Not one of these men or women of revolutionary times is alive today. The widows, now pensioned, were the young wives of old revolutionary soldiers.

We moved into Indiana Feb. 6, 1836. In 1837 we saw the last two revolutionary soldiers with whom we had ever become acquainted. The name of one was Joseph Parrett, Sr., and the name of the other was Michael Burdge who was step-father to the Editor's first wife. He died in the winter of 1840 in Tioga Co., N. Y. He and my wife's mother, Lucy Burdge, visited us in our home on Eel River, Whitley County, Ind. At his advanced age he travelled with horse and buggy to Western Tennessee, and from thence through Indiana into Michigan, and so back to New York. In this tour through the new country and sparse settlements he was accompanied by his wife. He was a Protestant Methodist, and a preacher in that denomination, having left the Episcopal Methodists with whom he had been associated for nearly or quite half a century. In the revolutionary war he was a prisoner and experienced the terrible sufferings on board the British prison ships. In his last years religion was his theme and prayer his occupation in a manner. He was also very well informed, being quite a reader, and the Editor derived much instruction from him, and from books in his library, while living in Western New York. We trust this official information, with what we personally supply, will interest our readers.

ROMANISM.

Below we place before our readers several items on Romanism. The first item from the N. Y. Independent contains a capital suggestion, which is that the State should assume control of all children so far as making it compulsory that all of school age in good health should attend the public schools, or private schools authorized by the State. Notice the sneaking villainy of a prelate imposing a tax of fifty cents a week on servant girls, who are directed to assess that much more in the shape of higher wages on Protestants who may employ them. Bequests for masses will strike our readers as a curious way of relieving departed souls (?) from the penalty for sin. Then the Pope's possible removal from Rome in consequence of Italian hatred, will be regarded as a striking sign of the times.

"All Massachusetts is exercised on the public school question, raised by the attitude of the Catholics. Children of Catholic parents hitherto attending the public schools, have been ordered to attend parochial schools, and many of them will do so. The Boston Evangelical Alliance passed resolutions on Monday appointing a committee to protest to the Boston School Committee against the withdrawal of Swinton's text book from the schools; and calling upon the State to resume at once control of the public schools, and to make attendance compulsory upon all children of school age and good health, except those who attend private schools approved by the State.

According to Boston dispatches, Father Barry, a Roman Catholic priest of Hyde Park, a Boston suburb, has instructed the servant girls in his parish to demand fifty cents per week more wages and to contribute the extra amount toward the building of a parochial school. The order creates considerable consternation among the thrifty housewives, who are dismissing their servants as fast as the latter make the demand.

THE SOUL AS AN HEIR-AT-LAW.

Two sisters in 1662 left their own souls as the heirs to property to the value of £280. Of this the executor, with permission from the Archbishop, lends £56 to Michael, their nephew, to pay for his education, to be afterward returned; £16 he gives in alms; £28 for masses. He proposes to give £4 more in alms, and the rest as honoraria for masses. A request is now made to him for the £56 previously loaned to Michael, to be given as an alms to two young ladies belonging to the same family. The executor seeks from Rome approval of his past disbursements and authorization for those proposed. The Archbishop sanctions the step. Ricci-Paracciani is quoted to show that money left for the salvation of one's soul, and for the glory of God, may be lawfully devoted to pious purposes or to the poor, since whatever is expended upon such purposes is spent for the glory of God and the good of the testator's soul. Pitonious teaches the same, and the Sacred Rota has approved of such administration of property. Many masses have been said for the intention. The answer of the Cardinals is that no authorization is needed, thus, of course, sanctioning the several disbursements.—St. James' Gazette.

ROME, Sept. 13.—Mgr. Schiaffino has presented to the Vatican a memorandum on the eventuality of the Pope leaving Rome. He approves Belgium as a Papal residence, owing to its neutral and Catholic character, but he is not in favor of the selection of Belgium except under a guarantee from the powers. He approves the departure from Rome only in the event of a rigorous application of the penal code, or war with France, when the Vatican would become an object of suspicion.

In the New York Herald of Sept. 2, 1888, is a telegraphic communication from Pittsburg, Pa., which reads as follows:—

PITTSBURG, Pa., Sept. 1, 1888.—Father Schuck, of Millhousen, near Indianapolis, Ind., passed through the city this morning, en route from Rome, Italy, to his home. Father Schuck is one of the best known priests in the West, has a large and influential congregation at Millhousen, and had recently had the honor of a personal interview with the pope. In speaking of the latter the reverend Father said: "The pope, who is now upward of seventy-eight years old, is in excellent health for a man of his age. He seems to be full of life and vigor and may live for many years. He is having considerable trouble with the Italian government, which may have an effect on him physically."

"Do you think he will have to leave Rome?"

"I certainly do. In fact I am almost positive that he will leave within two or three years. The Italian government has been treating him and the Church in a terrible manner. The government has confiscated all the property and only left him the Vatican. The king is living in the palace formerly used by the pope for a summer residence. To be candid with you, it will be impossible for the pope to remain there much longer. There is no use disguising the fact. Not half has been told about the indignities heaped upon our Church by the people of Rome. There is a bitter feeling against our religion, and the sooner the pope moves the better. The people are so bitter that a priest is liable to be insulted on the street at any time. I myself was never insulted, but it is wonderful the feeling that is manifest."

"What seems to be the feeling among the Church dignitaries there?"

"Every one I spoke to was of the opinion that the pope would have to leave, and of course from that I formed my opinion."

"If he decides to move where will he go?"

"O, to Spain, of course; that is the only place for him to go."

Catholics and Protestants who visit Italy tell the same story about the hatred of Italians toward the Papacy. This hatred will not stop after the confiscation of all public Romish property. It will increase more and more. The crimes of the Church of Rome for a thousand years are unavenged, and her day of judgment is at hand. Then the friars, monks, nuns, priests, bishops, archbishops, Jesuits and multitudes of the laity, together with the pope, will experience the most awful judgments that were ever inflicted upon a professedly religious body. Ere that fearful moment comes, God's people who are in that church of corruption, hypocrisy, deceit, superstition, and crime, will be called out of her. Before the awful calamities of A. D. 70 fell upon the Israelitish Church, thousands fled from Jerusalem. So now it may be with the Church of Rome. How glorious the time beyond will be when the everlasting kingdom will be established in all the earth. But the darkness of midnight must precede the dawning of the day.—Herald of Life.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 15, 1888.

At a meeting of the Church of the Second Advent held this day it was unanimously resolved "That this Church is in hearty accord with the plan of a general conference as proposed by Elder Geo. F. Work; that we name Philadelphia as the place and November 16th, 1888, as the time for holding it. We appoint Elder Geo. F. Work as our delegate to represent this Church at the conference, and request our Secretary to so certify to the Editor of THE RESTITUTION and to Elder Work. In the event of Philadelphia being the place selected, we cordially invite our brethren and sisters from other places to attend, promising to do our utmost to make their visit pleasant and agreeable."

JOHN'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 2.

A comparison of this Roman enemy of God's people described by John with the "little horn" foreshown by Daniel, demonstrates the important fact of their identity. They are one and the same. Observe the following points:

I. The persecuting horn seen by Daniel is a horn of the Roman empire; it is a Roman horn. And the persecuting head seen by John is a head of the Roman beast. In this they are alike. Each is Roman.

II. The persecuting horn grows up in the later, or divided state of the Roman empire; it rises among the ten Gothic horns. The persecuting head seen by John also grows up in the same later state of the Roman empire, for it follows the seven heads, and is the last. The sixth was said by the angel to be in existence in John's time, and the seventh was to last only a short season,—be wounded to death, and then revived in a new and final and peculiarly tyrannical and persecuting form. The "little horn" in Daniel belongs to the later ten-horned, or Gothic, period of the Roman empire; and the revived head of the empire seen by John belongs to the same period. You will note this point—their period is the same. This is a second mark of their identity.

III. Each has a mouth. Now here is a very distinct and remarkable feature. The other horns and heads were dumb; but this speaks. Of the persecuting Roman horn we read in Daniel, it had "a mouth;" and of the persecuting Roman head we read in John, "there was given unto him a mouth."

IV. In each case this mouth speaks the same things. Of the mouth of the Roman horn Daniel says, in chapter vii., "it spake great things" (v. 8), "the great words which the horn spake" (v. 11), "very great things" (v. 20), "great words against the Most High" (v. 25). While of the Roman head in the Apocalypse John says: "There was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. . . . And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven" (Rev. xiii. 6). The horn speaks; the head speaks, each speaks great things; each speaks blasphemies. This striking correspondence is a further indication of their identity. Each has stoma laloun megala (Dan. vii. 8),

stoma lalon megala (Rev. xiii. 5).

The expression is exactly the same in the Septuagint translation of Daniel and in the Apocalypse.

V. The horn has great dominion. It plucks up three horns; it has "a look more stout than his fellows," v. 20. It makes war and prevails; its great "dominion" is eventually taken away and destroyed: "they shall take away his dominion," v. 26. Similarly the head has great dominion; "power was given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations." The application of these words should not be pressed beyond the sphere to which they belong. In that sphere, for a certain period, the power of the horn or head was to be supreme and universal. In the fact of their dominion they are alike.

VI. Each makes war with the saints: each is terrible as a persecutor of God's people. Daniel says: "The same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them. . . . He shall wear out the saints of the Most High. . . . They shall be given into his hand until a time, and times, and the dividing of time." John says: "It was given unto him to make war with the saints and to overcome them," Rev. xiii. 7. John describes the method of this warfare, in what way and for what reason the "saints" or "martyrs of Jesus" "should be killed," Rev. xiii. 15; and it is of these martyrs the voice from heaven says, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them," Rev. xiv. 13. In their persecution of the saints Daniel's "horn" and John's revived "head" are alike.

VII. The duration of each is the same. This too is a noteworthy feature. The duration of the persecuting horn is mystically stated in Daniel as "time, times, and the dividing of time," or three and a half times, Dan. vii. 25. And the duration of the persecuting head in the Apocalypse is stated to be forty-two months. "Power was given unto him to continue forty and two months," Rev. xiii. 5. And these are the same period. This will appear from a comparison of the seven passages in which this period occurs in Daniel and the Apocalypse; in these it is called 1,260 days, forty-two months, and three and a half times. Now 1,260 days are forty-two months, and forty-two months are three and a half years. What these symbolic periods represent is another question; our point here is their identity. The persecuting horn and persecuting head are exactly the same in their duration. This is another proof of the sameness of the reality they represent.

VIII. They end in the same manner and at the same time. This completes the evidence of their identity. The persecuting horn is slain by the Ancient of days revealed in judgment, and the glory of his kingdom, Dan. vii. 9–11, 22. The persecuting head is slain by the "King of kings and Lord of lords" revealed in that judgment in which he treads the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. The judgment is the same, Rev. xix. 11, 20. The "little horn" and revived "head" then are alike in place, time, character, authority, persecuting action, duration, and doom. They arise at the same point; they last the same period; they do the same deeds; they come to their end at the same moment, and by the same revelation of Christ in the glory of his kingdom. They cannot prefigure two powers absolutely alike in all their respects; but one and the same. Even the Church of Rome admits their identity. It teaches that both are symbols of the great persecuting power.

The way is now clear to consider the interpretation of this prophecy. It is indeed determined already by this very identification. The little horn of Daniel prefigures, as we have proved before, the Papacy of Rome. So then does this revived head. We will examine briefly the evidences which sustain this conclusion; but as we have already sketched the history, we need not dwell at any length on the different points. We will take the prophetic features in the order in which we have already presented them, considering first the facts relating to the rise, and then those concerning the reign, of the power in question.

First then as to its rise. The predicted head rises from the Roman empire. It is therefore Roman. So is the Papacy. We have called the system which owns the pope as head Romanism, because its seat is the seven-hilled city.

Secondly, the predicted persecuting power grows up in the second stage of Roman history. It is the seventh or last head of the old empire revived. Now this is the exact position of the Papacy. The Papacy belongs to the second or Christian stage of the Roman empire. It grew up among its Gothic horns or kingdoms. It was the revival of a power which had been slain. When the pagan empire was overthrown the Papal rose in its place. First the Cæsars ruled in Rome, then the popes. The Goths overthrew the Roman empire in the fifteenth century; Romulus Augustulus abdicated the imperial dignity in A. D. 476. This was the "deadly wound" of the seventh head. From that date the Papacy grew with freedom, grew up among the Gothic horns. It was a revived head. The power of the Cæsars lived again in the universal dominion of the popes.

The Papacy was small at its beginning, but grew to great dominion; it exercised as wide a sway as the Cæsars it succeeded; all Europe submitted to its rule; it claimed, and still claims, a power without a rival or a limit. Hallam, as we have already remarked, says of the thirteenth century, the noonday of Papal power: "Rome inspired during this age all the terror of her ancient name. She was once more mistress of the world, and kings were her vassals." Remember the proud title taken by the popes, rector orbis—ruler of the world. In this also the Papacy fulfils the prophecy.

Observe, secondly, that extraordinary feature both in Daniel and the Apocalypse, the mouth of this power. Both the horn, in Daniel, and the head, in John, has a mouth, stoma laloun megala—"a mouth speaking great things." This feature is marvellously fulfilled in the Papacy. What a mouth has that Latin ruler! What a talker! what a teacher! what a thunderer! How has he boasted himself and magnified himself, and excommunicated and anathematized all who have resisted him? Has the world ever seen his equal in this respect? All the Gothic kings were his humble servants. He was, by his own account, and is, the representative of Christ, of God, ruler of the world, armed with all the powers of Christ in heaven, earth, and hell. He is infallible; his decrees are irreformable. A mouth indeed is his, a mouth speaking great things!

Notice, in the third place, his warring with the saints. In the Apocalypse we read, "It was given to him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them." I will not do more than remind you of the fact that, terribly as the saints suffered under the Cæsars of pagan Rome, they suffered far more terribly and far longer under Papal Rome. Let the massacres of the Albigenses, the Waldenses, the Hussites, the Lollards, the massacres in Holland and the Netherlands, the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the massacre in Ireland in 1641, the tortures of the Inquisition, the fires of the stake kindled over and over in every country in Europe—let these speak and testify to the fulfillment of prophecy. Yes; the Papacy has made war with the saints, and overcome them, and worn them out, and would have totally crushed and annihilated them, but for the sustaining hand and reviving power of God. In its prolonged, cruel, and universal persecution of the saints, the Papacy has fulfilled this solemn prophecy.

Notice, in the fourth place, the predicted duration of this persecuting power. Daniel mysteriously announces its duration as three and a half times; John as forty-two months. The symbolical nature of the prophecy, as well as the vastness of the subject, forbid us to take these times literally. As the beast is symbolic, and its various parts symbolic, so the period of its persecuting head is symbolic. You find this period mentioned seven times over in Daniel and Revelation, and called 1,260 days, forty-two months, and also three and a half "times." These are, as we have said, the same period. Calculate for yourself, and you will find it so. Now, both in the law and prophets, a day is used as the symbol of a year. Moses, Ezekiel, Daniel use it thus. The seventy weeks of Daniel, or 490 days to Messiah, were fulfilled as 490 years; that is, they were fulfilled on the year-day scale. On this scale the forty-two months, or 1,260 days, are 1,260 years. We ask then, has the Papacy endured this period? An examination of the facts of history will show that it has. From the era of its rise in the sixth century, at the notable decree of the emperor Justinian, constituting the Bishop of Rome head of all the Churches in Christendom, A. D. 538, 1,260 years extended to 1793, the date of the tremendous Papal overthrow in the French Revolution. Here we have a fact of great importance. Note it well. To this we add the further fact, that from the analogous decree of the emperor Phocas, confirming the headship of the pope over Christendom, in the year 607, 1,260 years extended to 1866–7, the initial date of the recent remarkable overthrow of Papal governments which culminated in the loss of the pope's temporal power in 1870. In that year the Papacy assumed the highest exaltation to which it could aspire, that of infallibility, and lost the temporal sovereignty, which it had held for more than a thousand years. Thus the predicted period has been fulfilled. What an evidence is this! The Papacy has fulfilled the prophecy, not only in its geographical and historical position, its moral character, its political power, its blasphemous pretentions, its tyrannical career, but in its very chronology,—in the point of its rise, the period of its duration, the era of its decline, the crisis of its overthrow.—*H. Advices from Cuba report that the recent hurricane and tidal wave on that island destroyed thousands of buildings and ruined the crops. Over 800 lives were lost. The total loss by the destruction and damage of property is estimated at $10,000,000.

Professor Richard A. Proctor, the eminent scientist, arrived at New York from Florida on Monday last and took a room in the Westminster Hotel. Tuesday he was taken ill with yellow fever and that evening was removed to the Willard Parker Hospital, where he died with the black vomit Wednesday evening. The case was isolated and the greatest precautions taken, so that no fear of the spread of the infection is felt. Professor Proctor was to have sailed for Europe next Saturday.

According to the annual statistical report of the German Jewish community, the number of Jews in the kingdom of Prussia in 1880 was 363,790, or 1.32 per cent. of the total population; in 1885 the number was 366,648, or 1.29 per cent. There was thus an absolute increase in the Jewish population, but a relative decrease.

The Rev. W. F. Davis, who was sentenced to one year's imprisonment for preaching on Boston Common without a permit, was released from jail last week after having served ten months, his term having been shortened because of good behavior. He was received by many friends. The carriage which bore him to his home in Chelsea was followed by others filled with friends. Mr. Davis will not say whether or not he will again preach on the Common.

It does not Destroy but Elevates.

It is not the object of Christianity to destroy anything that really belongs to human nature, but to purify and elevate it. The divine power is put forth, not to reduce our individual characteristics to a dead level, but to quicken and to make them more sharply defined. The gospel imparts new life to every power of the soul. The Holy Spirit works in us in order to bring all our faculties into harmony with one another, and all with God. Hence his operations will be different in different minds, although the result will be the same—regeneration, new life. The philosopher will continue a philosopher after his conversion. He will still search into the causes of things, will dwell in the lofty region of abstraction, and will find his chief delight in the contemplation of the deep and fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and in harmonizing them with the reason. The man of powerful imagination will not lose it by becoming a Christian. It will continue its flights, but will be purified by the vital power of godliness. He will dwell on the more imaginative and poetic themes of Christianity, and will move in altogether a different sphere from the other. The matter-of-fact man will remain so after he becomes a Christian. His chief delight will be in the practical duties and doctrines of the gospel. The loving soul will live on love, and will merge all the other doctrines into that of love; while the man in whom the conscience bears away will delight to illustrate the laws of eternal justice. Every one, according to his natural faculties, will give prominence to a particular phase of Christianity.

DEATH OF IRVING O. THOMAS.

Irving O. Thomas, well known to Pittsburghers connected with the petroleum trade, died at the Homeopathic Hospital last evening at 10:10 o'clock of typhoid fever.

He was born at Whitby, Ontario, Canada, on March 3, 1860, where his father at that time had taken up his residence, going there from St. Lawrence county, State of New York. In the year 1877, when seventeen years of age, he came to the United States with his father, who then resumed his residence, settling at Dover, Delaware. Mr. Thomas entered the business of job printing on Diamond street, Pittsburgh, from which he went to Delaware to complete his studies. He then went to Bradford, Pa., in 1881, to accept a position as stenographer and amanuensis with the United Pipe Lines. After a short residence there, Mr. W. T. Scheide, General Manager, appreciating his good qualities, took him to his own office at Oil City, where he remained till April 7, 1883, when Captain Vandescrift, President of the United Pipe Lines, engaged him to come to his office here, where he continued until his late sickness.

He was taken ill on August 23, and for the benefit of nursing went to the hospital the following day.

He was accomplished in many ways, not only being one of the most expert shorthand writers, but also a linguist—able to read and speak French as well as English. He had been a notary public for several years. All who knew him will realize the loss of one anxious to relieve the burden of a friend. His father and mother had been with him for several days before his death, having been called here by his illness.—Pittsburgh Dispatch, Sept. 4, 1888.

This was our youngest and only unmarried child. He was a noble young man. He had been an obedient and consistent believer of "the gospel of Christ which is the power of God unto salvation" for many years. It is a sad bereavement. But it is a great satisfaction to know that he sleeps in Christ—that he will live again—that he will have part in the first resurrection—that he will be raised incorruptible—that we shall see him, and never part again. Elder Cloughs of Allegheny City was present at the funeral, and talked to the people about "the hope and resurrection of the dead," very appropriately and ably; showing that while Atheism, Infidelity, Skepticism, Philosophy and Science can afford no comfort in the time of such bereavements and heart-rending grief, the Scriptures present us with "a strong consolation"—a "blessed hope."

We have been here for some time, and are obliged to remain several days longer. L. O. THOMAS.

WILD ROSES.

Blooming little rose bush,
Wet with morning dew!
I can read my life tale,
Plainly writ in you!
Here are scarlet blossoms,
Glistening, dewy wet,
There are future flowrets,
Buds, not blossoms yet.
These are childhood's moments,
Mingled joy and tears;
Gladsome with the promise
Of the future years.
Here are scattered leaflets,
Lying on the ground,
By the summer breezes
Loosely spread around.
These are youthful pleasures
Gone and passed away;
Withered like the blossoms,
They have had their day.
Here are prickly thornsplikes,
Round the flowrets worn:
We must pluck the blossom
Fearing for the thorn.
These are life's attainments,
Trials never done;
'Tis through painful labor
Wisdom can be won.
Summer's beauty faileth,
Blossoms yield to seed,
Every season labors
For another's need.
Life is more than pastime,
Death is more than rest;
Building for the future
Let us do our best!

HE SEES.

A little girl of nine summers came to ask her pastor about joining the church. She had been living a Christian for several months, had been properly taught and answered the usual questions promptly and properly. At last the pastor said:

"Nellie, does your father think you are a Christian?"

"Yes, sir."

"Have you told him?"

"No, sir."

"How then does he know?"

"He sees."

"How does he see that?"

"Sees I am a better girl."

"What else does he see?"

"Sees I love to read my Bible and to pray."

"Then you think he sees you are a Christian?"

"I know he does; he can't help it," and with a modest, happy boldness she was sure her father knew she was a Christian because he could not help seeing it in her life. Is not such the privilege of all God's people, to be sure that others see they are following Christ?

We remember hearing of a poor, hard-working man whose fellow-laborers laughed at him, told him he was deceived and pressed him with difficult questions. At last in the desperateness of his heart he said, "I am a saved man. Go ask my wife if I am not. She sees I am."

This is what Christ meant by being witnesses and lights in the world. Not only orthodoxy of faith and boldness of confession, but a manner of life which, even without spoken words, testifies of a new life and love.

This is the best evidence of our religion. When those who work with us in the mill or store or on the farm see that we are living a new life, then our words have power. This is the privilege of everyone. We may not be rich or educated or eloquent, and hence not able to give much or teach much or speak much; but we can live much, and good living is the best giving, the best teaching, the best eloquence. The poorest, the most ignorant, and the youngest can cause people to see they are changed. They can prove the reality of their conversion.

We cannot hide a good life. It shines. It may make no more noise than a candle, but like a candle it will be seen. Thus even a little boy or girl may be a light-bearer.—Messenger.

Dear Youthful Workers:

I have been so very busy lately that I am afraid I have neglected you, but I have been thinking of you all the time and now I am going to write. When I sat down I did not know what to tell you about, but in turning over the leaves of a little picture book I happened to think of a picture that I once saw. It was a scene in the life of Jesus. He was standing up and all around him were poor, sick people, waiting to be made well. Some were lying at his feet; some sitting, propped up by kind friends, looking up into his face; one poor, blind man was close by and on the other side another was coming, hobbling on a cane. And what do you think Jesus did? Did he tell them to go home, that he was not a doctor and had no medicine for them? No, he never was obliged to say, "I cannot cure you, you must die;" he only had to touch their eyes or their hands, or to say, "that he would make them well," and they were well, in an instant of time. He never gave any bitter powders, or nauseating drinks, but he took away the sins of the sick, and that made them well. It is sin that makes people die, you know. Was not Jesus good?

Well, he is just as good now, and just as willing to make us well as he was then. He wants us to be well, so that we can work for him.

I will give you a pretty text and close for this time. Sometime I will tell you about some little children who have trusted in God and been made well.

"But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." Lovingly,

S. R. WINCE.

Dear Little Workers:

Although a stranger to all of you, I hope I am not to the dear Savior who died for us all, nor to dear Auntie Wince who writes such precious letters to you. And reading about you in THE RESTITUTION makes me desire that there were more such bands of youthful workers, and to write something also to encourage you to persevere and become followers of the blessed Savior. It would be a great satisfaction to me to say or do something to guide the youthful mind into the way of truth; and the happiest recollections of my life are the moments spent with my own children reading and teaching them the truths of God's word. Youth is the seed time of the great harvest of life, and impressions received in childhood are the most lasting. We read in Eccl. xii. 1, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, before the evil days come, and the years draw nigh when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." These words were uttered by Solomon, the Son of David, the third king of Israel. He was great and wise, and his wisdom was given him from God in answer to prayer. After the death of his father David, he felt his inability to rule so great a nation. So he gathered the people together and went and offered one thousand burnt offerings to the Lord as was the custom. That night God appeared unto him and said, ask now what I shall give thee. So Solomon asked wisdom to rule the people. Then God said, because thou desirest wisdom and hast not asked riches, nor honor, nor the life of thine enemies, neither long life for thyself, lo, I have given thee an understanding heart, and riches, and honor, so there should be no kings like him all his days, and if he continued in his statutes would lengthen his days.

So you see God loves those who choose wisdom. Man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh upon the heart, and the divine command is, keep thy heart with all diligence for out of it are the issues of life. Now while the heart is yet tender, and before sorrow has darkened your skies, take care to sow in your hearts the good seed of the word which shall spring up unto eternal life in the kingdom of God. Remember we all have a life work to perform, and if you begin early, always exerting a good influence over your companions you may come at last with rejoicing, bringing your sheaves with you. Hoping to hear from you occasionally through THE RESTITUTION, I remain your loving friend.

J. R. STEVENS.

Dear Youthful Workers:

I think I promised in my last letter to tell you about some little sick children, who believed God could make them well and who asked him to cure them.

One was a small boy who was very sick in a hospital. A hospital is where they take sick people in large cities who have nobody to take care of them. This poor boy had no one, mother or friends, to wait on him in his illness, so he was taken to the hospital.

The doctors came and looked at him. They were afraid he could not live. But one of them loved the Lord Jesus. The little boy asked him if he would not pray for him?" He said, "he knew Jesus would make him well." The doctor was glad to know that his little patient was looking to God. He felt sure then that he would get well, and he said he would pray. The little boy felt so satisfied and happy that he went to sleep, sure that the dear Jesus would hear the prayer of his friend.

In the morning he woke up almost well, and was soon able to leave the hospital. But Auntie Wince has forgotten the little boy's name, so she cannot tell you that nor where he lived, but she thought you would like to hear about him anyway.

Sometime she will tell you something more, because she wants you to trust your dear Heavenly Father just as this little boy did. Your loving friend, AUNTIE WINCE.

EVIDENCES OF A DEITY.—Part 1.

I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God besides me: I girded thee, though thou hast not known me; that they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west that there is none besides me. I am the Lord, and there is none else. Isa. xlv. 5, 6.

Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the Lord he is God in heaven above and upon the earth beneath: there is none else. Deut. iv. 39.

The evidences of a Supreme Intelligence are not alone confined to the pages of the books of the Old and New Testament; and the reasoning faculties in man,—the intuition, perception and judgment,—with many at least, would scarcely remain satisfied with an abstract statement of such an existence, apart from, and unsupported by collateral proof. But when the positive declarations of the Inspired Word are supported by external testimonies, derived from objects with which we are in almost continual contact, doubt is dispelled and the foundation of an implicit faith and trust is made more firm and stabilized. Such confirmation is omnipresent in the world around us. Design is everywhere apparent, testifying of a Superior Designing Intellect.

In every chemical formula by which compounds are formed, whether in the laboratory of the skillful chemist, or in the natural world, and, whether beneficial or injurious to the material world, and the organisms residing upon it; in all the varied manifestations of life, development and growth of the vegetable kingdom; in all the processes, functions, adaptations and vital manifestations peculiar to animal life and to animate beings; in all the relations of organic matter to its surroundings in the world, and whether endowed with life or undergoing the process of decay and disintegration; in every adaptation and conformity of part or member to its function, and relation to the economy of existence, and in every display of that wonderful conservation and correlation of matter and force, which is the domain of physics, is called natural law, there is a universal, harmonious adaptation of means to the production of definite results,—the ends justifying the means,—and the means used producing unvarying combinations, and uniform effects, which cannot, by any stretch of mental power, be attributed to inert, unaided matter.

Nowhere in the universe is there any lack of evidence of an intelligently directed design, where matter and force are found. A unit law pervades the entire universe, and this unit law is based, everywhere, on correlations and conservations, which when investigated and understood, plainly and unequivocally point to a Disposer whose powerful mentality is sufficient to grasp the entirety of the universe, and to comprehend the most minute detail of its effect upon the smallest molecules of matter, at the same time.

As an illustration from the domain of chemical analysis and synthesis; it is a known fact that the proximate elements, such as oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, nitrogen, sulphur, gold, silver, tin, zinc, etc., will only unite in certain constant, unvarying and uniform combining proportions; and when the required amounts are brought together under favorable circumstances, union will occur, and a new compound will be formed dissimilar from either of its factors; yet the union is always productive of the same definite compound, when the conditions of combination are the same; and this new element may again be separated into its proximate elements, while any excess of either factor, (less than an equivalent), will remain free and uncombined.

The prudent housewife combines the lye, the fatty matter and the water, and produces by their union a new article,—soap.—which differs from either of the chemical agents employed, with no less certainty than that the scientific chemist, who, in his laboratory has determined the combining equivalents of about 70 primary elements, that enter into the composition of all the various bodies of matter in the universe, so far as has been investigated. He has observed that

1 eq. of Nitrogen and 1 eq. of Oxygen forms Nitrous Oxide
2 eq. of Nitrogen and 1 eq. of Oxygen forms Hypo Nitrous Oxide
2 eq. of Nitrogen and 3 eq. of Oxygen forms Nitrous Acid
4 eq. of Nitrogen and 1 eq. of Oxygen forms Hypo Nitrous Acid
5 eq. of Nitrogen and 1 eq. of Oxygen forms Nitric Acid and that

1 eq. of Carbon and 1 of Oxygen produces Carbonic Oxide
1 eq. of Carbon and 2 of Oxygen produces Carbonic Acid.

and so on through the list of elementary combinations.

The chemist can combine them, or discover them when found in combination, and separate them into the elements that enter into their composition and recombine, but he will invariably find the elements in just such proportions, and they will effectually resist a union except in accordance with their respective laws of chemical affinity.

Is it merely accidental that all bodies (of which the foregoing are only examples) are chemically formed strictly in the ratio of the combining equivalents of their respective elements, and that these cannot be made to unite in any other proportions?

It is true that every substance of which we have any knowledge is composed of some of the 70 proximate elements, separately, or compounded with one or more of the other elements, united according to the numerical value of the combining equivalents of each element. Is this fixed combining equivalent inherent in these proximate elements? If so, by whom was this inherency established?

One element is attracted by another and they become incorporated, losing their identity, to form a new body by chemical union, while another element is repelled and cannot be made to unite with either in any proportion. These elemental attractions and repulsions are well known and universal. If these properties are natural who made them so? Who arranged these affinities and made them permanent?

The combining powers of the elements are so well understood and their equivalents have been so thoroughly tested that when a new compound is to be formed of two or more elements, the chemist readily writes out the formula for the destruction of the old, and, of the exact elementary constituents of the new, noting at the same time what elements (if any) are disengaged and set free. Thus, for example he writes:—

Sulphuric Acid { Sulphur, Oxygen } + Zinc, Oxygen = Sulphate of Zinc Oxide Water { Oxygen, Hydrogen } Set Free

Again:

Water { Hydrogen, Oxygen } = Water

In the above illustration, 1 equivalent of oxygen unites with the Zinc to form Zincic Oxide, (White vitriol), and is almost simultaneously changed to sulphate of Zincic Oxide by chemically absorbing three parts of Oxygen and the sulphur; decomposing the water and setting the one part of Hydrogen free; this may be caught in a proper vessel for examination and use. The Zinc has a greater affinity for Oxygen than the Hydrogen has, hence the water is destroyed and a new body is created from the elements.

In the next formula exactly one equivalent of Oxygen and one equivalent of Hydrogen are put together in a light glass vessel. After a few hours of exposure to the action of light, (or by the effect of a spark of electricity which will cause an explosion from the violence of instantaneous chemical union), the Hydrogen and Oxygen will disappear, and a little water will be found in the vessel in their stead. The amount of water will be found to be exactly equal to the quantity of gasses to their united equivalents.

In the double decomposition of the former, and the synthetic combination of the latter, accidental? Are they the results of chance? or, is there a fixed law of combination by which the chemist's formula is wrought out according to his expectation? If such a law exists by whom was it formulated, and who continually upholds and enforces it?

It certainly requires greater individual credibility to disbelieve in the existence of a Superior overruling mind, under the guidance of which the affinities, the attractions, the selections, and the chemical activities of the universe, are fixed and kept, and by which the cosmic evolutions have been controlled since the foundations of the universe were set in the immensity of space, than it does to believe in such an existence.

The outer coating of grains, and the seeds of plants is nearly or quite impervious to fluids. If a bit of varnish, or wax is put over the point of a kernel of corn, or over the stem or pointed end of a squash seed, or so as to fully cover the eye of a bean, they may be immersed in water, or deposited, without germination so long as the point or opening for the absorption of moisture remains thoroughly covered. Again, if a few clean beans, or seeds of the squash are immersed in tepid water for 24 or 36 hours, and are then carefully examined, the following are among the changes that will be noticed:—

1st. They are much larger than they were when dry.

2nd. The seed is soft and doughy to the touch.

3rd. A critical search will reveal a small opening near the eye of the bean, and at the pointed end of the squash seed through which the water has penetrated to the interior of the seed.

4th. If the seed be carefully opened with a sharp knife, an aqueduct will be found leading, by a circuitous route, to the interior space between the two lobes (cotyledons) of the seed, and beautifully packed between them, will be found the young plant attached to both of the lateral halves. The same general plan of germination is true of all seeds from the finest flower seed to that of the largest fruit; and, from the soft, membranous covering of some, to the almost flinty hardness of others.

The germ is within the body of every good seed; the channel for the transmission of moisture from the external world to the dry germ is present in every one; the bulk of the seed, intended for the nourishment of the germ until it is capable of maintaining a separate and independent existence, is there, while the impervious coat, for the protection of the infant plant and its store of food, covers all.

Let us trace the development of the germ still further. That part of the seed to which the embryonic plant is attached, and which, in all two-lobed seeds, are joined together by it, and that forms the bulk of the seed, is largely composed of sugar, starch and gum, besides a small quantity of a peculiar azotized (nitrogenous) substance, called, Diastase. When moisture is taken up by the seed, through its germinal opening, it is conducted by the little canal to the interior and comes in contact with, and softens the starch, the gum and the sugar, dissolving the latter, making it ready to be absorbed and assimilated by the little plant, which is also quickened into activity by the moisture. Sugar is the food of the little plant, and as fast as it is thus dissolved, taken up and appropriated, the diastase acting upon the moistened starch, converts it into dextrine (gum) and then into sugar for the further nutrition and growth of the plant germ.

The chemical composition of sugar, starch and gum are very similar, the formula—Carbon 24 parts, Hydrogen 22, Oxygen 22, answering for either of them.

Vegetables possess the property of decomposing sugar, straining out, as it were, the carbon, and of appropriating this element and the water, (Hydrogen and Oxygen in equal proportions), both which are essential to their growth and development, for plant nutrition.

In all seeds the processes of germination, and functional chemical analysis, are the same, and all yield obedience to the one universal method of unfoldment and growth.

Are the relations of the several parts in each seed, and the chemical changes necessary to bring each germ from latency into the full activities of plant life the result of a common law of vegetable production? Either they are, or they are not. If they are, through what agency was this law founded?

By whom were the lobes of all Dicotyledinous plant seeds arranged as a protection and a storehouse of nourishment for the tender germ?

By whose skill was the tiny aqueduct laid within the coating of the seed, and fixed to supply only as much moisture as is best suited to the necessities of the delicate plant, laying latent within the padded sack?

If it was simply a natural consequence for all seeds to be so organized, so developed, and so restrained; if all these activities are the product of nature unaided by an intelligent Intellect, it would assuredly require the most extraordinary exhibition of individual faith to receive and comprehend it.

Conference Report.

The union conference, composed of the old and new conferences of the Church of God in Michigan, was held at Dutton, Kent Co., Mich., beginning on the evening of Thursday, Aug. 23d, by preaching to a good house. Friday morning met at 9:30 o'clock for social meeting. Had a good feast after which Brother A. N. Seymour spoke on the "signs of the times," showing that the coming of the Lord was nigh at hand.

On Saturday morning met at 9:30 o'clock for social meeting, and while in the midst of a social feast word came to the church that Brother Woodward's house was on fire. This was a "scene not on the programme," but every brother proved himself adequate to the occasion; as was dryly remarked by a bystander, "these preachers seem to be full as good at putting out fire as they are at kindling it." After a sharp fight we got the fire under control, and although much heated and tired we proceeded once more to the church and there entered at once on the great business of the meeting, which was, if possible, to perfect the work already begun of uniting all of the brotherhood in one conference. The Declaration of Principles previously agreed upon was read, and after some explanation, a resolution to unite the old and new conferences was read and unanimously adopted. Brother Dwiggins suggested that we sing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," which was done with a will.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Pres. Jacob Lemon; Vice Pres. E. Hoyt; Sec. L. C. Chase; Treas. Amara Richardson; Evangelist, B. W. Woodward.

It was recommended that each church take action on the call of Brother Work relative to a National Conference, and report the same to THE RESTITUTION.

In the evening Brother L. C. Chase spoke from the text, "Where shall wisdom be found, and where is the place of understanding."

Sunday morning we enjoyed an hour of prayer, exhortation and song. Bro. Chaplin then spoke on the subject of Paradise, showing himself so much a master of the subject, that many expressed a wish that the discourse might be printed in tract form.

In the afternoon a Sister Jones spoke on the future life, and in the evening Brother Dwiggins spoke from the text, "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth." The meeting then closed by eating of the supper. We believe this to be the best conference ever held in Michigan. By its work the divided elements of the body of Christ in Michigan became a unit, and we trust will forever after "strive together for the faith of the gospel."

And now brethren and sisters in Michigan, let us strive as we never did before. We have an efficient evangelist but he must be sustained. And "God hath so ordained that they that preach the gospel should live of the gospel." Let each organized church report at once to the treasurer just how much they will give for the coming year. There are also many brethren and sisters who are isolated from church organizations, who are able to do something for the spread of the gospel. To such we say, send on your mite, or if you cannot pay now, send on your pledge and pay when you can, but we ask you in the "name of him who died" to do something, and let us give the truth such an impetus as it never before received in Michigan. Those desiring evangelical labor will address, B. W. Woodward, Dutton, Kent Co., Mich.

We would not forget to notice that Brother Richard Railsback, of Montour, Ind., was among those who greeted us from Indiana. Come again brethren. This report is necessarily incorrect as to detail. The secretary, Sister Woodward, lost her notes during the excitement of the fire, and this report, except of the business meeting, is made from memory. It is also remembered that on Friday Brother Chaplin gave a grand discourse on the resurrection. L. C. CHASE, Sec.

To the Churches of God in the United States and Canadas and Sister Churches Affiliating with them, by Whatsoever Name they may be Called:—Greeting.

"The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of Light."

An anxious retrospect by many thoughtful members of the Church, reveals the fact that during the last twenty years, Churches, some large, some small, have been formed, existed for a brief period and then gone out of existence; that in other cases Churches would have been formed, but for the fact that the evangelist has been driven away from the field with his work half completed, because there was no aid rendered him, and his family necessities required him to abandon it and return to his daily labor.

In many cases Churches, built up on the doctrines first taught them, have had fatal discords introduced among them by later and unauthorized preachers, teaching contrary doctrines. To correct these and other errors of the past, and to increase ten-fold the good now being accomplished, it is the belief of many that the time is full ripe for an organized Union of the Church in all places, and for concentrated, persistent effort in proclaiming the Gospel as the many who have never had it properly presented to them. To bring about a union of all the Churches into "one body," it has been proposed to have a general conference of the Church, to be held this year, each Church in the country to be represented by a delegate under about the following conditions.

1st. Each Church of twenty or more members (or a group of smaller Churches to the number of twenty or more members) meet, vote upon, and send to the Editor of THE RESTITUTION before October first, 1883, the result of the vote, as to when and where this general conference shall be held; and also the name and address of a delegate of sound judgment and discretion, (not necessarily a preacher, unless the Church so prefers it), who shall represent, and cast the vote of that Church on the business matters brought before the conference.

2nd. Each delegate to take with him to the conference a written certificate from the clerk or presiding officer of the Church, stating that he is the accredited delegate representing, and entitled to vote for the Church, in the General Conference of the Church of God and Sister Churches wherever it may be held.

3rd. This meeting, when held, should extend for ten days, over two Sundays, say from Friday evening to the second Monday evening, and the time and place for holding it will be announced by the Editor of THE RESTITUTION as he shall find best represents the choice of a majority of the Churches writing to him before October 1st. The questions each delegate will have power to vote upon will be:

a. A Covenant, the same in all Churches, short and scriptural, which shall be subscribed to by all members as they are received into the Church.

b. The arrangement of the best and most permanent form of collecting the income needed for the support of each individual Church; of State and other Association of Churches; and of providing a fund for general evangelistic work; and who shall administer to that fund.

c. How weak and needy Churches can best be fostered and cared for.

d. How, and under what authority shall general or special evangelists represent the Church.

e. The power to make rules for the government of this and future yearly general conferences, and to decide when and where the next general conference shall meet and how delegates shall be appointed.

f. If any other propositions are presented at this general conference, they may be voted upon by the delegate subject to subsequent ratification by his Church.

That lack of means may not prevent any delegate from attending this important conference, the Church at Philadelphia agrees that, where a Church is not able to bear the entire expense of sending its delegate, each of such delegates shall receive from this Church a contribution of $10.00 towards his expenses, wherever it exceeds that sum if the general conference is held west of Harrisburg, Pa.; or of $20.00 each, if it is held east of Harrisburg, and such expenses amount to $20.00. The Phila. Church also offers, if the conference is held in Phila. that each delegate shall be provided for without cost, during the time the conference is held in Phila. Doubtless other cities would do as well. This call meets the approval of Elder G. C. Ramsay, our Pastor in Phila., of Elder Geo. R. Kramer, Pastor of the Church of the Blessed Hope in Brooklyn, and doubtless of many others in the Churches of God at Brooklyn, Baltimore, Winchester and other places. The eastern Churches do not insist on this conference being held in the East, if in the judgment of the Church, it is best to hold it anywhere in the West. For the Church at Philadelphia,

GEO. P. WORK.

Announcements.

The annual conference of the Church of God, for the Northwest, will meet at Scholl's Ferry, Oregon, commencing Friday evening, October 19, 1883, and holding over the following Sunday.

This being during the time for the "Mechanic's Fair" at Portland, those attending conference can take advantage of the reduced railroad fare at that time.

Teams will be at Portland to meet those from a distance. Please notify us if you wish to be met.

We hope to see all who attended last year and many more besides.

If we are among those whom the Lord, when he comes, shall find doing his will, happy shall we be. If meeting in conference and building each other up, and planning for the spread of the Gospel, is his will, happy indeed will we be in that day if we have done what we could in that direction. By order of Executive Committee.

WHO SHALL ROLL AWAY THE STONE.

That which weeping ones were saying,
Eighteen hundred years ago,
We the same weak faith betraying,
Say in our sad hours of woe.
Looking at some trouble lying
In the dark and dread unknown,
We, too, often ask with sighing,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Thus our cares with spirits crushing,
When they might from care be free,
And in joyous song outgushing,
Rise in rapture, Lord to Thee.
For, before the way was ended,
Oft we're led with joy to own,
Angels have from heaven descended
And have rolled away the stone.

Many a storm-cloud sweeping o'er us
Never pours on us its rain;
Many a grief we see before us
Never comes to cause us pain.
Oft times in the fearful "tomorrow"
Sunshine comes—the cloud has flown!
Ask not them in foolish sorrow,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Burden not thy soul with sadness;
Make a wiser, better choice;
Drink the wine of the will gladness
God doth bid thee, man, "rejoice!"
In today's bright sunlight basking,
Leave tomorrow's cares alone;
Still not present joys by asking,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Dear Restitution:

I see in your last issue (Aug. 22) an article over the signature of N. B. Bendy upon the subject of "sin in the flesh," which I confess does not appear as clear to my mind as it seems to appear to his. This "sin in the flesh" question has greatly disturbed the minds of very many good people. But much that has been said and written upon the subject, to my mind at least, has been more jargon, and has caused confusion to become worse confounded. I believe that nearly all parties that I have read upon the subject, admit that there is some how or other sin existing constitutionally in the flesh. Robert Roberts of the Christadelphian took the position that the words of the serpent became some how or other, a constitutional law in the flesh, and cursed even Christ, so he had to die to redeem himself. Other parties seeing the absurdity of such a position, have labored to extricate Christ from the dilemma. This seems to be the main object of N. B. B's. article. He admits that sin exists in the flesh some how, and that it is penal sin, and that it has only descended to us through the man. That the woman was not involved in the condemnation. That Christ being the Son of God by the woman was exempt from condemnation, and tries to prove it by offering as an analogy the case of Levi paying tithes in Abraham. Now all this labor, all this forcing and straining of conclusions, inferential testimony and analogies appear to me entirely superfluous. Now I did not set out to write a criticism upon N. B. B's. article, but only propose to invite the reader to take a view of the subject from a little different stand-point.

In the first place then I will state that Adam was created mortal, just as every thing else that God had created from the ground, that breathed the breath of life. Now the natural tendency of all mortality, when left to itself, is to the ground. But Adam at first was not left to himself, he had the tree of life placed within reach, with full privilege to eat of it. This tree of life was not to impart immortality—as some have erroneously taught—but as a panacea for his natural mortality, so long as he had access to it. Immortality, or eternal life was not involved in the Eden law, but only a continuance of mortal life. Immortality or eternal life is predicated upon different provisions and a different law from the Eden law.

Now when Adam had transgressed the Eden law by eating the forbidden fruit the penalty of which was death, all the Lord God had to do was to cut him off from the tree of life that his natural mortality might run its course and end in death, which it did in 930 years.

Now the question is, did this sentence against Adam reach his descendants? Certainly it did. But in what sense? Not as a penal sentence, but as a consequence growing out of the sentence, being cut off from the tree of life in Adam. Let me here illustrate by a little homely illustration. A man has a family of children, he is possessed of an estate. He violates the law. It requires his whole estate to pay the penalty. Now does not his children suffer the penalty of their father's transgression? They certainly do. But in what sense? Not as a penal sentence against them, but as a consequence growing out of the sentence against the father, being deprived of the work. Just so the condemnation upon Adam affected his posterity not as a penal sentence against them, but as a consequence of their being cut off from the tree of life in Adam. There is no law or principle in the whole Bible that would be violated by God raising from the dead any of Adam's race who had merely died because of the sentence of Adam's transgression. But there would be if God gave that individual eternal life, unless he had obeyed the law of the spirit of life in Christ. Paul says, 1st Tim. ii. 14. "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression," so that you need not undertake to shield Christ from a supposed condemnation that came through the man, and not the woman, for both parties were involved in the transgression. But there is no penal condemnation resting against Adam's descendants for his transgression, only as a consequence, or as we might say imputatively, in the sense of Abraham's faith being imputed to him for righteousness. Adam's race are only held penally accountable for their own transgression, Christ having lived holy, harmless and undefiled in the nature, or flesh that had sinned, and thus condemned sin (which is transgression of law) in the flesh, was under no condemnation, hence death had no right to dominion over him. His life was unforfeited, so he could lay it down and take it up again. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit, for the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus have made them free from the law of sin and death." Are they not still subject to death? And why? because of their natural mortality. Cut off from the tree of life in Adam.

But when Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory, when God will give us eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

R. D. WARINNER.

Several weeks ago we had a little item in our paper, in which it was stated that Mons. Leon Bouland, a distinguished French priest, had left the Romish priesthood, and was about to enter the Episcopal Church. He is now a member of the latter. In The Forum for July, a monthly magazine published in New York City, there is an able article from his pen, entitled, "Romanism and the Republic." He says,

"See the army of priests, bishops, arch-bishops, and cardinals, all thoroughly trained, and swearing implicit obedience—to the Constitution of the American republic? No. Swearing obedience, in all things temporal and spiritual, to an Italian pontiff who lives at Rome and issues his orders from a palace called the Vatican. Leo XIII. sits in the Vatican at Rome, and commands his army of priests and prelates in America and Ireland with as much absolute authority as any Cæsar commanded his loyal legions in their subjugation of the earth."

"Again, that there may be no seeming reflection upon the patriotism of the Roman Catholic priest as a man and as an American citizen, I am quite willing to believe that the great body of priests not only have no wish to interfere with the liberties of the American people, but really have no idea that the Roman Church can or ever will attempt to overthrow those liberties which are guaranteed by the Constitution of this republic. But these priests are under absolute masters. And the time may come when they shall receive orders to march against the freedom of the republic in which they were born, and which they love, but which must ever be subordinate to the Vatican—of Ultramontanism."

"The unrelenting opposition of the Roman Church to the public school system is in itself sufficient cause for alarm. The hate which this foreign power bears our public schools is not disguised."

He then quotes from Bp. Gilmour's writings: "'Nationalities must be subordinate to religion,' (meaning, of course, the Roman Catholic Church,) 'and we must learn that we are Catholics first and citizens next.'" He then quotes from "the late cardinal archbishop of New York," thus "'Catholics in this republic are as strongly devoted to the sustenance and maintenance of the temporal power of the Holy Father as Catholics in any other part of the world; and if it should be necessary to prove it by acts, they are ready to do so.'"

Mons. Bouland tells us the same story about the Papacy that is so well known to any who have read much of the history of the Papal power. I have not the slightest doubt that the Jesuits and the pope will make some tremendously audacious movement to regain the temporal power. They must do some great thing—commit one more great crime against humanity, in order to develop the hatred of the world, and of Italy in particular. Then, as surely as there is a God in Heaven so surely will there be the bloodiest revolution that has ever been witnessed by our already blood-deluged earth.

Rome has never repudiated her sinful rulers, and has never repented of her vast multitude of crimes. Millions of the helpless have been slain by her, and ere long she will have the same cup, filled double, pressed to her lips, and she will have to drink all its contents to the very last drop. The mutterings of the coming storm are heard across the Atlantic. Faint flashes of lightning illumine the horizon. Low, deep, rumbling thunders are heard. A little cloud has already appeared in the East. We know the storm of wrath is coming, and Great Babylon and her sins will come into remembrance before God and be avenged.—Herald of Life.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Wentlee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting to the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are exclaiming: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It explains the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it is as near ruling the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forcing its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of Infinite wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to carry success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

FIFTY YEARS

THE CHURCH OF ROME.

CHARLES CHINIQUY.

A handsome volume of 832 pages, printed in clear type, on fine tinted paper. It is bound in strong cloth, marbled edges, and gilt stamp on side and back. Contains two portraits (one representing him in priestly robes) of the author.

There is no book upon the Romish controversy so comprehensive as this. It is a complete picture of the inner workings, aims and objects of Popery. It is from the experience of a living witness, and challenges contradiction. It is a large but very valuable work, and is fast becoming a standard authority. Six editions were sold in one year, and large orders are being daily received for the present and 8th edition. The book commends itself to the American people, and laborers of liberty everywhere.

The book contains, among other startling revelations, thrilling chapters on, The Bible and the Priests of Rome; the Confession of Children; Festivities in a Parsonage; Protestant Children in Convents; the Trade in Masses; Rome and Education; the Miracles of Rome; Murders and Thefts in Quebec; Papinism and the Patriots; Perversion of Dr. Newman; Grand Dinner of the Priests; the Absolution of Auricular Confession; Some of the Thousand Acts of Folly and Idolatry which form the Life of a Monk; the Vow of Celibacy; the Impurities of the Theology of Rome.

We have secured a supply of this book, and can fill orders direct. If you wish to inform yourselves as to the inside working of Romanism, send us $2.25 and you will receive the book postpaid at once.

We can also furnish Mr. Chiniquy's other work, "The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional." A cloth bound book of 296 pages; price $1.00 postpaid.

Also "Romanism—the Danger Ahead," by A. J. Grover; contains 320 pages; cloth binding, 75 cts., postpaid.

The three ordered together we will send for $3.00.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. Dead PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPTEMBER 26, 1888. NO. 36.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS { One Year . . $2.00. Six Months . . 1.00. Three Months . .60.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 18.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE SEVENTH DAY.

Foreshadowed in type during the present age by the Sabbath day which the Jewish people or Israelites were strenuously commanded to observe, and rigidly keep sacred, in the law given for their observance,—and it is true that a Sabbath day has never been enjoined on any other people, or nation, save by their own legislative enactments,—is the cataclysmic ordeal through which the earth must pass at the close of the present age, and which must precede, in point of time, the advent of the Age to Come. This pause of creative energy, similar to that with which each age has closed and its successor introduced, is noted, as they also were, as a period of age inspection, and for the radical changes wrought in the physical aspect, as in the altered conditions of life on the globe. It will be remembered that the chaotic mass of the beginning of earth creative periods, has advanced by successive steps with the advance of the ages, from empty formlessness to its present geometric perfection of form. Type has succeeded type of living organisms, animal and vegetable, till, instead of the rhizopods of the eozoic as its superior fauna, and the oldhamia antiqua, of the lower silurian,—the oldest representative of the earth's known flora,—of the latter; after the reign of mollusks, and fishes, and reptiles, and birds, and placental mammals, and man,—the imperfect, erring type of a death-doomed race,—after the progressive advancement of the flora through its varied gradations from inedible, flowerless, fruitless seaweed to the present perfection of herbage, texture, fruit and flower of dicotyledonous plants and trees,—with, as has been said, a judgment time, for each gradation except the last, the earth awaits that event, and the changes in life-characteristics involved in, and peculiar to it as an event of the near future. It was a view of the mutations accompanying this judgment era that caused Paul to testify that "the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope; because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know," continues he, "that the whole creation (margin, every creature,) groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit: the redemption of our body," Rom. viii. 19–23.

Of this day the first record is as follows:—"And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made: And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made," Gen. ii. 2, 3. It is termed, in Bible language, "the day of judgment," "the day of the Lord," "the day of God," "great day of God Almighty," "the great day of his wrath," etc., and is invariably connected with scenic descriptions of earth throes and national and individual distress, such as is depicted by the following quotations, viz:

"For, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch. But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings: and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall. And ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under your feet in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of hosts," Mal. iv. 1–3.

"The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day. For the day of the Lord of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up: and he shall be brought low," etc., Isa. ii. 11, 12. "I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come," Joel ii. 30, 31. "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles; Prepare war, Wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near; let them come up; beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears: let the weak say, I am strong. Assemble yourselves, and come, all ye heathen, and gather yourselves together round about: thither cause thy mighty men to come down, O Lord Let the heathen be wakened, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat; for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about. Put in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe; come get you down; for the press is full, the fats overflow; for their wickedness is great. Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the earth shall shake; but the Lord will be the hope of his people," Jb. iv. 9–16.

"But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the things that are therein shall be burned up," 2 Peter iii. 10.

"When the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit in the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats. ....And these shall go away into everlasting punishment but the righteous into life eternal," Matt. xxv. 31. See also Zeph. i. 14–18; Ezek. xxxviii. 14 to 39; to end of the chapter.

The events recorded by John in the Apocalypse undoubtedly refer in part at least, to the same period and events. After describing the terrible engagement with which the age closes, and which results from his (the Lord's) assumption of regal power, as lawgiver over the nations of the earth, we read, —"And I saw thrones, and they sate on them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshiped the beast; neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands: and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished: Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years. And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp, of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever. And I saw a great white throne, and him that sate on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened, and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell (marg. the grave), delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the fire," Rev. xx. 4–14.

The language of this quotation evidently teaches a judgment upon the same class,—the same judgment in fact,—as that which is spoken of by the prophet Malachi, and shows further, the length of time occupied by the period denominated "The day of the Lord." Peter confirms this, also, when speaking of the same period thus, "But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day," 2 Pet. iii. 8.

As has been elsewhere remarked, the element of time is not taken into consideration by him, to whom all eternity, past and future, in all its vastness of duration, is ever present time. He who can see the end from the beginning needs to take no note of the time required for the accomplishment of a work, for "a thousand years in his (thy) sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night," Psa. xc. 4. Peter therefore explains to those of like precious faith that "the Lord is not slack concerning his promises as some men count slackness; but is long-suffering to us-ward; not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance," Ibid iii. 9.

Prominent among the events of that "Day" will be the personal return (parousia) of Christ to the earth, and the fulfillment of those prophecies relating thereto which remains unfulfilled during the present age as part of his life work. These will in part consist of—(a)....The resurrection of the saints from among the dead, to incorruption, the change of the living saints to immortality, and the rendering to both of these classes a reward for their obedience to the gospel of the kingdom of God in this age.

Proof....When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind; and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," Luke xiv. 13, 14. "Behold, I show you a mystery;—We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So, when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory," 1 Cor. xv. 51. "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all," etc. Jude 14, 15.

"And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be," Rev. xxii. 12.

"The kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him," Dan. vii. 27.

"He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: as vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I received of my Father," Rev. ii. 27, 28.

"Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us unto God by thy blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation: and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth," Rev. v. 9, 10.

The language of the Savior implies the same fact when he taught that "The meek are blessed for they shall inherit the earth," Matthew v. 15, and of Solomon, also, "Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner," Prov. xi. 31.

Further quotations are unnecessary to assure the verity of the facts premised.

(b)....The rebuilding of the city of Jerusalem on Mount Zion, and the national restoration of Israel,—the Jewish nation,—to their land, (Palestine), for an everlasting possession.

Proofs...."Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a blessing and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem and joy in her people: and the voice of weeping shall no more be heard in her, nor the voice of crying," Isa. lxv. 17.

"Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is the name whereby he shall be called, The Lord Our Righteousness," Jer. xxiii. 5, 6.

"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered; for in Mount Zion and Jerusalem shall be deliverance as the Lord hath said, and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call," Joel ii. 30. "Therefore, thus saith the Lord God; Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon all the whole house of Israel, and will be jealous for my holy name after that they have borne their shame, and all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me, when they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid. When I have brought them again from the people, and gathered them out of their enemies' lands and am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations; then shall they know that I am the Lord their God which caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen: but I have gathered them unto their own land: neither will I hide my face any more from them: for I have poured out my Spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord God," Ezek. xxxix. 25–29.

"For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness, (margin, hardness), in part, is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your (the Gentiles) sake, but as touching the election, they are beloved for the Father's sake. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance," Rom. xi 25–29.

"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not: behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For, I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," Matt. xxii. 37–39.

REMARKS ON CHRISTIANITY AND SCEPTICISM. No. 2.

From the numerous testimonies of men who have turned from scepticism to Christianity, there is no doubt but that almost all sceptics at times doubt their own unbelief, and have a fear and dread of what may be hereafter. There is implanted in the soul of every man by the great Creator that which gives unrest when his voice in the conscience is disregarded, and the Revelation he has given of his will is disbelieved. Many who have renounced their unbelief, and have experienced the joys of faith in the Son of God, have confessed to the misgivings which they were troubled with before they become believers.

Some writers of eminence, discarding divine revelation, and the gospel remedy for sin, have their hopes of future good on education, progress, and development; yet how many of this class when their natural strength has failed, have found their hearts also to fail, and their hopes to flee from them. Sometimes in moments of despondency they are driven, contrary to their creed, to utter a cry of distress in the ears of God, and turn for consolation to a religion which they had denounced as human and imperfect. This has been the case with many. We have read of one who devoted a long life to the study of natural science, literature, and art, and who became the most noted of his age and country for learning, and yet when passing away, his cry was "light! more light!" It is sad to leave the present state and enter the future with darkness ahead, with the mind full of uncertainty and unrest.

And many who live in professed unbelief, in open infidelity, were they honest, would have grave misgivings to confess. Such confessions, however, at times are made. They are made under circumstances when they little think that any use will be made of them, or that they will ever become public. An unbeliever, who was on terms of intimacy with Voltaire, and who spoke to him freely of his sceptical views, said to him in a letter, "I have succeeded in getting rid of the idea of hell." Voltaire's reply was, "Allow me to congratulate you; I am very far from that." The latter part of this short reply should be pondered by disbelievers in future punishment. There are doubtless many professed unbelievers in the doctrine who have not yet got rid of the idea of hell. Though many exaggerated, false, and God-dishonoring views have clustered around this doctrine, which we do well to reject, yet the doctrine of future retribution is a Scriptural doctrine, and should excite a wholesome fear upon the ungodly and the sinner.

Many, after perverting their reason, deny the reasonableness of the Christian religion. By choosing a sinful course, by creating and fostering a spirit of selfishness, they darken their understanding, and render themselves incapable of a righteous judgment. It is said of a very brilliant French writer, M. Edmond About, that "he has died as he lived, with his back against all beliefs, after having passed the greater part of his life in laughing at them, and presenting the melancholy spectacle of a man who dies in his pride, denying all that his intellect has not received."

Some of the most precious truths of Christianity can only be seen by the spiritual eye, can only be realized by the obedient heart. Some men of great intellect know less of the deep things of God than some children who have had a pious training and have been born from above. God's revelation to the spirit is higher than his revelation to the mind. He makes himself known more fully to a soul exercising a simple child-like faith and trust than to a soul seeking to have every statement of the Word demonstrated to his intellect. The spiritual faculty in some men is dormant; they hear not the voice of the Holy Spirit; they see not the beauties of holiness; they feel not the divine influences. By unbelief, by a stubborn will, by a disregard to the divine authority, by a love of self-pleasing, they put from them the power of spiritual discernment.

It cannot be denied, however, that the various unscriptural forms in which Christianity has been often presented, has had much to do in fostering a spirit of scepticism in the minds of many thinking men. Christianity has been preached—is still preached—in a form which savors of paganism, and the dark ages, and the schools of human learning; its simplicity and loveliness and beauty have been marred. The needs of the church, the needs of the world require not a dogmatic theology, but a pure, unadulterated gospel. Many have rejected the gospel because of the human form in which it has been offered. The true gospel has been hidden. But what folly it is to throw away the precious pearl—the pearl of untold worth—because it may sometimes be half buried amid things of no value. Let us learn to distinguish between the precious and the vile, between what is of God and what is of man.

He is engaged in a good and noble work who is endeavoring to separate from Christianity the false doctrines of men which for ages have been preached as a part of it. There are thousands who never see Christianity in its purity and loveliness as it is unfolded in the New Testament. They take their view of it from creeds and sermons, and though they may read the Scriptures, they read them in the light of the popular teaching, and so the truth in its simplicity and beauty is but partially seen. And the traditions and corruptions which disfigure Christianity, are the means of turning multitudes away from the truth. Spare no labor then in separating men's heresies from the Spirit's teachings, in dispelling the darkness that has gathered around the light. The labor on this line during the last thirty or forty years has not been without success. The success has been great and the blessing large in giving men truer and brighter views of God and the everlasting future.

But the inconsistencies of the life no less perhaps than the errors of the mind, have been a source of wide spread unbelief and rejection of the gospel of Christ. The short comings and inconsistencies of Christians are the food that sceptics live and fatten upon. If Christians had the spirit of Jesus, and their lives all round were in accord with the law of purity and the law of love, scepticism would have its main support taken away. It would be in a great measure silenced, or struck dumb.

REVEALED WISDOM vs. PROHIBITION WISDOM.

Solomon's Parables, Commonly Known as Solomon's Proverbs, Chap. xxii. 69-77, both inclusive (Septua.)- or Chap. xxxi. 1-9, both inclusive. C. V. and R. V.

69. These words were spoken to me by God's king, an oracular teaching with which his mother instructed him.

70. What, O child, shouldst thou watch to keep (eastern, watch)? What? God's oracular sayings. First-born one, I am addressing thee, O Son. What, O child of my womb? What, O child of my vows?

71. Give not thy wealth to women and thy mind and livelihood to inferior counsel.

72. With counsel do all things, with counsel be a wine-drinker. Men of ability are apt to be impetuous, and they should not drink wine.

73. Lest in drinking they ignore wisdom and be unable to judge the weak in an upright way.

74. Give drunkenness to those who are in sorrow, and the drinking of wine to those who are in woe.

75. That they may ignore their poverty and no longer remember their weary toil.

76. Open thy mouth with God's word and judge all in a healthful way.

77. Open thy mouth and judge justly and discriminate in favor of the needy and the weak.

PROHIBITION WISDOM.

Thou shalt not drink as a beverage anything that intoxicateth, nor shalt thou allow it to be sold in all thy boundaries, but thou shalt make the doing of these things or any of them a penal offense.

1. The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught him.

2. What my son? and what O son of my womb? and what O son of my vows?

3. Give not thy strength unto women, nor thy ways unto that which destroyeth kings.

4. It is not for kings, O Lemuel. It is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes to say, Where is strong drink?

5. Lest they drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any that is afflicted.

6. Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto the bitter in soul.

7. Let him drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more.

8. Open thy mouth for the dumb in the cause of all such as are left desolate.

9. Open thy mouth, judge righteously, and minister judgment to the poor and needy.

I have given the above translations so that any one can readily compare and see the omissions, insertions and perversions of thought, and furthermore so that prohibitionists can see how nearly their wisdom coincides with that of revelation. For this passage claims to be inspired and recites and emphasizes the claim. Moreover the principle herein asserted is the general principle running through the whole teaching of Scripture on this subject, namely the principle of the higher utility. It is a question of should, not shall. It is how can I best use my ability, not whether I may or may not do this or that. Read it, prohibitionists, and think it over again, lest you "become wise above that which hath been written."

How Land Was Bought in Spain.

Mrs. Emily Lopez Rodrigues, whose heroic work for Christ in Spain is widely known, sends this narrative to the Christian Herald:

"There is urgent need for a Gospel Hall in the busy market town of Figueras. A friend, lately travelling in Italy, most kindly wrote telling us to buy the land at once, adding, 'I will cover the cost.' Pastor Rodrigues lost not a moment in trying to secure it, but the lawyer would not credit the assurance that the money would shortly be sent, and refused to draw up the necessary document. The landlady, however, agreed to wait a couple of weeks. The Romanists at once seized the opportunity. Deputations from the Societies of St. Vincent de Paul and the Holy Cross, headed by the Rector of St. Peter's, the largest church here, called on the landlady, and urged that she must, on no account, be guilty of selling land for a Protestant capilla! At the same time they laid down the money, $2,000, for the site, and also $3,000 to purchase a house and garden adjoining, thus effectually shutting the Protestants out on each side. All we could do was to unite in prayer that the Lord would undertake for us, and for the honor of his cause. The triumph of the enemies of the truth seemed complete. But, contrary to all expectations, a far better site was immediately offered for sale. It is situated in a principal street in a central part of the town, having also the great advantage that it commands a back street, by which many who, like Nicodemus, lack courage may be able to enter the hall unobserved. Our only difficulty was that the price came to $1,250 more than we had in hand. This we laid before the Lord in prayer, and he graciously answered by inclining the hearts of his servants to come to the rescue. In addition to a former liberal donation of $500, a friend sent $1,000, and another most kindly sent $250. Thus the exact sum needed arrived just in time for the purchase to be made, which called forth our most heartfelt praise. All that now remains for us to do is to build the first permanent Gospel Hall in the province of Gerona. Since writing the above, we have heard, on reliable authority, that a priest belonging to a church quite near to our new site, said, 'I would gladly have given $5,000 to have prevented the Protestants buying that plot of land.' Last Sunday night as we were returning from the service, a man was seen hanging about our house armed with two long knives, and was fortunately arrested by the civic guards. We thank God for what we believe to have been a narrow escape."

Members and friends of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, are earnestly requested to attend the Fifth Annual Meeting which is to be convened in the "Church of the Second Advent," 12th and Dickenson Sts. Philadelphia, Pa., beginning Friday eve, Sept. 28, and closing Sunday eve, Sept. 30th. We expect to have a feast of good things. Good speakers will address the meetings. Those who intend to be present will please notify the Pastor of the Church, Elder C. C. Ramsay, 1609 South 11th St. Philadelphia, Pa., so that proper arrangements can be made for the accomodation of all visitors.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 26, 1888.

THERE seems to be no abatement in the ravages of the Yellow fever at the South. On Friday there were 118 new cases at Jacksonville, Fla. and on Sunday 113. Storms and hurricanes have been very destructive in the West Indies and in the State of Vera Cruz, Mexico.

WHILE it is quite probable that the contemplated National Conference will be held, as proposed by Brother G. F. Wurk, still, in all likelihood, the delegation may not be very large at this, the first meeting of the kind. We feel persuaded from indications, however, that the representation will be of that character to insure a good beginning in an important and a too long neglected work. A work well begun is already half done. Great and lasting enterprises have often commenced from very small beginnings. In union there is strength. Two even are better than one. Hence our Lord sent out the seventy two and two. We are in somewhat similar circumstances that the churches were in when that council was convened at Jerusalem of which we have the account given in Acts xv. As we have no apostles now, yet we do hope that the coming together of the elders and brethren may result, as that meeting did, in the instruction and confirmation of the whole brotherhood. Not the law, but the gospel, not man-made creeds, but the faith once for all delivered to the saints, not disorganized factions, but churches set in gospel order, are the imperative subjects for consideration in our times. Whether all our little churches can be represented by special delegates or not, we feel to prayerfully trust that God will bless those who may attend, and that great good may be the result of the meeting.

Communications.

NEW YORK, Sept. 20, 1888.

The call for a general conference, emanating from the church at Philadelphia, earnest and sincere as it evidently is, is worthy of most careful and prayerful consideration on the part of the brotherhood generally. Personally, I am not in a position to act with the Conference owing to the dissolution of the society that was my church home before my removal to my present place of residence, but I feel impelled to give my hearty approval to the movement, provided it is not an attempt to add another to the very long list of ecclesiastical bodies. It is my understanding that the object of the call is simply for the sake of co-operation, and not in any way to interfere with the congregational system of church government, or to discontinue the already existing conference organizations. The most ardent opponent of denominationalism certainly cannot object to a co-operative system to encourage and assist weak societies, promote Christian knowledge, build up the Christian graces, encourage worthy ministers of the Word, and guard against adventurers who, gifted with fluency of speech and readiness in argument, too easily obtain recognition as leaders and teachers even though void of the Christian graces, and sometimes of ordinary morality.

During the past five years I have traveled and preached extensively throughout the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia, and have perhaps had exceptional facilities for making observations; and as a result of my experiences, both in the east and in the west, I can say that if the believers in the coming and kingdom of Christ expect to exert any marked influence for good it is absolutely necessary that the present irregular, guerilla warfare be followed by some practical system of organization.

I have seen the seeds of truth sown, take root and spring up, but the infant societies thus formed, being left without care or assistance, have soon perished; and more harm than good has been the effect of the evangelizing work.

I have seen other societies degenerate into debating clubs, or arenas for the conflicts of theological gladiators, instead of growing in the grace and knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

I have in mind one apparently very prosperous church of several hundred members weakened by its sole dependance upon one man, and when that prop was removed its individual members, accustomed to deriving all their spiritual sustenance from one source, were powerless, and the splendid organization which with proper care, building up by that which every joint suppleth would have been a mighty power for good, wasted away.

Another society, owning a comfortable meeting house, with surroundings favorable for development, is now languishing for lack of proper pastoral aid. Other instances might be cited, but this is enough, and doubtless other workers can testify in the same direction.

Brooklyn and Indiana have responded to the call from Philadelphia, and appointed earnest and practical men to represent them as delegates. I hope to see responses from other points such as Cleveland and Chicago and the Conferences in Michigan and Iowa. What say you brothers McLauchlan, Reed, Woodward and Eychaner? I mention you because I know you all personally to be men of ability and influence. Will you exert your influence to further this effort to bring into closer relationship those scattered fragments of the household of faith who love the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ? Where there is a will there is a way.

One word more. This call emanates from Philadelphia—the City of Brotherly Love. If the conference is held there, and is animated by the principle suggested by the name, the blessing of the Lord to the Philadelphian church will follow its work. No work done with an eye single to the glory of God will fail. Amen.

SAMUEL WILSON.

Sunday Sept. 10th the Church of God in Cleveland elected Bro. Geo. Elton as a delegate to represent it at the General Conference of the Church. He will be ready when the time and place is announced. For the Church of God. P. NEILL, Sec.

The Church at Bracken, Ind., favors the holding of a National Conference as proposed by Bro. Work; and that Philadelphia be the place. That Dr. Charles W. Fry be the delegate to represent us at said conference. ETTIE FRY, Sec.

At a meeting of the members of the Blessed Hope Mission, Philadelphia, Pa., held this day; it was unanimously resolved "That this Church is in hearty accord with the plan of a general conference, as proposed by Elder Geo. Ramsay as our delegate to represent this Church at the conference, and request our Secretary to so certify to the Editor of THE RESTITUTION, and to Elder C. C. Ramsay.

CHAS. F. WARWICK, Sec.

I write in reference to the action of the Church at Rensselaer as to the proposed General Conference to be held at Philadelphia. The church have endorsed the movement and elected the undersigned as a delegate. The time of holding the Conference is left with yourself to fix, and the same will be satisfactory. Your Brother in Hope. J. H. WILLEY.

[Nov. 16, 1888, seems to be fixed upon as the time of holding the conference, and Philadelphia as the place. —ED. RES.]

The Church of the Blessed Hope, Brooklyn, N. Y., at a special meeting this evening Sept. 19. Geo. B. Kramer Pres., John Slater acting Sec., approved of the convention suggested by Bro. Geo. F. Work, and selected Philadelphia as the place and designated Nov. 18, as the time. Delegate will be selected soon.

GEORGE B KRAMER, Pastor.

Several inquiries having been made, I will state that it is not the idea, as we understand it, to exclude from representation at the proposed National Conference those churches where there are less than twenty members. Any organized church may send a delegate, but for economic reasons, it is suggested that rather than not be represented at all, small churches unite and send one delegate, bearing the expense jointly. The indications are good that in point of numbers this meeting will be a success.

A. R. UNDERWOOD.

To the Heirs of Glory, Greeting,

I often think of the scattered ones, the joint heirs with Jesus, kings in disguise, rich in faith and yet despised, mingling with the world and yet unknown, jewels within but appearing rough, hearts full of adoration and praise to God but no outward display, well-posted in God's word, but the world will not listen. They watch with eager eyes the sparkling rays of glory that guild the page of prophetic vision. And while the day begins to break, the sea and the waves roaring, men's hearts failing, and while the time of trouble is rolling on, they lift their heads and rejoice, knowing that glory is near, I take it for granted they have on the wedding garment, the righteousness of Christ, ready for translation.

O, the joyful sound, the trump of God, the raised, the living changed ever to be with the Lord, sit with him on his throne glorified together, dispensing blessings to the world, carrying out the promise to Abraham in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. Wonderful indeed is God great plan of the ages. Is it strange that such a people, with such prospects before them, should be full and running over with praise to God? If they should hold their peace the very stones would cry out. John in vision was a listener to one of the most wonderful meetings of these despised ones the earth ever witnessed. He says it sounded like mighty thunderings, while peals of adoration rent the very air, for the marriage of the Lamb had come and the wife was ready. So come Lord Jesus. W. S. FINN.

Dear Restitution:

Since my last report of labors, I have immersed two more into the all-saving name of Christ. It is to God belongs all the praise, glory and honor. I take none to myself. I have finished my work in Indiana for the present, and have commenced my work in Illinois. I have been employed to labor in northern Illinois for awhile, and the brethren in the State can address me at Lanark, Carroll Co., Ill. I expect, the Lord willing, to be here during the winter, or longer, so if the brethren in this State or Iowa want me to work for them they can let me know. There is much to do, and all that can, want to work till Jesus comes, and then be gathered home. Dear brethren, we all should try and help our dear Brother Chaplin. When I take into consideration his age and the labor he has to perform, I wonder how he can go through with it. Dear ones, let us all help him in our prayers that the dear Lord may give him strength to do the work. Our paper is a silent preacher that will go to many places that our ministers cannot reach. Let us sustain our paper, dear brethren. We all have a work to do, so let us do it with an eye single to the glory of God, and when our Master comes he can say, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

J. S. HATCH.

Dear Restitution:

Inclosed please find one dollar for which please send THE RESTITUTION six months. It is just one month today since I was baptized into the blessed hope of the kingdom and soon coming Lord, and I feel like expressing my gratitude through your columns that I was ever spared to embrace the truth of the gospel. I live in Warren, O., and there is not one of our faith in this town. It makes it very lonely. I cannot attend church, as we live about thirty miles from Salem which is the nearest place we have a church, but thank the Lord we have his blessed word which is a great comfort, for from its pages we have eternal promises, if we only keep the faith and prove true till the end, which, I think from the signs of the times, is not far distant. Now, dear brethren, I want you to pray for me, that I may prove faithful to the end. Very sincerely your loving sister in Jesus. MRS. E. A. PLATT.

Selections.

JOHN'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM. No. 5.

We have already directed your attention to the fact that the Papacy is a complex power, and requires complex symbols for its prefiguration. It is both a secular and an ecclesiastical power; and the ecclesiastical power has arrogated to itself the right to create the secular, or endow it with Divine authority, and has also wielded the energies of the secular power in pursuance of its own unholy ends.

Revelation xiii. represents both these organizations as "beasts." The one is represented as a ten-horned, the other is a two-horned beast. The former rises, as does each of the beasts of Daniel, from the sea; the latter rises from the earth. The one springs up in storm, the other in stillness. Striving and warring winds attend the birth of the one; the other grows up quietly from a low, terrestrial origin, like an ivy plant or a noxious, earth-born weed. The ten horns of the one are strong iron kingdoms; the two horns of the other are gentle and lamb-like. The two beasts stand side by side; they act together in everything. The earth-born beast is the "prophet." He compels subjection to the secular power, especially to its new head, that head which had been slain and healed. He establishes an idolatrous worship of that head, or a subjection to it as Divine in authority. He "exercises" all the power of the ten-horned beast in warfare against the servants of God. He works false miracles, and accomplishes lying wonders, and even brings down fire upon earth in imitation of the prophets of the Lord; that is, he causes judgments to descend on those who resist. He uses the instrument of excommunication, a weapon of celestial authority, and wields it with terrible effect. He lays kingdoms under interdicts, and nations under anathemas. He makes idolatry compulsory, delivering to the secular arm all who refuse to render it, that they may be put to death. He prohibits all dealings with so-called "heretics," all traffic and communion with them. He allows none to buy from them, and none to sell to them. He institutes the system which is now called "boycotting," a system of persecution which was freely wielded by the Popish priesthood in the middle ages, and is still employed, as we know, in certain Papal lands.

How could the mutual relations of the political and ecclesiastical powers in the apostate Roman empire be better represented than by these wonderful symbols? Here are a monarchy and a priesthood in close, nefarious association; the priesthood anoints the monarchy, serves it, uses it. Together they rule, and together they persecute. No symbol can represent everything, no parable can correspond in all respects with the reality it depicts. It is surely enough if the principal features and primary relations are exhibited in the symbol, or reflected by the parable. This is just what is done in the apocalyptic prophecy. Look at the facts. The Papacy has been a political power for more than a thousand years. The popes of Rome have been secular monarchs. They have possessed territories, levied taxes, laid down laws, owned armies, made wars. The Papal monarchy has been for ages an integral part of the Roman empire. The Papacy has also been a sacerdotal power, and is so still. While its temporal government has fallen, its spiritual remains. Further, the Papacy is served by an extensive sacerdotal organization, embracing about a thousand bishops and half a million of priests. This organization controls the convictions and actions of two hundred millions of persons, belonging to more than thirty nations. If the best symbol to represent the Roman empire with its rulers be a ten-horned beast, what better symbol to represent the Papal hierarchy than a two-horned beast, whose horns are like those of a lamb, while it has the voice of a dragon? And what better name for that hierarchy could be found than the "false prophet?" Does it not pretend to utter the messages of heaven? And as Moses and Elijah called down the fire of God's judgments on the enemies of Israel, has not this hierarchy brought down again and again, in the estimation of millions, the judgments of God on those who have resisted its will, whether individuals or nations? Has not this been one of its most tremendous and irresistible weapons? Read the history of the middle ages and of the sixteenth century. What nation in Europe has not been laid from time to time under Papal interdicts, and compelled by these means to submit to the decisions of the Roman pontiff? And has not the priesthood too been the author and instigator of a wholesale system of idolatry and persecution? Has it not employed the power of the State in enforcing idolatry, and cruelly persecuted to death millions of the faithful who would not bow the knee to the modern Baal? In all this history only too faithfully corresponds to prophecy. Deep calls to deep, and the utterances of inspiration are caught up and echoed by the experiences of generations. The voices of the prophets come back in thunder from the course of ages, and the proof that God has spoken reverberates throughout the world.

Having briefly considered John's prophecy concerning the rise and reign of the Papal power, we have now to glance at his prediction of its fall and overthrow. This you will find in Revelation xvii.-xix. We have not time to read these chapters now; you are doubtless familiar with them, and will do well to study them carefully and thoroughly. They contain the second complex or duplicate prophecy concerning Romanism—the career and judgment of "Babylon the Great."

In this prophecy John beholds the ten-horned beast representing the Roman empire bearing a mystical woman, dressed in purple and scarlet, decked with gold, precious stones, and pearls; a harlot, and the mother of harlots and abominations, the guilty paramour of kings, the cruel persecutor of saints; intoxicated, but not with wine—drunken with the blood of the saints and of the martyrs of Jesus. What a vision! what a prophecy!

You remember the angel's interpretation of this vision: "The woman which thou sawest is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth." We showed that that city was Rome, indisputably Rome. That Babylon the Great means Rome is admitted by Romanists themselves. Cardinal Bellarmine says that "Rome is signified in the Apocalypse by the name of Babylon." Cardinal Baronius admits that "all persons confess that Rome is denoted by the name of Babylon in the Apocalypse of John." Bossuet observes that "the features are so marked, that it is easy to decipher Rome under the figure of Babylon" (Rome sous la figure de Babylone). But, while admitting that Babylon the Great, seated on the seven hills, means Rome, Papal interpreters assert that it means heathen Rome, and not Christian Rome—the Rome of the Cæsars, and not that of the popes.

In reply to this, we answer, first, that the name upon the harlot's brow is "mystery," and that heathen Rome was no mystery. The true character of heathen Rome was never concealed. On the other hand, Christian Rome is a "Mystery;" it is not what it seems. In profession, it is Divine; in character, satanic.

We say, in the second place, that there is a marked and intentional contrast in the Apocalypse between the two cities Babylon and Jerusalem, which is overlooked by the Papal interpretation. Babylon, in the Apocalypse, is a city and a harlot; Jerusalem, in the same book, is a city and a bride. The former is the corrupt associate of earthly kings; the latter, the chaste bride of the heavenly King. But the latter is a Church; the former then is no mere heathen metropolis. The contrast is between Church and Church; the faithful Church and the apostate Church.

In the third place, we point to the fact that the judgment described in Revelation xviii. falls on Babylon when her sins had reached to heaven; that is, in the darkest part of her career. But when Alaric destroyed Rome in A. D. 410 that city had improved, it had become Christian; it was purified at that time from its pagan idolatries. Nor had it then sunk into the darkness of the Papacy. It was not in the fifth century that Rome reached the utmost height of her iniquity. The capture of the city by the soldiers of Alaric, when it was neither pagan nor Papal, could not have been the judgment here foretold.

In the fourth place, we point to the fact that the destruction of Babylon foretold in the Apocalypse is total and final; as a great "mill stone" she is plunged into the deep; there is no recovery. This cannot refer to the mere burning of Rome in A. D. 410, for that event was speedily followed by the complete restoration of the city. When the Babylon of Revelation xviii. falls the smoke of its burning goes up for ever; it is found no more at all.

In the fifth place, we point to the fact that the foretold destruction of Babylon is accomplished by the horns of governments which were previously subject to her rule. We freely admit that the Goths destroyed ancient Rome, but the Goths were not previously subject to Rome. The Gothic nations did not first submit to Rome obediently, and then cast her off, and rend, and trample, and destroy her. All this however these nations did in the case of Papal Rome. For centuries they were subject to her sway; then they cast her off. Look at the French Revolution; see the deeds of France. Look at Italy in 1870. See the Continent today.

In the sixth place, we point to the fact that the foretold destruction of Babylon is immediately to be followed by "the marriage of the Lamb." This is clearly foretold in Revelation xix. But the capture of Rome by Alaric was not followed by that event. Alaric captured Rome fifteen centuries ago, while the marriage of the Lamb is still future. This utterly excludes the notion that the destruction of Rome by Alaric is the judgment intended, and that Babylon the Great represents pagan Rome. And as Babylon the Great does not represent Rome pagan, it must represent Rome Papal: there is no other alternative.

Now, in conclusion, read this wonderful prophecy concerning "Babylon the Great" in the clear and all-revealing light of history. I ask those of you who have read the history of the last eighteen centuries, did not Rome Christian become a harlot? Did not Papal Rome ally itself with the kings of the earth? Did it not glorify itself to be as a queen, and call itself the Mistress of the World? Did it not ride upon the body of the beast, or fourth empire, and govern its actions for centuries? Did not Papal Rome array itself in purple and scarlet, and deck itself with gold and precious stones and pearls? Is not this its attire still? We appeal to facts. Go to the churches and see. Look at the priests; look at the cardinals; look at the popes; look at the purple robes they wear; look at their scarlet robes; see the encrusted jewels; look at the luxurious palaces in which they live; look at the eleven thousand halls and chambers in the Vatican, and the unbounded wealth and glory gathered there; look at the gorgeous spectacles in St. Peter's at Rome, casting even the magnificence of royalty into the shade. Go and see these things, or read the testimony of those who have seen them. Shamelessly Rome wears the very raiment, the very hues and colors, portrayed on the pages of inspired prophecy. You may know the harlot by her attire, as certainly as by the name upon her brow.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

(To be Continued.)

Mr. Haffendon says: "I know an American missionary who was sent to Burmah thirty years ago to make inquiries about the languages. He himself spoke Burmese, and travelled up the country for many hundred miles. One night he encamped near a small village. Here he heard prayer going on in Burmese. He listened, and to his utter astonishment heard, not the name of Buddha, or that of any idol, but the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. He was the more surprised, for he knew that no missionary or white man had ever been to that part of the world, and so he went into the village and began to make inquiries. He found out that the head-man of the village had some years previously been down to another village some miles distant, and had bought an article of food wrapped up in Burmese-printed paper, which happened to be one single chapter of the Word of God, with a piece torn out of the corner. He read it, and having himself sought to put sin away, he found that Savior which is the Son of God, and who he found was able to cleanse from sin. He now called his friends together, and read that piece of the Word of God to them, and induced them to put away their idols. And when this missionary found them, they had been for six years praying to Christ as the Savior of sinners. Thus is the blessing of God upon our work of spreading abroad simply and solely the Truth as in Jesus Christ."

Announcements.

The annual conference of the Church of God, for the Northwest, will meet at Scholl's Ferry, Oregon, commencing Friday evening, October 19, 1888, and holding over the following Sunday.

This being during the time for the "Mechanic's Fair" at Portland, those attending conference can take advantage of the reduced railroad fare at that time.

Teams will be at Portland to meet those from a distance. Please notify us if you wish to be met.

We hope to see all who attended last year and many more besides.

If we are among those whom the Lord, when he comes, shall find doing his will, happy shall we be. If meeting in conference and building each other up, and planning for the spread of the Gospel, is his will, happy indeed will we be in that day if we have done what we could in that direction. By order of Executive Committee.

W. W. JAQUITH, Sec.

Items Pertaining to Romanism.

According to La Croix, a daily French Roman Catholic newspaper, there will this month be an extraordinary emigration from Purgatory to Paradise. It says:—

"In virtue of the extraordinary power of the Keys, Leo XIII., prisoner, has resolved to extend the joys of his Jubilee to Purgatory, and on Sept. 27, the whole Church joining him, the Pope will go down to Peter's tomb, in order to shed the Divine blood over the expiatory flames. This mass, without parallel, that Peter, still living, announced to the Church universal, by an Encyclical dated Easter Day, will be the most solemn act ever performed by the Papacy for the deliverance of prisoners in Purgatory—slaves more cruelly tried than those of Africa... On September 27, heaven will be peopled by millions by Leo XIII."

"And if millions," asks Le Signal, "why not all, we would like to know? This is the Popery of the present day."

A measure which has recently passed the Chamber of Deputies after several days' discussion, by a large majority—345 votes to 67—secures for the Italians a degree of religious liberty they have never before possessed. The measure is in substance as follows:—"That if any minister of religion, by preaching or by writing, or by conversation, speaks against the king or the unity of Italy, or disturbs the minds and consciences of the people, he shall be liable to a fine, imprisonment, and dismissal from office." The measure is said to have shaken Pope Leo XIII. out of all his Jubilee felicitations. The press, excepting the clerical part of it, is full of jubilation, declaring that the people will ever remember the day when the Act was passed as one of the most glorious in the annals of their parliament.—Presbyterian Review.

A priest was converted through the confessional recently, as related in Evangelical Christendom. "An anxious penitent in a Spanish town confessed to a priest that she had been to a Protestant service. He questioned her closely, for his curiosity was greatly excited. She gave him a full account, and acknowledged that a great impression had been made on her mind. The impression communicated itself to him, and shortly after he requested his own sister to go to the nearest place where Protestants assembled, to listen, as with his ears, and under his responsibility, and to bring him full details of everything. Reluctantly she did so, but faithfully reported all. The priest was convinced that there were truths of which he was ignorant, entered into communication with the pastor, appointed a secret place for a prolonged interview, and found immediate peace in the finished work of Jesus. The secluded place in which he labors allows him comparative freedom of action: he preaches Jesus; all his parishioners have the New Testament; the children learn more of Christ than of ceremonies; and confessions are stopped short, and belief in the full satisfaction wrought by the Lord Jesus is substituted for penance."

Everything goes to rebuke the confidence with which skeptics wrote a few years ago concerning references to Egypt and Canaan in the early books of the Bible. The facts mentioned in Scripture were treated as unsubstantial myths of an illiterate age. In The Contemporary Review of August, Professor Sayce refers to "the great event of the season"—the discovery in Upper Egypt of letters and despatches sent by the governors and kings of Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Babylon to Egyptian monarchs. Evidences of this active literary intercourse go back to the date of the Exodus. Henceforth, instead of regarding the period of Joseph as fabulous, it is evident that schools of literature then existed; and Professor Sayce avers that the discoveries are likely to have most important bearings upon the criticism of the Pentateuch.

MISSIONARY FUND.

Free will donations are solicited for the purpose of sending papers to the poor, and supplying books and papers to ministers workers, in this and other lands. We do not want, and will not accept a penny for a "sinking Fund," but every cent placed in our hands will go as the donor would have it, to further the cause of the blessed Master.

THE LOST CHORD.

Seated one day at the organ,
I was weary and ill at ease,
And my fingers wandered idly
Over the noisy keys;
I know not what I was playing,
Or what I was dreaming then;
But I struck one chord of music,
Like the sound of a great Amen.
It flooded the crimson twilight,
Like the close of an angel's psalm;
And it lay on my fever'd spirit
With a touch of infinite calm.
It quieted pain and sorrow,
Like love overcoming strife;
It seem'd the harmonious echo
From our discordant life.
It link'd all perplexed meanings
Into one perfect peace,
And trembled away into silence
As if it were loath to cease.
I have sought, but I seek it vainly,
That one lost chord divine,
Which came from the soul of the organ,
And entered into mine;
It may be that some bright angel
Will speak in that chord again;
It may be that only in heaven
I shall hear that grand Amen.

EVIDENCES OF A DEITY.—Part 2.

I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God besides me; I girded thee, though thou hast not known me; that they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west that there is none besides me. I am the Lord, and there is none else. Isa. xlv. 5, 6.

Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the Lord he is God in heaven above and upon the earth beneath: there is none else. Deut. iv. 39.

In the whole range of two-lobed seeds of trees, plants and cereals, there is a perfect oneness of formation; a correspondence in their nutrition; a nicety and uniformity in the adaptation of every part to its special function, for the protection, germination, nutrition and growth of the young plant; an equipoise in the material stored away within the cotyledons, and in the chemical processes involved for the well-being of the embryo, and such a mathematical precision as to the amount required to carry it to the stage of independent plant existence, that the mind of the careful, candid observer will be led from its contemplation to the one Great First Cause who arranged their different parts, functions, activities and necessities according to one general, harmonious plan.

Is it not passing strange, too, that mixed and commingled in the soil, mistakes never occur? and that disharmonies are seldom found?

The acorn never yields aught but the oak tree. The bean is a signal failure if any other plant is expected from its germ. The apple, peach and plum only yield their own fruits respectively, and their own respective seeds of fruits.

The Lord Jesus Christ must have added somewhat of botany to his other various accomplishments, for, in one place he remarked "every tree is known by his own fruit. Nor of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes." Luke vi. 44. The infidel-despised, derided, and much-mistaken Moses, knew of the fixedness of type in plant germs, and the unequivocal law of plant growth, since he bare record that, "God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree bearing fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself upon the earth: and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind, and God saw that it was good." Gen. i. 11, 12. Of one fact we are all well assured: Moses was not mistaken as to each seed representing only its own type of plant.

May not the remainder of the language be equally true? Is it not even more than probable that he recorded the facts as he learned them, and was satisfied they were really facts?

When plant growth has begun, one part of the germ pushes deeper into the ground and throws out its delicate subdivisions (tendrils), each tipped at the extremity with little sponge-like bodies, through which food and drink —the elements essential to its increase in bulk, and peculiar properties—are furnished, when the lobes are no longer capable of affording it sufficient nourishment; and, another is forced upward through the soil, subdivided according to the necessities of the plant, herb, or tree, and crowned with foliage, by means of which respiration (the act of breathing), is performed. Plants and vegetables, as before stated, have the ability to decompose carbonic acid, and this gas is universally present in the atmosphere, and is noxious to animal life. Animal expiration is largely composed of this gas, while oxygen is inhaled, and retained by respiration. Plant substance is principally composed of the carbon from this acid, assimilated through plant-respiration, while the plant having no use for the excess of oxygen, of which carbonic acid is formed, exhales it into the atmosphere, freed from its poisonous portage, carbon, and thus the air is kept pure for air-breathing animals by plant life.

The circulation of plants is effected by means of minute tubes laying parallel to each other, and running from spongiole to leaf, through every rootlet, tendril and branch; and these little tubes numerically increase from the period of germination, till the death of the plant, or tree.

From whence the ability of each separate plant to choose the exact materials requisite for its health, perfection and individual properties?

From what source is procured the exact counterpoise between plant assimilation and plant-growth, or, between the root attachment and its need of support?

Under whose tuition does the radical search for, and penetrate into the ground, for root attachment, and by what instinct does the upright stalk search for light and the open air?

Are the delicate processes of assimilation, growth, flowers, fruitage and wood formation, only chance properties accidentally derived?

By whose agency were the endosmotic and exosmotic energies of the plants exactly balanced to effect the accumulation of those principles required by the vegetable economy for growth, respiration and exhalation, precisely as needed by each plant?

Is there not a manifestation of intelligence and intellect, in the production of these varied functions, and energies, and adaptations; and in the law of vegetable life, far beyond anything the finite mind can comprehend? Shall we deny their author simply because we cannot comprehend him? If not, by what name shall that supreme mental ability be known and designated among us?

Many look out upon the landscape and note the profusion of grass, plant, shrub, herb and tree, in all the variations of bud, and leaf, and bloom, and ripening fruit, repeated year after year, but fail to estimate the vastness of a law controlling such immense results,—much less the Great First Cause from which it and they emanated; even denying the existence of such a Being, of such an Ability, and strive to evolve them all from chaotic matter, by natural processes alone; or through chance, or accident, unaided by mentality, and name the routine by which their conclusions are reached, Reason.

Reason leads from effect to producing cause, and not to blind chance, or accidental beginnings.

The evolutions, manifestations and adaptations of animal life are yet more surprising than are those of chemical affinities, or of the vegetable economy. Anatomists have described the various parts, organs, solids, fluids and tissues of the human body, while works on comparative anatomy leave few of the lower orders of animals undescribed in joint, member and limb, and physiologists have delineated the relation of parts, and their respective processes and powers, as well as the occult progress of final decay, so fully that reference to their several works unfolds all the wonderful mechanism of the animal kingdom and the diversified uses of each portion of the body.

Able men, men learned to the full extent of scientific advancement, have devoted the best energies of an active life to the study of the animal economy, yet, how little is actually known of the law, or laws, of propagation, and hygiene, may be inferred by a perusal of the current literature of the day. Let the works extant on these various departments of the animal kingdom suffice for the interests of scientific research, while we seek for a few of the evidences of design in the mutual relations of the parts, their adaptation, and their fitness for association with objects in the material world.

The animal kingdom naturally divides into seven different types from which all the subdivisions of genera and species have sprung, to-wit: Protozoans, Mollusks, Radiates, Articulates, and the Vertebrates, composed of Fish, Birds and Mammals, yet one law of development and growth pervades the whole; one law of increase, existence and decay is universal. Obedience thereto is essential to continued existence and well-being; disobedience insures dissolution and destruction.

Contemplate the harmonious arrangement of organs and members in the body: the eye for sight, arranged with perfection of coating for protection, with completeness of lenses, humors and curtain to control the admission of light to the sensitive background of its interior, and with the whole apparatus automatically lubricated, and controlled by the muscles and nerves exactly adapted to that end; the ear for hearing, a delicate tympanum so arranged as to collect and discriminate between sounds with exactness and precision; the hands for touch and prehension; the feet for locomotion; the nose for smelling and the tongue for tasting. Each organ adapted to its own peculiar function and for nothing else.

Consider the diversified phenomena of brain power, as exhibited in thought, reason, judgment, vital force and the wonders of unconscious cerebration, or the curiosities of cerebro-spinal manifestations, controlling as it does, by its supply of nervous energy, all the voluntary and involuntary activities of the animal organization; or the untiring faithfulness of that powerful engine, the heart, which like a hydraulic ram, neither flagging nor wearing out until the vitality that renders it contractile is exhausted, forces the blood through the most remote and minute ramifications of the capillaries no less certainly than through large arterial trunks of the circulatory system, from the embryotic beginning of foetal life to the finality of old age; or the depurating offices of the liver, and kidneys, without which the system would almost immediately succumb to poisons generated within itself; or of the lungs and the skin, so beautifully complex both in structure and function; the former built up of almost microscopic ramifications of the bronchiæ, each surrounded by minute arterial and venous loops, and each lined with a delicate mucous membrane, through which the endosmotic and exosmotic exchange of carbonic acid gas, deleterious to animal life, is exchanged for oxygen, with its purifying, stimulating, blood-cleansing offices; the latter self-producing, self-lubricating,—a net-work of arterial and venous capillaries, and nerve filaments, with hair, sweat and unctuous glands, covered in its entirety with an almost transparent, invisible coating for the protection of the underlying parenchyma from injury.

Who can fail to see intelligent design in the adaptation of the eye to the reception of the rays of light, or, in determining size, color, distance, etc., or of the ear in discriminating sounds; of the hands for their varied uses, or of the feet, in standing, walking, leaping, running, etc., or of their conformation to the habits and necessities of the animal, whatever its rank or position in the scale of animate nature? There is no disarrangement of these important factors of individual existence, but exact counterpoise of organ development with the characteristics of its possessor throughout all the genera of earth's inhabitants.

Is it merely the result of accident unaided by intellect that the coats, humors, lenses and retina of the eye are uniformly arranged to co-operate for perfect vision?

Who will demonstrate that the animal economy might as well be devoid of the controlling influence of the brain, spinal cord and the vast network of nerves and nerve filaments, as to be under their normal control?

From whence emanated this complex arrangement of conducting media, —afferent and efferent, — through which every impression is instantly conveyed to the brain, and by means of which, (on the same line of communication) the will of the individual answers the call, directing each organ and member of the body as to its duty in the premises, and enforcing instantaneous obedience.

Has all this been arranged by chance? Is it a result of accident? Is it the nature of matter, divorced from intellect, to assume these forms and activities, automatically? Or, does the whole scheme show forth the supervision of an intelligence, a vis a tergo, so superior to our own as to be incomprehensible by our finite minds?

We may readily see how and why the softened mass of clay in the potter's hands, and on his wheel assumes the desired form; and his productions inform us of the leading thought of his mind as manifested in the article manufactured. So, too, in all the works of art we may trace the idea embodied in the product to the thoughtful source from which it emanated: the wheel to the wheelwright, the web to the weaver, the complexity of the automatic engine to the highly cultured mind, hand and eye. In viewing the wonderful adaptations, powers, relations and properties of the animal organism, either as seen in man, or in his contemporaries, why should we refuse to seek after the Great First Cause by whom, and through whose massive intellect all these otherwise unaccountable properties and powers were originally produced, and by which they are still sustained and propagated?

What name shall be applied by us to designate our conceptions of such a powerful Intelligence?

To the ancient Jewish race he was known as God, and the Gentile world have borrowed the word to express their idea of the One Supreme Creator, Disposer, Protector and Ruler of the Universe, and all that pertains thereto.

He correlates matter and force according to the promptings of his infinite wisdom, for the production of intelligences, adaptations and ends, even as the potter fashions the lump of clay to suit his pleasure and convenience.

He conserves the activities of the Universe in obedience to his will and purpose, without the concurrence or assent of any individual, yet so as to produce harmony and definite results.

He founds laws on these correlations, affinities and conservations, for the well-being (or removal), of everything in the vast assemblage of worlds, from the molecule of microscopic matter to the magnitude and importance of the central luminary of the planetary system and its satellites, which laws remain unchanged so long as these relations are enforced.

In the world of general physics, the laws by which matter is controlled, have been largely investigated and the same Intelligent Design pervades the whole. Light, heat, magnetism, sound, electricity, preponderance,—everything under the domain of fixed and invariable laws, is so intelligently ordained and enforced as to excite more and more, the wonder and admiration of the learner as he proceeds to investigate them.

Shall we say these laws were the outgrowth of chance, or accident undirected by a superior mind?

Since these laws are all definitely related to the objects involved, and are arranged and balanced with mathematical nicety and precision, are we not fully justified in tracing their origin to the same source as were those of the animal economy, to-wit, to the only true God of Jewish and Gentile worship?

With his clear understanding of the relation of all things created to their Creator, shall we wonder that Paul was led to exclaim, "O, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?" Rom. xi. 33, 34. "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelling not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with man's hands as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things." Rom. xvii. 24, 25. Neither is it surprising that David should have concluded that "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

If we willingly consent to look for the evidences of Design in the world of nature, and, through the evidences thus afforded to the Omniscient and Omnipotent attributes of him by whom all things consist, the field of observation is an unlimited one, and these evidences and assurances will become clearer and stronger as we look more and more carefully into the habits, adaptations and laws of the Universe, and of its component factors.

Reason as we may on cause and effect, on the evolutions of matter, and on natural law, there is still a vis a tergo,—a power beyond,—that to us stands as the inimitable, incomprehensible Great First Cause; and this Great First Cause is that which the true Christian worships as the God of Revelation, and the Creator of the world.

To his great name and infinite power be glory and honor and dominion, through the age of all the ages. Amen. J. K. THOMPSON.

MISSING!!

"You don't say so! Where on earth has she gone?"

"I can't say, sir, but it's plain enough she is missing. Hasn't been seen since last night when she went up to her room."

I was put out; I own; my man on waking me had informed me that the sock was missing; she had gone to bed without anything being noticed amiss, and was now nowhere to be found. She was always an odd woman, but a capital sock. What had become of her? The very last sort of a person to disappear in this way—a respectable elderly Scotch woman—really quite a treasure in the country, and the more I thought of it while I dressed, the more puzzled I became. I hardly liked to send for the police; and then again it was awkward, very—people coming to dinner that day, it was really too bad.

But I had scarcely finished dressing, when in rushed my man again. I do so dislike people being excited, and he was more than excited.

"Please, Sir, Mr. Vend has come around to see you; his coachman is gone, went off in the night, and hasn't left a trace behind, and they say the gardener's boy is with him.

"Well," said I, "it is extraordinary; tell Mr. Vend I'm coming; stay, I'll go at once."

It was really past belief, the three of them! After an hour's talk with Vend, no explanation offered itself, so we decided to go to town as usual.

We walked down to the station, and saw at once something was wrong. Old Weeks, the station master, was quite upset, his policeman was missing, and the one porter had to take up his duty. However, the train coming up, we had no time to question him, but jumped in. There were three other people in the compartment, and really I thought I was going off my head when I heard what they were discussing. Vend, too, didn't seem to know if he was on his head or his heels. It was this that startled us so: "What can have become of them all?"

I heard no more. I really believe I swooned; but at the next station—a large one—we saw consternation on every face. I pinched myself to see if I were dreaming. I tried to persuade myself I was. Vend looked ghastly. A passenger got in; he did not look quite as dazed as some did, but savage and cross. For a time none spoke; at last some one said aloud—I don't think he expected an answer—"What on earth's become of them?" and the cross-looking man, who had got in last, growled out "That's the worst of it; they are not on earth, they are gone. My boy always said it would be so; from the very first moment I heard it, I knew what had happened; often has he warned me. I still have his voice ringing in my ears.

"'I tell you in that night there shall be two men sleeping in one bed, the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left.'" Luke xvii. 34.

"I know only too well that 'that night' was last night. I've often prayed for it without thinking, and so I daresay have you, 'Thy kingdom come.' It makes me so savage I don't know what to do."

Now I was an atheist, and did not believe the Bible. For the last forty years (I am past fifty) I had stuck to my opinions, and when I heard men talk religious trash, I invariably chaffed.

But this seemed altogether different. I tell you, for a thousand pounds I couldn't have said a word. I just hoped it would all turn out a dream; but the further we went, the more certain it became that we were all awake, and that by some unaccountable visitation of Providence, a number of people had suddenly disappeared in the night.

The whole of society was unhinged; everybody had to do somebody else's work. For instance, at the terminus, a porter had been put into Smith's stall, as the usual man was missing. Cabs were not scarce, but some of those who drove them seemed unlicensed and new to their work. The cutters in some of the shops were up, and on getting to my bank I heard the keys had only just been found.

Everyone was silent and afraid lest some great misfortune was coming. I noticed we all seemed to mistrust one another; and yet as each fresh clerk, turning up late, entered the counting-room, a low jeer went round. The chief cashier, as I expected, did not come. The newspapers no one cared to look at; there seems a tacit opinion that they could tell us nothing.

Business was at a stand-still. I saw that very soon. I hoped as the day wore on it would revive, but it did not. The clerks went off without asking my permission, and I was left alone. I felt I hated them. I did not know what to do. I could not well leave, else they might say the bank had stopped payment, and yet I felt I could not stay there. Business seemed to have lost its interest, and money its value. I put up the shutters myself, and at once noticed what a change had come over the city while I had been at the bank. Then all were trying to fill the void places; now it seemed as if the attempt had failed. In the city some streets had that dismal Sunday appearance, while a few houses had been broken into; but in the main thoroughfares there was a dense mass of people, hurrying, it struck me, they knew not where. Some seemed dazed, others almost mad with terror. At the stations confusion reigned, and I heard there had been some terrible accidents. I went into my club, but the waiters had gone off without leave, and one had to help oneself. As evening came on, I saw the lurid reflection of several fires, but horrible to say, no one seemed to mind, and I felt myself that if the whole of London were burnt, and I with it, I should not care. For the first time in my life I no longer feared death; I rather looked on him as a friend.

As the gas was not lit, and darkness came down upon us, one heard cries and groans. I tried to light the gas, but it was not turned on. I remembered there was a taper in the writing-room, so went and lit it; but of course it did not last long. I groped my way into the dining-room, and helped myself to some wine, but I could not feed much, and what I took seemed to have no effect; and when I heard voices they fell on me as if I were in a dream. They were talking of the Bible though, and it now seemed the one book worth thinking of, yet in our vast club-library I doubt if I should have found a single copy.

One said: "What haunts me are the words 'Watch, therefore.' You can't watch now."

And another answered, "I have ringing in my ears, 'Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation,' and, of course, it isn't now, far from it!"

"The summer is past, the harvest is ended, and I am not saved," said a third. And then the first one said, "Yes, it used to be: 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'"

How the phrase "used to be" sank into my heart. I'd have given anything to have had a talk with my old cook. I thought of my dinner-party. Little had I imagined a week ago, when I issued the invitations, how I should be passing the hour.

Suddenly I remembered the secretary had been a religious fanatic, and I made my way slowly to his room, knocking over a table, in my passage, with glasses on it. It fell with a crash, which sounded through the house, but no one noticed it. By the aid of a match I saw candles on his writing table and lit them. Yes! as I thought, there was his Bible. It was open, as if he had been reading it when called away, and another book I had never seen before lay alongside of it—a sort of index.

The Bible was open at Proverbs, and these verses, being marked, caught my eye:—

"Because I have called and ye refused, I have stretched out my hand and no man regarded; I will also laugh at your calamity: I will mock when your fear cometh."

I had never thought before of God laughing—of God mocking. I had [illegible] laughing had ended now—I saw that pretty plain.

I had a hazy recollection of a verse that spoke of men wanting the rocks to fall on them: so looked it up in the index. Yes, there was the word "Rock," and some of the passages were marked with a pencil. One was Deut. xxxii. 15. "He forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of our Salvation."

Perhaps he marked that passage after he had a talk with me. I once told him, I remember, that "His God was a myth, and time would prove it;" and he answered, "Never." "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My word shall not pass away, he may come to-night." I laughed, and said, "What odds will you take? I will lay you long ones." Another passage marked was, 2 Samuel ii. 2: "Neither is there any God like our God;" and lower down still: "Man who built his house upon a rock."

I had no need to look that out; I knew what it referred to. And then my eye caught Matthew xvii. 51—"The earth did quake, and the rocks rent." That was when Christ died—to save sinners, died to save me—and yet I had striven against him all my life. I could not bear to read more. I shut the book and got up. There were some texts hanging over the fireplace:

"Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out," Acts iii. 19.

"The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." 1 John, i. 7.

"Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation," 2 Cor. vi. 2.

As I turned to leave the room these caught my eye, and I said: "Well, I have been a fool."—Watchword.

Immortality, Science, and Revelation.

The question has probably occurred to every thinking mind, Are there any facts in the possession of modern science which support a belief in the natural immortality of the human soul? The opinions of a few prominent scientific men in regard to this inquiry may be of interest to the reader.

Chas. A. Young, LL. D., Professor of Astronomy in Princeton College, N. J., says:—

I think it must be frankly admitted that [illegible] about the functions of the brain and nervous system does, to a certain extent, tend to make it difficult to believe in the immortality of the personal consciousness. The apparent dependence of this consciousness upon the health and integrity of a material structure, like the brain, renders it, a priori, more or less probable that consciousness could not survive the destruction of that organism. In my judgment, the knowledge of life and immortality comes only by revelation, like our knowledge of the moral character and attributes of God.

Joseph Leidy, M. D., LL. D., Prof. of Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania, says:—

Personal consciousness is observed as a condition of each and every living animal, ranging from microscopic to man. The condition is observed to cease with death; and I know of no facts of modern science which make it otherwise than difficult to believe in the persistence of that condition; that is, the immortality of the personal existence. Science has learned no more than has been expressed by Solomon in Eccl. iii. 19: "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts;.....as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence over a beast."

Simon Newcomb, LL. D., Washington, D. C., says:—

If man, as now constituted, is only the last in a series of forms of organic existence, starting from the lowest; and if consciousness itself has been a gradual development, akin to that of awaking slowly and gradually from a profound sleep, then it seems difficult to assign any link in the series at which we can suppose so great a break to have occurred as is implied in the passage from mortality to immortality.

Lester F. Ward, A. M., Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C., says:—

The consciousness, when scientifically examined, reveals itself as a quality of brain, or mode of manifestation of the molecular activities of the organized brain substance. It is a universal induction of science that modification of brain is accompanied by modification of consciousness, and the destruction of brain results in destruction of consciousness. It follows that, so far as science can speak on the subject, the consciousness persists as long as the organized brain, and no longer.

Edward S. Morse, Ph. D., Salem, Mass. says:—

I have never yet seen anything in the discoveries of science which would in the slightest degree support or strengthen a belief in immortality.

[illegible] thinks the arguments from the facts of modern science are rather contrary than favorable to the doctrine of immortality. Alfred R. Wallace, LL. D., affirms that, outside of modern spiritualism, he knows of nothing in recognized science to support the belief in immortality. Asaph Hall, LL. D., thinks that science does not give a positive answer to questions concerning the immortality of the human soul.

Herbert Spencer, four years ago, assured Rev. M. J. Savage, that he was not aware of any scientific facts that he could regard as satisfactory proof of the immortality of the soul. Prof. Edward C. Pickering, Harvard College Observatory, is of the opinion that the belief of a scientific man, like that of any one else, must be based entirely on faith. Alexander Graham Bell says that he can find nothing in science to support the hypothesis of personal consciousness without a body.

F. A. P. Barnard, S. T. D., LL. D., Pres. of Columbia College, N. J., says that the only basis of our faith in immortality must be found in revelation.

Science and revelation agree that man is mortal, Job. iv. 17, but revelation does not leave the human race in the Valley of Despair, but sets before them the Mountain of Hope, on whose summit is the Tree of Life. Immortality can be secured by a life of obedience through Christ, 2 Tim. i. 10. It is something for which we must earnestly seek, if we would obtain it, Rom. ii. 7. Death is not an eternal sleep. Those who live righteous lives will receive the gift of immortality when Christ comes to redeem his people from the power of sin and the grave, 1 Cor. xv. 54.

Of little value would be this life, if it embraced no grand possibilities. Momentous and important are the hours of mortal existence, for by the right use of them we may obtain an immortal inheritance. Glorious hope! Wonderful promise! Life unending, with no mixture of sorrow and no trace of pain! The great plan of God not thwarted by Satan, but consummated, in Eden restored and man redeemed! Thank God for the light of revelation! —Elias H Morton, in Advent Review and Sabbath Herald.

IF WE KNEW.

If we knew when walking thoughtless
Through the crowded, noisy way,
That some pearl of wondrous whiteness
Close beside our pathway lay;
We would pause when now we hasten,
We would often look around,
Lest uncareless feet should trample
Some rare jewel in the ground.

If we knew what forms were fainting
For the shade that we should bring,
If we knew what lips were parching
For the water we should bring,
We would work with eager footsteps,
We would work with willing hands,
Bearing cups of cooling water,
Planting rows of shading palms.

If we knew when friends' kind accents
Closely press to say, "Good bye,"
Which among the lips that kiss us,
First should 'utter the dreary lie;
We would clasp our arms around them,
Looking on their tear-such our tears;
Tender words of love eternal
We would whisper in their ears.

If we knew what lives were darkened
By some thoughtless word of ours,
Which had cast a pall among them
Like the frost among the flowers;
Oh! with what sincere repentance,
With what anguish of regret,
While our eyes were overflowing,
Would we cry—forgive—forgive!

If we knew—alas, and do we Ever care or seek to know,
Who their bitter berbs of sorrow
In our neighbour's garden sow?
God forgive us, lest hereafter,
Our hearts break to hear him say,
"I careless child I never knew you,
From my presence flee away."

The Mocking-Bird.

The mocking bird is called our American nightingale, because of its qualities as a songster, and of its nightsinging; but very few of us are qualified to judge of the aptness of the comparison, for not many of us have heard the nightingale, and not all of us have heard the mocking-bird at his best. It is said that not only is the song of the caged bird inferior to that of the free singer, but that the song of such as may sometimes visit the northern climes during the summer season, bears faint likeness to this melody as it is poured forth in their native haunts.

North of the Delaware the mocking-bird is rarely seen, while further south it may be found at all seasons. In the West Indies and some of our Southern States, the groves are resonant with the music of their exquisite song.

The bird as it [illegible] and will copy the notes of now one bird and now another with such exactness that it is often difficult for even the most practised ear to detect the deception. There is one bird, however, which it never tries to imitate, the bobolink. It will also reproduce other sounds and cries, passing so rapidly from one to another, that a medly is produced as ludicrous as it is incomparable.

The best known species of mocking-bird is about the size of a song thrush, of which they are sometimes considered a sort of alien connection, their tails are a little longer, their wings a little shorter, and the upper parts of the bird are of a dark brownish ash color, wings and tail darker, while the under part is of a brownish white.

When the bird is singing it seems to be full of joyous enthusiastic movement, spreading its wings, throwing itself about, expanding its tail, and apparently enjoying the abandon of a genuine music loving genius.

The mocking bird has a fashion of rising as it sings, at times with what is called it "mounting song." It will begin to warble perhaps on a low branch of a tree, and as the singer grows more enthusiastic, the melody becomes fuller and the singer rises to the topmost branch of the tree, or high in the air above, whence he pours forth the culmination of his musical inspiration. But no one can have discovered the last possibility of the mocking-bird's voice until he has heard the "drooping song." This, we are told by Mr. Maurice Thompson, he heard four times, and he describes it with an appreciativeness that would be impossible to one who was not both a bird and music lover.

At first he noticed the bird sitting about and singing in a broken, desultory way; then, suddenly, it "leaped like a flash to the highest spray of the tree, and began to flutter in a trembling, peculiar way, with its wings half spread and its feathers puffed out. Almost immediately there came a strange, gurgling series of notes, liquid and sweet, that seemed to express utter rapture. Then the bird dropped with a backward motion from the spray, and began to fall slowly and [illegible] In progress was quite like that of a bird wounded to death by a shot, clinging here and there to a twig, quivering and weakly striking with its wings as it fell, but all the time it was pouring forth the most exquisite gushes and trills of song, not at all like its usual melody of improvised imitations, but strikingly, almost startlingly, individual and unique. The bird appeared to be dying of an ecstasy of musical inspiration. The lower it fell the louder and more rapturous became its voice, until the song ended on the ground in a burst of incomparable vocal power. It remained for a short time after its song was ended, crouching where it had fallen, with its wings outspread, quivering and panting as if utterly exhausted; then it leaped boldly into the air and flew away into an adjacent thicket."—Mary Ferguson, in New York Observer.

To the Churches of God in the United States and Canada and Sister Churches Affiliating with them, by Whatsoever Name they may be Called:—Greeting.

"The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light."

An anxious retrospect by many thoughtful members of the Church, reveals the fact that during the last twenty years, Churches, some large, some small, have been formed, existed for a brief period and then gone out of existence; that in other cases Churches would have been formed, but for the fact that the evangelist has been driven away from the field with his work half completed, because there was no aid rendered him, and his family necessities required him to abandon it and return to his daily labor.

In many cases Churches, built up on the doctrines first taught them, have had fatal discords introduced among them by later and unauthorized preachers, teaching contrary doctrines. To correct these and other errors of the past, and to increase ten-fold the good now being accomplished, it is the belief of many that the time is full ripe for an organized Union of the Church in all places, and for concentrated, persistent effort in proclaiming the Gospel to the many who have never had it properly presented to them. To bring about a union of all the Churches into "one body," it has been proposed to have a general conference of the Church, to be held this year, each Church in the country to be represented by a delegate under about the following conditions.

1st. each Church of twenty or more members (or a group of smaller Churches to the number of twenty or more members) [illegible] send to the Editor of THE RESTITUTION before October first, 1888, the result of the vote, as to when and where this general conference shall be held; and also the name and address of a delegate of sound judgment and discretion, (not necessarily a preacher, unless the Church so prefers it), who shall represent, and cast the vote of that Church on the business matters brought before the conference.

Each delegate to take with him to the conference a written certificate from the clerk or presiding officer of the Church, stating that he is the accredited delegate representing, and entitled to vote for the Church, in the General Conference of the Church of God and Sister Churches wherever it may be held.

This meeting, when held, should extend for ten days, over two Sundays, say from Friday evening to the second Monday evening, and the time and place for holding it will be announced by the Editor of THE RESTITUTION as he shall find best represents the choice of a majority of the Churches writing to him before October 1st. The questions each delegate will have power to vote upon will be:

a. A Covenant, the same in all Churches, short and scriptural, which shall be subscribed to by all members as they are received into the Church.

b. The arrangement of the best and most permanent form of collecting the income needed for the support of each individual Church; of State and other Association of Churches; and of providing a fund for general evangelistic work; and who shall administer to that fund.

c. How weak and needy Churches can best be fostered and cared for.

d. How, and under what authority shall general or special evangelists represent the Church.

e. The power to make rules for the government of this and future yearly general conferences, and to decide when and where the next general conference shall meet and how delegates shall be appointed.

f. If any other propositions are presented at this general conference, they may be voted upon by the delegate subject to subsequent ratification by his Church.

That lack of money may not prevent any delegate from attending this important conference, the Church at Philadelphia agrees that, where a Church is not able to bear the entire expense of sending its delegate, each of such delegates shall receive from this Church a contribution of $10.00 towards his expenses, wherever it exceeds that sum if the general conference is held west of Harrisburg, Pa.; or of $20.00 each, if it is held east of Harrisburg, and such expenses amount to $20.00. The Phila. Church also offers, if the conference is held in Phila. that each delegate shall be provided for without cost, during the time the conference is held in Phila. Doubtless other cities would do as well. This call meets the approval of Elder C. O. Ramsay, our Pastor in Phila., of Elder Geo. R. Kramer, Pastor of the Church of the Blessed Hope in Brooklyn, and doubtless of many others to the Churches of God at Brooklyn, Baltimore, Winchester and other places. The eastern Churches do not insist on this conference being held in the East, if in the judgment of the Church, it is best to hold it anywhere in the West. For the Church at Philadelphia,

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weather.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and history, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the law of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth, Gilt Side and Back. Send to this office for this work.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GRUVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is far more as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth 16mo, 196 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCTOBER 3, 1888. NO. 37.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS { One Year . . $2.00. Six Months . . 1.00. Three Months . .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 19.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE SEVENTH DAY, CONTINUED.

(e)....The re-establishment of the throne of David, the king.

Proofs...."The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without a teraphim: afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." Hosea iii. 4, 5.

"Men and brethren, hearken unto me: Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name. And to this agree the words of the prophet: as it is written, After this will I return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." Acts xv. 13. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it," (the throne of the kingdom of Israel under Zedekiah's impious reign), and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is: and I will give it him." Ezek. xxi. 25.

"He shall be great and shall be called the son of the highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 32, 33.

"For, lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, and yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth. All the sinners of my people shall die by the sword, which say, The evil shall not overtake nor prevent us. In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old." Amos ix. 9–11.

"Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath unto him (David), that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his (David's) throne: he seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption. This Jesus hath God raised up whereof we all are witnesses." Acts ii. 30–32.

(d)....The subjugation and suppression of all purely human governments, and the introduction of the kingdom of God.

Proofs...."In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." Dan. ii. 44.

"I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Psa. ii. 7–9.

"For the nation or kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted." Isa. lx. 12.

"And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which come against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles. And it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, even upon them shall be no rain." Zech. xiv. 16.

"The seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." Rev. xi. 15.

Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." 1 Cor. xv. 24–26.

(e)....The final destruction of everything not in accord with the plan of God for the succeeding age.

The proof testimonies in relation to this part of the mission of Christ are plentiful, thus:

"The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God."

"And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." 1 Thess. i. 7–9. "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee. For the kingdom is the Lord's: and he is the governor among the nations." Psa. xxii. 27, 28. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire." Matt. xiii. 41, 42. A most conclusive evidence is found in 1 Cor. xv. 24–26, which has just been quoted under another heading, for when "he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power;" and when "all things have been put under his feet" "and when all things shall be subdued unto him," and "the Son also himself shall be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all," no more of evil will be left to combat; no ills to remove, nor wrongs to right. Christ's mission will be complete, for world and evil subjection, and this portion of it forever ended.

(f)....God's rest.

It has already been remarked that the seventh day was partly given to labor and partly to rest, as is shown by the language used in relation thereto where it is first spoken of.

It is true that creative work is completed. The highest type of life has been attained, and God's labor period closes with the Post-tertiary age, when the resurrection of the dead saints, and the crowning of the living ones shall have been accomplished. God arrives at the period when, having finished the work of the ages, millions of years in duration; when by progressive types of life he has firmly established an unerring, undying royalty and priesthood on the earth, in whom inhere all the perfected attributes of Deity; to whom is given all power both in heaven and earth, typical of the completeness of the great future age, when, having brought all things under the direct control of this kingly, priestly power for adjudication and executive work, He rests, awaiting the ushering in of the "age to come" with its earthly perfection, peace, righteousness and joy to continue world without end.

The king-priest, on account of whom all these things were made, labors, but God rests. The king-priest class, so constituted by the Spirit birth from among the dead, and from among the living, of whom the Christ, glorified,—the first-born from the dead, the first-born of every creature, the beginning of the new creation,—was the first-fruit, labors conjointly with him as their federal head through the day; controlling the governments among the nations of the earth, in righteousness, putting down "all rule, and all authority and power opposed to God's law and God's works, but God rests. Rests from all his works which he had created and made. Rests because creative labor is complete. Rests, in that there are no higher types of life to be produced. Rests, I assume the types of the pattern shown to Moses in the Mount and of which the law and the Jewish polity were only the shadow, have all been filled. Rests, not only through the antitypical Sabbath, but onward through the ages to come. Rests, the supreme Head and Architect of the universe of worlds, with earth redeemed, and its living organisms perfected. God rests, and the saints of all ages and climes spring from the dust of the Quarternary Age, crowned with life eternal by the life-giver. God rests and the obedient, watching ones join in with the resurrected to subdue and control the world. God rests, and they "take the kingdom and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever," as it is written, "the kingdom and the dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven is given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions (margin, rules) shall serve and obey him," Dan. vii. 27, subjecting it, after its subjugation, to the Father, together with themselves, when "all rule, and all authority and power" shall have been put down, that "God may be all in all" at the close of "The Day."

He for whom the ages were constituted is crowned King of kings and Lord of lords. Not one jarring, discordant note in all the earth, or in all the universe of worlds, creates disharmony in the music of the spheres. Man has been made perfect and like Christ, and the creatures of the earth have ceased to longer await the adoption of the sons of God. Harmony, joy, peace and love to God and each other, will actuate all the creation and earth-tenants for the universal good of each and of all. Man, not the erring, earthy, Adamic man of the Quarternary Age, but, man like God, God manifest in the flesh, will rule over all the nations of the earth under God.

God rests, and those for whom that rest is prepared; who by faith, obedience and practical godliness during this age are accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection of the dead; who, being angel-equals, cannot die any more; who are the children of God, because they are the children of the resurrection, and who, on that account, neither marry nor are given in marriage, enter into that rest for which they have labored, suffered and waited, not during the execution of judgment on a sin-cursed earth, but, when its termination shall unfold the full fruition of the kingdom of God in the age to come. Of this rest Paul writes in his letter to the Hebrew brethren. Says he, "Today if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness: when your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years. Wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do always err in their hearts, and they have not known my ways. So I aware by my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest. Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God. But exhort one another daily, while it is called today; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end: while it is said, Today, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts as in the provocation. For some, when they had heard did provoke: howbeit, not all that came out of Egypt by Moses. But with whom was he grieved forty years? Was it not with them who had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? And to whom swore he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not? So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief. Let us therefore fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. For unto us was the gospel preached as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest; although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. For he spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest on the seventh day from all his works. And in this place again, If they shall enter into my rest. Seeing, therefore, it remaineth that some must enter therein, and they to whom it was first preached entered not in because of unbelief: (again he limited a certain day, saying in David, Today, after so long a time, as it is said, Today if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. For if Jesus had given them rest, then would he not afterward have spoken of another day. There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own work, as God did from his.) Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief." Heb. iii. 7, to iv. 11.

David, speaking of God's rest, says, "Arise, O Lord, into thy rest; thou and the ark of thy strength. Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness; and let thy saints shout for joy. For thy servant David's sake turn not away the face of thine anointed. The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it; of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne. If thy children will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them; their children also shall sit upon my throne forever more. For the Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest forever: here will I dwell: for I have desired it." Psa. cxxxii. 8–14.

John, it will be remembered, beheld the tabernacle of God with men, and, "he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself" says he, "shall be with them, and be their God." Rev. xxi. 5.

Such are some of the principal events, as foreshadowed by prophecy, relating to the seventh-day period of earth's history. Only the prophetic outline has been given; sufficient to open the subject to more and more thorough investigation. Many, very many additional prophecies might have been given from the same scores on each premise; for the prophetic word is full of them. So, too, many additional topics might have been developed that pertain to the protracted seventh day era which remain unnoticed, among which may be enumerated, the renovation and purification of the earth, to Edenic fruitfulness and perfection; the fact of two resurrections,—one at the time of the introduction of the judgment period, and the other at, or near its termination; the events transpiring between the first resurrection and the revelation of Christ with all the saints, and the angelic host, to assume possession of the promised inheritance, etc., all of which is of unbounded interest to the student of history, written and prewritten, and to the scientist who desires to unravel the forces, causes and phenomena pertaining to the shifting of the Post-tertiary, into an age to follow it, with advancements in the fauna and flora equal, if not superior, to those of any previous age-changes.

The "Chiliasm," or "Millennium," and the seventh day are identical, and extend over the period required for the work of executive judgment on the creative labors that strictly pertain to the present age. It may, or it may not begin with the close of the six thousand years from man's creation. The Post-tertiary age is, in duration, like those that preceded it, limited rather by the full completion of the age-works designed to be accomplished by it, than by a definite period of years. The time used by the Creator may be six thousand years from man's first advent, or, regardless of time, it may cover a period commensurate with the results to be wrought independent of computed time. So, too, very many err in reckoning the chronology of the earth from Adam down through the course of years to the present, ignoring the fact that the Bible is strictly a Jewish history; that Gentile supremacy is only incidentally noticed from its connection, or encroachment on Jewish institutions, and that the chronological record of the Bible pertains to the Jewish nation, with unmeasured Gentile times, thrown in as an interregnum, independent of the Jewish chronology.

We take leave of the seventh day, however, and pass to the morning dawn of the succeeding age, with the reflection that its dawn closes the final judgment of all earth-creative periods, and that afterwards, with sin destroyed and death abolished, only peace, purity, harmony, justice, righteous godliness and eternal longevity will be the predominating features of the age, on a thoroughly purified earth.

The summary of events prophetically allied to this judgment era are:

1. The personal coming of the Lord Jesus Christ with the angelic host from heaven, for the rendition of judgment, first, on the overcomers, the obedient of all nations and times, living and dead, and secondly, on the existing nations of the earth, Jew and Gentile. See Acts i. 11; Mark xiii. 26; John xiv. 3; Thess. iv. 16; Rev. i. 7; 2 Thess. i. 10; 1 Peter iv. 17; Rom. ii. 5–11.

2. The revelation of the Lord to the saints, both dead and living; to the living by a resurrection from the dead, crowned with eternal life, and to the latter by a change from corruptibility to eternal, infinite incorruption. See 1 Cor. xv. 51–54; 1 Thess. iv. 13–18; Jude 14, 15; Phil. iii. 20, 21; 1 John iii. 2; Rev. xxii. 12.

3. The meeting of the Lord in the air with all the glorified saints. See 1 Thess. iv. 17; Rev. xv. 2.

4. The descent of the Lord Jesus with all his saints and angels to the earth. See Zech. xiv. 3, 4; Acts i. 11.

5. The relief of the Jews and their national acceptance of the Lord Jesus as their Deliverer and Messiah. Zech. xiv. 1; Mal. iii. 3–6; Rom. xi. 26; Isa. xxv. 8, 9; xxvi. 12–21.

6. The subjugation of the nations of the earth to the rule of David's royal seed, and the execution of judgment on those that are rebellious. Isa. lx. 12; Zech. xiv. 17, 19; Psa. ix. 17; Rev. xx. 7–9; Ezek. xxxviii. 14–39; xxix.; Math. xxv. 31.

7. The purification of the earth preparatory to the introduction of the Theocoic Age. See Matt. xiii. 38–42; Ezek. xlvii. 1–12; Isa. ii. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 33–35; Psa. cii. 25, 26; 2 Peter iii. 13.

8. The restitution of all things which God hath promised (spoken) by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. See Acts iii. 20–23; Luke i. 68–79.

REMARKS ON CHRISTIANITY AND SCEPTICISM. No. 8.

We are all travellers through this world; we had a starting place in it; we know how long we have been pursuing our journey; some of us are getting near the end of the journey; but just when we shall reach the end we know not; and some things that will be opened up to our vision when the end is reached, we know not as yet. Much belonging to the future state has been revealed, and much doubtless has been wisely withheld. In our present state we are unfitted for a full revelation. In the spirit world many things doubtless exist which we could not bear to look upon while in our mortal state.

And when we are getting down the hill of life, when almost all of life is in the past, when the physical strength is failing, and we are nearing the end of the journey which will land us on the other side, or set us down in another state, we do not want to be troubled with doubts and uncertainties and the foolish questionings of scepticism; we want to feel that we are treading on solid rock; we want to realize the consolation of knowing that we are accepted of God through Christ; and therefore, we should never renounce Christianity which furnishes that hope till something superior is offered to us in its place. Two persons, Dr. W. Lamson and Professor Hackett, sat side by side in a railway car on its way to Boston. The former told the latter of a sceptical book he had been reading, and stated that some of the infidel objections in the work were new to him and seemed very strong. The Professor replied, "Strong, strong? I see stronger difficulties than any which infidelity ever presented; but give me something better than Christianity to stand on, and I'll step off. Till that something better is presented, I stand, and shall stand, where I am." Be sure then that you never give up Christianity unless something better is offered you in its stead. And whatever the sceptic may offer, under whatever professions of superiority, do not accept it without examination and comparison and much prayer. And demand to see its practical results, and be satisfied that the fruit it bears is superior to that of the Christian religion. Be assured that the thing offered in lieu of Christianity is better, finer, safer, diviner, more God-like and benevolent. Take care that you never exchange the solid rock for shifting sands. Take care that you do not barter away the pure gold for what is only base metal. Take heed that you do not let go a good hope for a false hope. You are hastening into the great future, and the religion of Jesus only can make it a blessed future. You have sinned, and need forgiveness; sin has defiled your conscience, and you need purifying; sin has imperiled your safety, and you need deliverance; and Christianity only can show you how to obtain these blessings. Dirt on the hands or face may be washed off with soap and water; but if we get dirt on the conscience,—if we stain and pollute the soul with sin, we cannot wash that off in the same way. No human effort can cleanse the soul if the truth is not received,—if the blood of Jesus is made light of, and the propitiation is rejected.

The difficulties of unbelief are greater than the difficulties of faith. And the way of unbelief is harder and darker and beset with more perils than the way of faith. And should the way of faith turn out at the last to be the right way, the believer will be an infinite gainer and the unbeliever an infinite loser.

Think of it as you may; act in view of it as you may, it is a solemn moment when a man is coming face to face with his great enemy death, and is about to take a leap into the great and comparatively, unknown beyond. Joseph Cook, of Boston, was once in a railway accident. The train, after bumping upon some timbers, went off the line, and the carriage in the sleeping berth of which he lay wide awake, went reeling down an embankment forty feet. In those instants of suspense, he declares he thought of all his life. "I give you my word of honor," says he, in relating the circumstances in a public address, "that I had passing before me a very complete and vivid record of all my career, especially of its relations to God in whose more immediate presence I expected to be in an instant....It was a searching question to me at that moment, whether I had attained similarity of feeling with God." A question so momentous in such an hour, when there seems but a step between us and death, should have our consideration in more favorable circumstances, when life and a season of quiet are before us, nor should we rest till we have an answer that satisfies our conscience.

For want of due thought, for want of looking earnestly and seriously at this matter, for want of looking at it in the light of the beyond, many fail to realize the awfulness of their position till they come to the very threshold of the future state, and it seems to them that death is about to cut off the last chance. William Pitt, with all his acquirements in learning, lived a prayerless life, and so neglected religion and his responsibilities to God. Prior to his passing away, he is reported to have made the following despairing statement: "I fear I have neglected prayer too much to make it available on a death-bed." He warned against such a note of despondency being found upon your lips when in the grasp of your last enemy.

It is not enough by reading to get a knowledge of Christian ethics; you must get truth woven into the texture of your daily life. Heart religion and the religion of the life must supplement the theory of religion in the head. Neither reading nor hearing on the subject of salvation will save you. There must be decision for God, for truth, for holiness; and there must be submission to Christ; submission to the plan of salvation, submission to divine ways and means. A man must be willing to let go all selfishness, all dependence upon his own righteousness, and just let Jesus take him and shape him and mould him after his own perfect fashion. Only thus can he be safe and happy here, and make sure of safety and happiness hereafter.

A MODEL PAPAL STATE.

In Ecuador the Pope still names the president, the priests still make the laws, and as a natural result, in that whole country there is not a railroad, nor a telegraph, nor a stage coach, nor a highway upon which a carriage or a cart can be driven, except the great roads built by the Incas before the Spanish invasion, which have never been kept in repair, and are now almost useless. When I say that there is not a railroad in Ecuador, I should say, except a track ten miles long on the sea-coast, which was laid some years ago, but was never operated, and is now covered with tropical underbrush like a jungle.

The city of Guayaquil, the only seaport of Ecuador, is a place of some commercial importance, and the residence of many foreigners. They have introduced modern ideas and public schools. The seed thus sown is bearing fruit, and is a perpetual menace to the power of the church, so much so, that the principal portion of the army of Ecuador is kept there to quell revolutions when the papal authority is resisted. Some of the enterprising citizens have organized a telegraph company and are constructing a line to Quito, the capital, but the wires are constantly cut, and well-informed people predict that the priests will not allow it to be operated for fear it will prove a wedge that shall open the country to other modern ideas.

There is a law in Ecuador prohibiting the importation of books, unless they shall first receive the sanction of the church, and Jesuit priests act as inspectors at the Custom House to prevent the dissemination of intelligence among the people. No records of the finances of the government are kept. The president of Ecuador and his finance minister were unable to give the United States Commission the amount of imports and exports, or the amount of revenues collected. Their ignorance as to the disbursement of those revenues was quite as dense, but the prevailing belief is that much of the money goes to sustain the thousands of priests, monks and nuns that keep the people in darkness. When the public revenues are not sufficient to meet the demands, the necessary means are raised by forced loans from the merchants of Guayaquil. An officer with a file of soldiers calls upon the business firms and collects the assessments. This practice has given rise to a peculiar custom, for to protect themselves from such impositions the foreign residents put signs on their doors to announce their nationality. Hence the traveller's curiosity is awakened by seeing the flags of foreign countries nailed upon the entrances to residences or business houses with a legend printed upon them, reading, "He who lives within is an American," or a Frenchman, or an Englishman, or a German, as the case may be. Sometimes these warnings are disregarded, and appeal to the minister resident is necessary for protection.

Drunkenness, indolence, and licentiousness are the lessons taught by the priests. To attend mass every morning, and confessional once a week, are the only requirements of good citizenship, and vice of every description is not only licensed but encouraged. Four-fifths of the population can neither read nor write, and the only knowledge they have is what the priests have told them. Ecuador is a republic in name, but its constitution declares that the nation "exists wholly and alone devoted to the service of the Holy Church." The army is divided into four companies, called respectively, "The division of the Blessed Virgin," "The division of the Holy Ghost," "The division of the Son of God," and "The division of the Blood and Body of Christ." "The Sacred Heart of Jesus," is the national emblem, and the bodyguard of the president is called "The Holy Lancers of Saint Mary." There are no Protestants in Quito, and none are allowed to reside in the city. Everything is tolerated but opposition to the Church, and he who will not partake of the sacrament is stoned. —"Dominion Churchman," quoted in "The Present Truth."

BROTHER J. CAMERON, of Edinburgh, Scotland, sends a communication on "The Man of Sin," which we shall give in future numbers of THE RESTITUTION, commencing next week. We are very glad indeed to have him renew his correspondence for our paper. Brother Colegrove has also an article that will find a place in our next.

A BROTHER M. writes us from Ohio saying, "We have in this place a little body of twenty-two members with whom I meet. Formerly most of them were Christadelphians, but we are now united and in peace. I brought up the subject of sending a delegate to the proposed National Conference, which I strongly advocated, but some were afraid they might be entangled in modern restorationism, and preferred waiting the result if all goes right." We think if this church would carefully read Brother Work's circular, they would easily see what the objects of this contemplated Conference are. Notice the questions each delegate will be called to vote upon, as stated in that circular. Should we attend we do not expect to be "entangled in restorationism." We think the best course would be for this church in Ohio to send a delegate, and help in devising the best plan for promoting the cause of Christ.

IN the present number we give the first of a serial number of historical sketches we propose to write, showing that the hand of God is in history. In our illustrations, we shall confine ourself to the early explorations, and to the first settlements made in North America, and proceed to show how events have been shaped to thwart the designs both of Monarchs and Popes. In the contests that the European colonists had with the Indians, that the nations sending out these colonists had with each other, we shall find that several places on the Pennsylvania Lines of Railway have a historic interest. As a number attending the contemplated National Conference will pass over these lines, we hope to make our descriptions a matter of interest to these, as well as to our readers generally. For our young readers, who are studying history, we may make them supply the place of the Youth's Column for a few weeks. On their account we shall make the personal narratives of individuals connected with the grand chain of events comparatively full.

GOD'S HAND IN HISTORY.

The Most High ruleth in the Kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. Dan. iv. 25.

We re-quote the following from an exchange which was published originally in the August number of the Missionary Review of the World, as a condensed statement of facts upon which we propose to enlarge by going somewhat fully into particulars as to times, places, and persons, connected with the eventful changes that have taken place on the Western Continent, and especially in these United States since the earliest settlements. The extract reads as follows:—

"In 1588, Great Britain did not possess a foot of land on this continent. France and Spain possessed all. In 1688, Spain owned vast tracts of North and South America, and was, in effect, still supreme. France claimed much, and her possession seemed secure. France, Spain, and Portugal carried out the behests of the pope wherever they hoisted their flags. There was no toleration of Protestantism. It was about two hundred years ago that France claimed the St. Lawrence and the whole territory which it drains, and also the Mississippi Valley, down to the Gulf of Mexico, and westward to Texas. In 1788, France and Spain still held much territory, though their grasp upon the continent was much less secure. By this time all Acadia and Canada was lost. And now, in 1888, Spain does not control an acre of Continental America, and France has not an inch of territory on the main-land of North America, and very little in South America. At this moment, Great Britain and the United States possess all North America, with the exception of Mexico and a few small 'Central' American States. As a result, we have free institutions, free churches, a free press, the Bible, and the public schools."

We will begin with very brief references to the earliest settlements made in North America by the Spanish, French, and English, and particularize more fully on the earliest explorers of the Great Mississippi Valley and note particularly the efforts made to establish French domination and the Romish religion in the whole region west of the Alleghanies.

St. Augustine, in Florida, is the oldest town in the United States, a fort having been built there in 1565. Florida was discovered by Juan Ponce De Leon, a Spaniard, on Easter Sunday, A. D. 1512. This navigator accompanied Columbus in his second expedition to the New World in 1493. In his voyage to Florida, in 1512, he was in pursuit of the fountain of perpetual youth and beauty. The name Florida —The Fowery Land—was given from the magnificence of its blooming vegetation, as well as from the day of its discovery, Pascua Florida, the Floral Feast. On April 8 he landed some miles north of where St. Augustine was subsequently founded, and took possession of the country in the name of the King of Spain. This claim, on the part of Spain was not confined to the present State boundaries, but extended indefinitely northward, and westward to the Mississippi. Several Spanish adventurers visited Florida, but it was not till 1539 that it was explored by Fernando De Soto. In the early history of this country we have the murderous spirit of Romanism illustrated. About the middle of this 16th century we learn that "Many Protestants of France sought refuge in Florida, but only to experience greater evils than they had endured at home. In 1565 they were attacked by the Spaniards, and many were hanged on the trees with an inscription purporting that they were destroyed 'not as Frenchmen, but as heretics.' This barbarity was soon after avenged by a party of Frenchmen, who attacked the Spanish fort, and hung up the garrison on the same trees that emblazoned the inscription 'bones of their countrymen, inscribing over them that they were executed, 'not as Spaniards, but as cutthroats and murderers.'" On the discoveries made by Ponce De Leon, in 1512, and by Fernando De Soto between the years 1538 and 1542, Spain claimed the whole country around the Gulf of Mexico from the peninsula of Yucatan to the Southern cape of Florida, and all the vast regions east and north of New Mexico, as far as the rivers Mississippi and Missouri. As we intend giving some account of remarkable personages in our contemplated sketches of the olden times, we will present a brief sketch of this latter adventurer and his discoveries. After De Soto had explored the coast of Guatemala and Yucatan, in 1528, in search of a strait which was supposed to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, he, in 1532, joined Pizarro in the conquest of Peru. As a result of the part he took in the subjugation of this country he returned to his native land, Spain, with a fortune of $500,000, and married the daughter of the patron of his youth, with whom he had sailed to America as early as 1510. Being favored by the emperor Charles V. he proposed to undertake the conquest of Florida at his own expense, which country was believed to be a new El Dorado richer than any hitherto discovered. Accordingly he sailed for Florida, and anchored in Tampa Bay, May 25, 1539. Having passed one winter in the country of the Appalachian Indians east of the Flint River, he made his way to the Ogeechee river, thence to Coosa river, and on Oct. 18, 1540, he reached the village of Mavilla or Mobile, on the Alabama. After losses of men and horses in conflicts with the Indians, and after another winter's sojourn in the country of the Chickasaws, and a conflict with them in the spring, and after losing about a score of his men after beginning his march to the northwest, by a pestilential fever, he finally reached the Mississippi in June 1541, and thus became noted as the first European that discovered this wonderful river. Beyond this river he explored the country to the southwest and northwest till he reached the high lands of White river. He passed his third winter at a place on the Ouachita, or Washita, river in Arkansas. In the spring of 1542, he went down this stream to the Mississippi, and while attempting to descend the banks of this latter river he was attacked with fever and died in May or June. His body was wrapped in a mantle and sunk at midnight in the middle of that mighty stream, to which the Indians gave the name of Miche Sepe—Father of Floods,—or "Great Father of Waters." As these discoveries formed the ground of Spanish claims to a large portion of the South, as well as to the lower valley of the Great River, it will be next in place to give some account of the earliest settlements made by the great rival nations, the English and French. In the two centuries, preceding this nineteenth, it became a question of supreme importance as to what nation should possess the control of that great valley bounded by the Alleghanies on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the West. Politically, the final settlement of this question was one of vast importance, and, for the best interests of humanity, and the triumph of Protestantism, its settlement, ecclesiastically, was vastly more important. As the question of political supremacy was mainly and finally settled between the French and English by an appeal to arms, we will give an outline sketch of the earliest settlements made by these nations respectively on this continent, as introductory to a particular account of the earliest explorations, by these nations, of the Great Valley of the Mississippi, and the conflicts that resulted in English domination, and finally in the rule of the Great Republic, with its guarantees of political and religious freedom. As is generally known Jamestown, on the north bank of James river, in Virginia, was the first permanent settlement made by the English in the United States. Three ships containing 105 colonists entered the Chesapeake April 26, 1607, and sailing up James river, thus named in honor of the then reigning King of England, till they came to a beautiful promontory where they anchored their vessels, and landed, and founded Jamestown, May 13, 1607. This voyage was made, and this colony was founded under the auspices of the London Company. To this Company, upon its reorganization in 1609 a grant of country was made of a breadth of 400 miles on the Atlantic coast and extending westward to the Pacific. In 1624 this company was dissolved, and the colony passed under the direct control of the crown of England.

The first colonial assembly ever convened in America was held at Jamestown, June 30, 1619. The romantic history of Capt. John Smith, John Rolfe, and the Indian Princess, Pocahontas, is connected with the early annals of this settlement. The perpetuation, and even the salvation of the colony, were owing to the persevering energy of Capt. Smith. His earlier life was eventful and diversified with strange adventures and narrow escapes from a tragic end. For daring exploits in Hungary and Transylvania in a war against the Turks, he received a patent of nobility and a pension from Sigismond Bathori. Being subsequently taken a prisoner, he was sent as a slave to Constantinople, where he gained the affections of his young mistress, who sent him to her brother, a pasha on the Sea of Azov, with a letter revealing her attachment to Smith. This prince was so indignant that his sister should profess her love to a Christian that he greatly maltreated Smith, who, maddened by an insult, finally beat out his master's brains with the flail with which he was threshing, and then put on the dead man's clothes, mounted his horse and escaped to a Russian post on the Don, where he was kindly treated and helped on his way to Transylvania. After arriving in Virginia, he set himself about building Jamestown, providing the settlers with lodgings and procuring corn for their sustenance from the Indians by making excursions into the neighboring country. In one of these expeditions he was taken prisoner by the Indians, and it was decided to put him to death. As the narrative runs, his head was placed upon a stone, and the savages were brandishing their clubs preparatory to beating out his brains, when Pocahontas, threw herself on the captive's body, and by her intercessions with Powhatan, her father, and chief of the tribe, saved Smith's life.

Pocahontas, in company with her companions, was a frequent visitor to Jamestown. In 1609, she passed through the wood secretly by night to apprise Capt. Smith of a plot laid by her father to destroy him. In 1613 she was living in the territory of another chief, Japazews, who was bribed to betray her into the hands of Capt. Samuel Argall. In treaty efforts with Powhatan for her restitution the parties failed to agree. Finally an attachment sprang up between her and an Englishman, John Rolfe, and the consent of Sir Thomas Dale, high Marshall of the colony, and her father having been gained, they were married at Jamestown in April, 1613. Three years later she accompanied Dale to England and there became an object of great interest to all, classes, and was presented at court. She prepared to leave England, but died suddenly as she was about to embark for the voyage back to her native land. She left only one son, Thomas Rolfe, who was educated by his uncle, a London merchant, and in after life went to Virginia and became a person of distinction and influence. Noted families in Virginia were descended through this son from Pocahontas and her husband, John Rolfe, notably the Randolph family, of which the late John Randolph was so distinguished a member.

Passing now from these personal episodes, which we insert mainly for the instruction of our younger readers, and directing attention to the English chartered grant of a territory of land 400 miles in breadth extending from ocean to ocean, we now submit a brief sketch of another early settlement by the English, and direct our attention to the New England States. Although some abortive attempts had been made at an earlier date on the islands and coasts of Massachusetts, it was not till the landing of the Pilgrims from the Mayflower, Dec. 22, 1620, that a permanent settlement was begun. In our plan it is not necessary to delineate the sufferings and vicissitudes that the people connected with colonizing this place and adjoining settlements passed through. We will merely call attention to the assumed rights claimed by England of disposing of territory in North America. As we have already seen, the charter to the company colonizing Virginia covered a strip of country 400 miles in width extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, so in the case of the Massachusetts settlement, an English company by 1628 had obtained a grant of territory extending three miles south of the river Charles and Massachusetts Bay, and three miles north of every part of the river Merrimac, and, like the Virginia grant, reaching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Thus we see that England was as ready to assert arbitrary claims to large and unexplored parts of the continent as Spain. It remains to bring the earliest settlements made by France under review, when we shall be prepared to comprehend the grounds of conflict in later times, and thus trace the national movements that have led on to, and resulted in the existing order of things. This we will defer to a succeeding number which will embrace an outline account of several persons who were the earliest explorers of the regions found on the Great Lakes and about the head waters of the Mississippi.

SYMBOLICAL TIME.

In the July number of Hebraica is an article by B. Pick, Ph. D., showing how certain "Old Testament passages were Messianically applied by the Ancient Synagogue" from which we take the following Rabbinical exposition of Zech. xiv. 5. "And the Lord, my God, shall come, and all the saints with thee." How many prophets were in Israel, whose names are not known, but in the future God will bring them with him, as it is said, "And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee." v. 7. "But it shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord."

Another interpretation of "And there was none of them," Psa. xxxiv. 18, is that it means the seventh day, for this world is to last 6000 years; 2000 years it was waste and desolate; 2000 years under the law; 2000 years under the Messiah. And because our sins are increased they are prolonged. As they are prolonged, and as we make one day a Sabbatic year, so will God in the latter days make one day a Sabbatic year, which is 1000 years, and it is said, "But it is one day, which shall be known to the Lord," this is the seventh day. "At evening time it shall be light." This refers to the world to come.

Communications.

To the Brethren of the Conference of the Church of God in Michigan.

Advices have reached me that it were best for the State Conference in Michigan to send two delegates to represent the brethren in Michigan in the National Conference to be held in the future, instead of each church sending one delegate, which would necessitate quite an expense. I have written to several church organizations, also at my request Sister Woodward has written to several. Now to facilitate matters, I request that each church in Michigan take action at once on the following questions and report to me as soon as possible.

1. Are you in favor of holding such a conference as called for by Brother Dale to Work, and if so, where do you desire such meeting to be held?

2. Are you in favor of sending two delegates to represent Michigan, and who is your choice for such delegates?

3. How much money will your organization contribute to defray expenses of such delegates?

4. How many members have you to your church?

5. Have you regular appointments for meeting; if so, state how often?

6. Have you regular preaching?

Also a suggestion of any ideas that are not embodied in these questions. Now brethren please be prompt in action and report at once. I can then forward your report to delegate chosen. And brethren who are isolated from church organizations and who belong to the conference, will please make such suggestions as they have to make. Make these suggestions by letter to me, and I will forward the same to the delegates chosen. The church at Raisin adopted the plan of sending two delegates from Michigan and made Plymouth, Ind., their choice of place to hold the conference. Now brethren, please act at once and report as soon as possible.

Address, L. C. CHASE,
P. O. Box 667,
Adrian, Mich.

To the Brethren and Sisters of Michigan, a Greeting in the Name of the Blessed Master.

Owing to the press of much other important business at our last conference, there was not as much attention given to the question of the National Conference as should have been. But brethren, that need not and cannot excuse us from attending to the matter yet. Now is the time to work, and brethren, ye who are in earnest in the Master's cause, eager to see it prospering, remember there is no better time than now to show our earnestness. Never again will this opportunity come to some of us to give our little mites to so noble an object, and when we read Brother Work's most liberal offer in THE RESTITUTION, it should give us redoubled earnestness to help in this meeting. Do I hear some one say, I am so poor I cannot help any? Do not forget the widow's mite, and if you could not spare more than two shillings for this cause, give that much willingly; and if each believer in Michigan would do even that we could, by uniting our offerings, be able to send at least two delegates to this proposed conference.

How true, how fatally true in Michigan, were Brother Work's words in RESTITUTION of Sept. 21st. If we had written the words ourselves, we could not have portrayed the truth more forcibly than he has. For the last twenty-five years churches have been born, existed a few short months or years, only to die for lack of proper care. No minister to feed them, because there was nothing to support him with, and the "no order system" in finance as in other things gave the treasurer no means to forward for their help. We know of very able men who have had to leave the work because their loved ones would get hungry and cold just like any other human beings. Now brethren, has not twenty-five years of constant failure been enough, have we not had enough of general confusion, conferences made up of "stragglers," as Brother Chase remarked, churches destroyed by fatal, discordant views proclaimed, where the truth had once deep root, impostors coming among us with fair speech, but no certificate from church or conference to prove themselves true? This general conference is to remedy all this if possible.

Michigan is again a united body in name. God grant we may be in heart; let us have one "common covenant" that we may be known all over the world as a united working people; let us act as though we believed what we preach, and if we are truly looking and waiting for the Master, O may we be working for him when he comes, ready to receive whatever reward he may see fit to bestow upon us. Once more beloved believers, let me urge you not to forget this golden opportunity, or let it pass unheeded by and we stay behind while others will go up to partake of the feast of gospel work. If nothing is done from Michigan now, will not the brethren justly believe us to be a State of drones with no earnestness or zeal only for worldly matters. Our Father has been patient with us for many years while he has been preparing us for this step, but he will not always be if we neglect duty when it is so plainly marked out for us. His work must and will be done, and we as his stewards will be passed by and others chosen if we prove unfaithful. Open your pocket-books brethren, open your hearts, send as your delegates whoever will work for the best interests of the cause, and you will always rejoice that your duty is done, and you have given one push to the wheel of advance. May God help us all to be faithful to the end, is the prayer of your sister in Christ.

MARY A. WOODWARD.

"THE REPAIRER OF THE BREACH."

"And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places: thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in." Isa. lviii. 12.

The Seventh Day Adventist preachers spoken of in my article on "The good Olive tree," took the position that the Seventh Day Adventists are the "Repairers of the breach" spoken of in the text quoted above.

The "breach" according to their exposition is the breaking of the fourth commandment. The idea is this: the ten commandments are God's constitution, 2 Tim. iii. 13, and a breach has been for many generations made in it by desecrating the Sabbath, and now God has raised up a people who are repairing the breach by keeping the Sabbath and persuading others to keep it. As if the fourth commandment had been torn out of its place and now the Sabbath keepers are placing it back again. The Seventh Day Adventists in giving this interpretation of the text, fail entirely to present the idea of the prophet. The prophet under Jehovah's command, was addressing his people Israel concerning their sins. Thus the chapter commences: "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and declare unto my people their transgression, and to the house of Jacob their sins." "The house of Jacob" does not mean the Gentile people of this age. After making the address, the prophet tells the people of their hypocrisy. They pretended to seek the Lord, coming before him with fasting; but they fasted "for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness." Their fasting was not accompanied with "loosing the bands of wickedness," "undoing the heavy burdens," "breaking every yoke," and "letting the oppressed go free," "dealing their bread to the hungry, bearing the poor, clothing the naked;" but they "hid themselves from their own flesh," that is, from their brethren. Read carefully from the first verse to the seventh. According to the words of the prophet in this part of the chapter the sins of the people consisted in oppressing the poor laborers, and failing to supply the needs of the poor generally. For this reason God would not accept their worship. Their sins had produced a "breach" between them and their God, Jehovah. The prophet told them how they could repair the breach. It was by removing the burdens from the laborers, and ministering to the needs of their poor brethren. The prophet says, "If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity; if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noonday: and the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water whose waters fail not. And they that be of thee shall build the old waste places: thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations and thou shalt be called, 'The repairer of the breach, the restorer of the paths to dwell in.'" "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord honorable; and shall honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words: then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth; and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

The keeping of the Sabbath was included among the things necessary to be done to repair the breach; but the breaking of the Sabbath was not the "breach," but a part of the cause of the breach. The 59th chapter continues the subject, and in the second verse the cause of the breach is plainly stated.

It with the first verse reads that "Behold the Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save; nor his ear dull that it cannot hear; but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have made him hide his face from you that he will not hear." (See margin). Then the prophet goes on again to speak of their sins, and of the effect of their sins. The "breach" or "separation" spoken of in this prophecy was made under the old covenant. It was a breach between Jehovah and his people made by the people in violating the terms of the covenant, and therefore contains no proof that Christians from among the Gentiles in this dispensation, are required to keep the Sabbath. Christians from among the Gentiles in this dispensation cannot by keeping the Sabbath repair the breach made between God and Israel under the old covenant. There is only one who can repair that breach, and that is the "Redeemer" who was to come to Zion. He came of that people as to the flesh, of the seed of David, stepped between God and the people, kept the law and suffered its curse. And by suffering its curse redeemed them that were under the law. The children of Israel never fulfilled the conditions by which the breach was to be healed, hence the necessity of Jehovah coming as a "Redeemer." His own "arm brought salvation;" and his righteousness sustained him. Isa. lix. 16. "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and to them that turn from ungodliness in ("and shall turn away ungodliness from" Paul) Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them saith Jehovah; my spirit that is upon thee and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith Jehovah, from henceforth and forever," 20 and 21st vs. As the breach was not repaired under the old covenant, so the Redeemer will repair the breach by making a new covenant with that people, in the making of which he will turn away ungodliness from Jacob. This he will do when he comes to Zion the second time. This is according to Paul's explanation of the prophecy in Rom. xi. Then the prophecy concerning the glory of Zion as set forth in the 60th chapter will have its accomplishment. Then the Sabbath of Jehovah will be kept by his redeemed people as it never has been kept. And it will be kept not in heaven above, but in Jehovah's land on earth, by his redeemed and sanctified people Israel, delivered from their enemies and purified from their sins, their Redeemer being in his sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore, Ez. xxxvi. and xxxvii. So let it be.

DIED.

HARDING.—At Rensselaer, Ind., Sept. 22, 1888, Brother Eldridge T. Harding, aged sixty-four years.

Brother Harding was an old settler in Indiana, having, when a small boy, moved with his father from Stark Co., Ohio, his native place, to LaPorte Co., Ind. In 1849 he was united in marriage with Martha I Willey, sister of Brother Joseph H. Willey of Rensselaer, with whom he lived until his death. He had eight children, five of whom survive him. In 1861 he and his wife united with the Church of God at Rensselaer, Ind. They both held their membership in that church up to the time of his death. Brother Harding was a good husband, a kind and indulgent father, a good neighbor, a patriotic citizen and a consistent Christian, ever ready to do his part and do it cheerfully. He was fully resigned to the Master's will during his last illness, which continued several months, during all of which time his hope of eternal life seemed to grow brighter and brighter. He knew he could not get well and made arrangements for his last sleep. More than a year before his death he requested me to preach his funeral. A very large company of his relatives, friends and neighbors attended his funeral. The discourse was preached by the writer from the text, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord!" Rev. xiv. 13. After which we laid him in his quiet resting place, there to sweetly sleep until the morning of the first resurrection, when the Lord will send his angel and wake him out of his sleep and crown him with life and immortality. May we be prepared to meet him.

Suggested by "I Wonder Why," in The Restitution.

I may not have the world's good things,
Nor taste its joys and gay delight,
Nor feel the golden sunshine bring
My pathway warmth and light.

The fruits which hang above my head
May be beyond my reach,
And flowers which are for others spread,
May pierce with thorns my feet,

The soil I till unfruitful prove,
My way be thro' the wilderness,
Where none may sympathize or love,
Or show me aught of tenderness,

Eyes may be dim with blinding tears
As I press onward toward the goal,
And listen mid my doubts and fears
To hear "peace" whisp'red in my soul.

And yet I ask not "why" it is—
I know I need this discipline,
And that the guiding hand is His,
Who cleanses us from sin.

Sweet comfort in these words I find,
They still each doubting, questioning breath,
And teach me how to be resigned—
"He feareth whom he chasteneth."

JOHN'S FOREVIEW OF ROMANISM.
No. 4.

But to come to the darkest feature. Has not the Church of Rome drunk most abundantly the precious blood of saints and martyrs? We appeal to facts. What of the Albigenses in the thirteenth century? What of the Waldenses from the thirteenth century on to the time of Cromwell and the commonwealth? You have not forgotten Milton's poem about them, those memorable lines. And what of the persecutions of Protestants in France, those dreadful persecutions mercilessly continued for more than three hundred years? What of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes? What of the fires of Smithfield? What of the terrible Inquisition?

Stay, I will take you to the Inquisition. You shall enter its gloomy portals; you shall walk through its dark passages; you shall stand in its infernal torture-chamber; you shall hear the cries of some of its victims; you shall listen to their very words. What agonies have been suffered in these sombre vaults, unseen by any human eyes save those of fiendish inquisitors! What cries have been uttered in this dismal place which have never reached the open world in which we live. Locked doors shut them in; stone walls stifled them. No sound escaped, not even that of a faint and distant moan. But now and then a victim found release; one and another have come forth from the torture-chamber pale and trembling, maimed and mutilated, to tell the things they experienced when in the hands of the holy inquisitors. We shall call in some of these as witnesses.

This book is Limborch's "History of the Inquisition." It tells the story of its origin seven hundred years ago, and of its establishment and progress in France, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Poland, Sicily, Sardinia, Germany, Holland, and other parts of the world; it describes its ministers and methods, its vicars, assistants, notaries, judges, and other officials; it describes the power of the inquisitors, and their manner of proceeding. It unveils their dread tribunal; opens their blood-stained records; describes their dungeons, the secret tortures they inflicted, the extreme, merciless, unmitigated tortures, and also the public so-called "acts of faith," or burning of heretics. What a record! What a world of tyranny and intolerable anguish compressed into that one word—the Inquisition! Tyranny over the consciences! Men in the name of Jesus Christ, stretching and straining, maiming and mangling their fellow men, to compel them to call light darkness, and darkness light; to call the Gospel of Christ a lie, and the lie of Satan truth; to confess that wrong is right, and acknowledge right is wrong; to bow down to man and worship him as God; to call the teachings of Christ heresy, and the teachings of antichrist Divine! Tremendous was the power of this dread tribunal. In Spain and Portugal it completely crushed the Reformation. No secrets could be withheld from the inquisitors; hundreds of persons were often apprehended in one day, and in consequence of information resulting from their examinations under torture, thousands more were apprehended. Prisons, convents, even private houses, were crowded with victims; the cells of the inquisition were filled and emptied again and again; its torture-chamber was a hell. The most excruciating engines were employed to distort the limbs of even tender women. The stake was beyond it the stake. The gospel was gagged and crushed, and Christ himself in the persons of his members subjected to the anguish of a second Golgotha.

Let us look into the chamber of horrors in the Spanish Inquisition. "The place of torture," says a Spanish historian, quoted by Limborch, p. 217, "the place of torture in the Spanish Inquisition is generally an underground and very dark room, to which one enters through several doors. There is a tribunal erected in it in which the inquisitor, inspector, and secretary sit. When the candles are lighted, and the person to be tortured brought in, the executioner, who is waiting for him, makes an astonishing and dreadful appearance. He is covered all over with a black linen garment down to his feet, and tied close to his body. His head and face are all concealed with a long black cowl, only two little holes being left in it for him to see through. All this is intended to strike the miserable wretch with greater terror in mind and body, when he sees himself going to be tortured by the hands of one who thus looks like the very devil."

The degrees of torture are described by Julius Clarus and other writers quoted by Limborch. They were various, and included the following:

1. The being threatened to be tortured.
2. Being carried to the place of torture.
3. The stripping and binding.
4. The being hoisted up on the rack.
5. What they called "squassation."

This was the torture of the pulley. Besides this there was the torture of the fire, or chafing-dish full of burning charcoal applied to the soles of the feet. Then there was the torture of the rack, and of another instrument called by the Spaniards "escalero," than that of the pouring water into a bag of linen stuffed down the throat; and that of iron dice forced into the feet by screws; and of canes placed crosswise between the fingers, and so compressed as to produce intolerable pain; then the torture of cords drawn tightly around various parts of the body, cutting through the flesh; and of the machine in which the sufferer was fixed head downwards; and, lastly, the torture of red-hot irons applied to the breasts and sides till they burned to the bone.

Here, on p. 219, is the account of the stripping of victims, men and women, preparatory to torture; the stripping from them of every vestige of clothing by these holy inquisitors, and how they put on them short linen drawers, leaving all the rest of the body naked for the free action of the tormentors. Here, on page 221, is the account by Isaac Orobio of what he suffered when in their hands: It was towards evening, he says when he was brought to the place of torture in the Inquisition. It was a large, underground room, arched, and the walls covered with black hangings. The candlesticks were fastened to the wall, and the whole room enlightened with candles placed in them. At one end of it there was an inclosed place like a closet, where the inquisitor and notary sat at a table; so that the place seemed to him as the mansion of death, everything appearing so terrible and awful. Then the inquisitor admonished him to confess the truth before his torments began. When he answered that he had told the truth, the inquisitor gravely protested that since he was so obstinate as to suffer the torture, the holy office would be innocent (what exquisite hypocrisy!) if he should even expire in his torments. When he had said this, they put a linen garment over his body, and drew it so very close on each side as almost squeezed him to death. When he was almost dying, they slackened all at once the sides of the garment, and, after he began to breathe again, the sudden alteration put him to the most grievous anguish and pain. When he had overcome this torture, the same admonition was repeated, that he would confess the truth in order to prevent further torment. As he persisted in his denial, they tied his thumbs so very tight with small cords as made the extremities of them greatly swell, and caused the blood to spurt out from under his nails. After this he was placed with his back against a wall and fixed upon a bench; into the wall were fastened iron pulleys, through which there were ropes drawn and tied round his arms and legs in several places. The executioner, drawing these ropes with great violence, fastened his body with them to the wall, his arm and legs, and especially his fingers and toes, being bound so tightly as to put him to the most exquisite pain, so that it seemed to him just as though he was dissolving in flames. After this a new kind of torture succeeded. There was an instrument like a small ladder made of two upright pieces of wood and five cross ones sharpened in front. This the torturer placed over against him, and by a single motion struck it with great violence against both his shins, so that he received upon each of them at once five violent strokes, which put him to such intolerable anguish that he fainted away. After this he came to himself, and they inflicted on him a farther torture. The torturer tied ropes about Orobio's wrists, and then put those ropes about his own back, which was covered with leather to prevent his hurting himself; then falling backwards he drew the ropes with all his might till they cut through Orobio's flesh, even to the very bones. And this torture was repeated twice, the ropes being tied about his arms at the distance of two fingers' breadth from the former wound, and drawn with the same violence. On this the physician and surgeon were sent for out of the neighboring apartment to ask whether the torture could be continued without danger of death. As there was a prospect of his living through it, the torture was thus repeated, after which he was bound up in his own clothes and carried back to his prison. Here, opposite to this recital, is a picture representing these various tortures. After prolonged imprisonment, Orobio was released and banished from the kingdom of Seville.

Before we let fall the curtain upon this awful subject, let us listen for a moment to some of the words of William Lithgow, a Scotchman, who suffered the tortures of the Inquisition in the time of James I. After telling of the diabolical treatment he received, which was very similar to that I have just described, he says, "Now mine eyes did begin to startle, my mouth to foam and froth, and my teeth to chatter like the dobbling of dramaticks. Oh, strange, inhuman, monster manmanglers!.... And notwithstanding of my shivering lips in this fiery passion, my vehement groaning, and blood springing from my arms, my broken sinews, yea, and my depending weight on flesh-cutting cords, yet they struck me on the face with cudgels to abate and cease the thundering noise of my wrestling voice. At last, being released from those pinnacles of pain, I was handfast set on the floor with this their ceaseless imploration: 'Confess, confess in time, or thine inevitable torments ensue.' Where, finding nothing from me but still innocent, —'Oh! I am innocent - O Jesus, the Lamb of God, have mercy on me, and strengthen me with patience to undergo this barbarous murder—'"

Enough! Here let the curtain drop. I should sicken you were I to pursue the subject further; it is too horrible, too damnable.

Here in this paper I have some of the ashes of the martyrs, some of their burned bones. I have bits of rusted iron and melted lead which I took myself with these hands from the Quemadero in Madrid, the place where they burned the martyrs, not far from the Inquisition. It was in the year 1870 that I visited it, just before the great ecumenical council was held at Rome, by which the pope was proclaimed infallible. I was in Spain that spring, and visited the newly opened Quemadero. I saw the ashes of the martyrs. I carried away with me some relics from that spot, which are now lying upon this table.

Hear me, though in truth I scarcely know how to speak upon this subject. I am almost dumb with horror when I think of it. I have visited the places in Spain, in France, in Italy most deeply stained and dyed with martyr-blood. I have visited the valleys of Piedmont. I have stood in the shadow of the great cathedral of Seville, on the spot where they burned the martyrs or tore them limb from limb. I have stood breast-deep in the ashes of the martyrs of Madrid. I have read the story of Rome's deeds. I have waded through many volumes of history and of martyrology. I have visited, either in travel or in thought, scenes too numerous for me to name, where the saints of God have been slaughtered by Papal Rome, that great butcher of bodies and of souls. I cannot tell you what I have seen, what I have read, what I have thought, I cannot tell you what I feel. Oh, it is a bloody tale! I have stood in that valley of Luserna where dwelt the faithful Waldenses, those ancient Protestants who held to the pure gospel all through the dark ages, that lovely valley with its pine-clad slopes which Rome converted into a slaughter-house. Oh, horrible massacres of gentle, unoffending, noble-minded men! Oh, horrible massacres of tender women and helpless children! Yes; ye hated them, ye hunted them, ye trapped them, ye tortured them, ye stabbed them, ye stuck them on spits, ye impaled them, ye hanged them, ye roasted them, ye flayed them, ye cut them in pieces, ye violated them, ye violated themselves, ye violated the children, ye forced flints into them, and stakes, and stuffed them with gunpowder, and blew them up, and tore them asunder limb from limb, and tossed them over precipices, and dashed them against the rocks; ye cut them up alive, ye dismembered them; ye racked, mutilated, burned, tortured, mangled, massacred holy men, sainted women, mothers, daughters, tender children, harmless babes, hundreds, thousands, thousands upon thousands; ye sacrificed them in heaps, in hecatombs, turning all Spain, Italy, France, Europe, Christian Europe, into a slaughter-house, a charnel house, an Aceldama. Oh, horrible; too horrible to think of! The sight dims, the heart sickens, the soul is stunned in the presence of the awful spectacle. O harlot, gilded harlot, with brazen brow and brazen heart! red are thy garments, red thine hands. Thy name is written in this book. God has written it. The world has read it. Thou art a murderess, O Rome. Thou art the murderess Babylon—"Babylon the Great," drunken, foully drunken; yea, drunken with the sacred blood which thou hast shed in streams and torrents, the blood of saints, the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. Were there naught else by which to recognise thee, O persecuting Church of Rome, this dreadful mark would identify thee. This is thy brand; by this we know thee. Thou art that foretold Babylon. We know thee by thy place. We know thee by thy proud assumptions, by the throne on which thou sittest, by those seven hills, by the beast thou ridest, by the garments thou wearest, by the cup thou bearest, by the name blasoned on thy forehead, by thy kingly paramours; by thy shameless looks, by thy polluted deeds; but oh, chiefly by this, by thy prolonged and dreadful persecution of the saints, by those massacres, by that Inquisition, by the fires of that burning stake. Mark how its ruddy flames ascend; see how its accusing smoke goes up to heaven!

In this sacred prophecy behold the picture, read thy name; read, ay, read thy written doom. The French Revolution broke upon thee; it was a stage in thy judgment and no more. Thou beast who carried thee for centuries in abject submission turned against thee, cast thee off, stripped thy garments from thee, rent thee with its horns. It was foretold it would be so. It is but the beginning of the end. Tremble, for thy doom is written from of old. The hand upon the wall has written it; the finger of the Almighty God has engraved it. Dreadful have been thy sins; dreadful shall be thy punishment. Thou hast burned alive myriads of the members of Christ, thou hast burned them to cinders and to ashes: thy doom is the appalling flame whose smoke ascends for ever.

I have done. Prophecy has spoken; history has fulfilled its utterance. Rome pagan ran its course; Rome Papal took its place. "Babylon the Great" has risen, has reigned, has fallen; her end is nigh. "Come out of her, My people," come out of her before the final judgment set in the great drama of the apostasy. "Come out of her," saith your God, "that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." For as a millstone cast by a mighty angel into the sounding deep, she shall with violence be thrown down, and shall be found no more for ever.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

To the Faithful in Christ, Greeting.

This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. 2 Tim. iii, 1.

But there were false prophets among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. 2 Peter ii. 1.

Church of the living God awake, arise to your high calling. Behold we are even now in the very midst of the times here spoken of. As we near the end of our journey perils or dangers multiply. We are told that false Christs and false prophets shall arise and shall deceive if it were possible the very elect. Observe, it is not possible to deceive them, and why? Because they have put on the whole armor of God. Read what that is as given in Eph. iv. 14–18. We are to be enwrapped with truth. Yes with revealed truth as laid down in the sure word of the Lord. Right doing is to be our breastplate. If we do right we will be invincible to any and all attacks of the foe. Our feet are to be shod with the preparation of the gospel. Yes knowing what the gospel teacheth we may well feel confidence to march against any false teacher who proposes to teach another gospel than that which our beloved brother, Paul, taught and proclaimed with boldness before lofty potentates and clamoring crowds. He preached a resurrection only through the Christ. A crucified and risen Lord was the basis of his proclamation of salvation and the only means which he proclaimed it possible to accept that Christ was by faith. This implicit faith in him and his power to give unto us the life to come will be a shield to us and will effectually ward off every false theory and human speculation that arises to allure those who are not fully arrayed in gospel armor. Thank God this gospel armor reaches from head to foot. No member or faculty is left outside to be made the prey of man's vain speculation. The helmet of salvation gives us an intelligent understanding of the blessed and wondrous truths wrought out for man in God's plan of salvation.

Man's intellect separates him from the brute creation, and exalts him to the highest pinnacle of glory in all this lower creation, and by this intellect he grasps divine truth and exalts it to a highest place that all with whom he comes in contact may look up and learn from him the power of truth as revealed in the book. But there is one item more of this armor and the most important of all. It is the sword of the Spirit, and this we are told is the word of God. In time of peace, or even prospective peace, the sword may give place to the plough-share or some other instrument, but in time of war we must have the sword. These "Perilous times" in which we live are surely times of war, of Christian warfare, for even now the enemy is coming in "like a flood," Isa. lix. 19, and it behooves us to lift up a standard, even the sure word of the "Lord against it." The enemy is stealing into the ranks of professed believers of all classes, and there are among us false teachers who are bringing in and holding forth damnable heresies for they even deny the Lord that bought them and pervert his word and his way and make of no effect the word of God through vain philosophy. The book plainly declares "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be condemned." These false teachers say, Nay, they shall not be condemned, they shall all be saved.

The book declares, Psa. xxxvii, But the wicked shall perish, the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away. They that be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; they that are cursed of him shall be cut off. Again these false teachers say it is not the wicked that will be cut off or destroyed, it is only their wickedness. On the same plane of reasoning we may say it is not the righteous that will be saved, it is only their righteousness that will be saved. Behold then where we are led. Impersonal wickedness! Impersonal righteousness! And to maintain harmony we must also have an Impersonal God. This heresy is making fearful inroads into the professed Church of God. Nearly every religious paper is holding forth its vain, unscriptural theories to a gazing world and thousands upon thousands are falling into the subtle snare, only too willing to believe that whatever fruit their lives here may bring forth it will be well with them in the end. O what a fatal mistake not to realize that "He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." "But he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

Brethren and sisters awake and look into the matter before you too are caught in the meshes of this net cast into the sea of human speculation, which gathers all and casts not the bad away. And in conclusion let me assure you all, for I speak what I know by the study of the written word, that the door through which this gross error has crept into our ranks is by not accepting the plain teaching of the book on the subject of the resurrection. If this sublime theme was accepted as taught in the word no such error would have led captive the unwary. On this subject I will speak again ere long, D. V. Your sister seeking for the light of life as revealed.

MRS. CARRIE WILLIAMS.

A SEPTEMBER MORNING TALK.

It is a comfort to improve, even though slowly, in such an ordinary and common-place matter as health. Yet health is of inestimable value. Appetite, digestion, and assimilation —the resumption or improvements of functions of brain and nerves, liver and muscles, and all the mechanism of the body, these things are good and very welcome. A ten weeks' indisposition has its compensations and consolations.

What a comfort too, to feel that one has the confidence and sympathy of human beings! During all my sluggish and rather weary hours, how isolated and unnoticed I felt! People are too busy to call and see one who is ill, but yet not urgently or dangerously. Last evening I thought I would go down to the chapel, and possibly I would go in to meeting. After a while I met a good friend and I said to him —"I really fear I would not be welcome to the gathering inside." "Of course you would," said he, in his generous hearty way—"come in, come in." And that settled it. Just so much there is in a word. And I really had more than usual freedom in speaking.

I not long ago read an article or communication in the New York World, by Carlotta, the aeronaut. After giving an account of her balloon adventures, with some of her perils and marvelous escapes, she says—"It is a hobby with both my husband and myself to navigate the air by existing and convenient currents, and we are doing it all the time. I may say that today, aerial navigation is a positive fact, just as certain as water navigation is by sails—and we are prepared in case of war, to make any city like New York, absolutely untenantable, or blow up cheaply the biggest fleet of the most impregnable war vessels that can threaten New York from the sea. We are prepared jointly to make sealed proposals for the latter undertaking and guarantee the absolute protection of any port." Indeed nothing seems more certain than that a balloon laden with bombs may be capable of the most appalling destruction to people or places underneath. And in this connection, it is curious to observe the frequent announcement of new inventions of explosive powers or forces—modifications or combinations,—of yet more deadly and terrible quality and effect than hitherto. In some good day coming the world will have rest. The race between defensive and offensive devices will be ended. How sweet and deep, a rest can be! A rest from fears, anxieties, self-reproaches even—a rest from tyranny of wrongs and errors, raging or reigning for ages.

Combats of opinion? The world is full of diverse or antagonized ideas, especially the world ecclesiastic. I see no way but quietly to do the best I can, and pretty largely avoid mingling in the strife. One can hold his faith of things as to God—and in his conscious imperfection, with tears and prayers commit all to the keeping of a good Creator and Father.

By the way, the idea of the Divine Father is a consolation. Who does not need a father? An earthly father dies. The eternal cannot die—and he is infallible, compassionate, unchangeably good,—a Father perfect, faithful and true. How we need his love, help and direction!

I am working a little in the garden, if the spot is not too small to deserve the name. Among other things, around a large chestnut stump I excavate holes where I can place some grapevines—and they will thrive as the roots of the tree decay. Grapes are grand, and worth rearing and caring for. How grand it will be when Palestine is reset with vines and trees from one end to the other,—when the trees and streams mutually help each other,—when skill and enterprise have repaired the heart-breaking wastes—when artesian wells send their currents of life spouting like cataracts, and the deserts laugh and bloom again! Lord, revive thy work in our own hearts, and in all places and ways of prophecy and promise!

Meantime wickedness rages and folly goes mad. Yesterday, four young men were sent hand-cuffed from Westfield to Springfield. Cause and occasion—theft and drunkenness. But where are the sells and the manacles for the rum-seller? He goes clear and free. He does his devilish work with impunity. He, a hoary old sinner, it may be, while his youthful victims go to prison or jail. O land and times of ways and things unequal! In some day and age coming—this sin of man-killing and boy-killing will be better appreciated.

Perhaps it was an unwise thought. But this morning I almost coveted the authority and power to sweep away the iniquities and wrongs and sorrows of the world. I said aloud, I would dash into ruin every groggery in the universe. True, it would trouble the rum-drinkers some, but they would have to stand it—and the selfish heartless man-killing readers they would have to stand it too. They could turn their attention to something else. I would with my demolishing and purifying broom, sweep into oblivion every gambling den, every house of ill-fame, every nursery and haunt of vice. But God is the Lord, and he knows what is best. I am but a minute speck in immensity. God will in his time, and in good time, do the demolishing. Little do we know of him who is good and great, beyond conception,—whose nearest fixed star is 160 thousand millions of miles away, and yet others, not less than two hundred thousand times farther yet.

Colder weather is coming, and I never felt more willing to have the breath of frost come breathing down from the north. I find that in warm days I do not sensibly gain strength, but that there is tonic power in the autumnal cold. Something like elasticity and vigor come with the sinking and shrinking of the mercury in the thermometer and I could bear even deep snows for the sake of the life in the north wind.

The new life,—the new creation,—this is what one may well and truly welcome. To put it into few words, call it the resurrection from the dead. For not alone they who are moulder-ing into dust, need a resurrection,—but we who are yet alive,—we need it. We need it because by virtue of sense and reason and sensibility, we feel and realize our great lack continually. If we know anything, and in all the things that we know, we know we need a resurrection. This will mean resurrection and salvation from all sin and pain—from all disability—from danger and temptation.

I liked the article a few weeks ago by Benjamin Wilton. A word of appreciation is often welcome.

I must not be lengthy and tedious. Long articles are generally tiresome, and sometimes afflictive even, and I would scrupulously avoid this trial to my neighbor whom I ought to love as myself.

How many things there are to write about! Yesterday, I understood the Methodist preacher discussed so-called "Christian science," denouncing it. And I thought if I was ten degrees steeper, I would like to write six articles on that topic. And while conceding some good apparently done in the way of cures, I should be compelled, after long consideration, to pronounce its doctrines in a serious and material degree, unscriptural. But my articles should not be long, not over about two columns each.

When strength comes, we shall see. It is not best to promise any thing. The future is humanly too uncertain.

THE JEWISH PILGRIM.

Are these the ancient holy hills
Where angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story fills
With glory not yet cold?
For I have pass'd by many a shrine,
O'er many a land and sea—
But still, O promised Palestine,
My dreams have been of thee!

I see thy mountain cedars green,
Thy valleys fresh and fair,
With summers bright as they have been
When Israel's home was there.
Though o'er thee sword and time have past,
And cross and crescent shone,
And heavily the chain hath press'd—
But thou art still our own!

Thine are the wandering race that go
Unblest through every land,
Whose blood hath stained the Polar snow
And quenched the desert sand.
And thine the homeless heart that turn
From all earth's shrines to thee,
With their lone faith, for ages borne
In sleepless memory.

For thrones are fall'n and nations gone
Before the march of Time,
And where the ocean roll'd alone
Are forests in their prime,
Since Gentile plowshares mark'd the brow
Of Zion's holy hill;—
Where are the Roman Eagles now?—
Yet Judah wanders still!

And hath she wandered thus in vain,
A pilgrim of the past?
No!—long deferr'd her hope hath been—
But it shall come at last;
For in her wastes a voice I hear,
As from some prophet's urn—
It bids the nations build not there,
For Jacob shall return!

Oh! lost and loved Jerusalem,
Thy pilgrim may not stay
To see the glad earth's harvest home
In thy redeeming day;
But now resigned in faith and trust
I seek a nameless tomb—
At least beneath thy hallowed dust
Oh! give the wanderer room!

PALESTINE AND THE JEWS.

A striking passage in reference to the Jews occurs in Isaiah x. 23: "For the Lord of hosts shall make a consumption even determined in the midst of all the land." By the phrase, "in the midst of all the land," we understand all the world in general. At the appointed time, which will be, I presume, in a few years, a fine fever with respect to the return of certain people to Palestine, will possess all men—a fever that will spread itself out in all parts of the world. It is determined upon already in the counsel of the Divine mind. A perfect mania will possess the nations, and the general topic of conversation in a very few years from today will be Palestine and its advantages.

This emigration fever will rage most violently among the Jews; then it will take hold of other races and nations; for the prophet Isaiah assures us that God will gather others to him besides the literal seed of Judah and of Israel. The exertions of the Church, the forces of the nations, are hastening on the preparatory conditions of this great consumption. Very soon Jerusalem will become pre-eminent. Salem will stand once more, lifting her head from the dust, and standing with majesty among the nations of the earth, she will again be the glory of all lands. Many men are ready to ask how this consumption will be brought about, and because they are not now interested in any great degree, they rather doubt the matter. Neither their doubts, nor anything, any difficulties that they can see in their mind just now, will stand in the way of him who reigns in the heavens, who will, in his own good time, bring his own purposes to pass.

It is often very difficult beforehand to say by what means God is going to produce certain things, what means he will adopt to bring about certain events. The great point for us all to settle is, Is this thing to take place? The signs of the time seem, I think, in some degree, to forecast this great event. Think of the beautiful imagery of the Savior, "Ye see the fig-tree putting forth its leaves, and ye know that summer is nigh." So, also, when certain things are fulfilled, do we know that other things must come to pass. The signs of the times indicate very clearly that the period of this consumption is not very far distant.

The method and enthusiasm attending upon such a work we may form an idea of by looking in our own times, and, in times past, at similar movements. Twenty years ago no man could have predicted the enthusiasm that rages through Canada touching Manitoba. There was not a man who had prescience enough to see that that part of the Dominion would take possession of homes, of hearts, of minds, of interests, from one end of the Dominion to the other. The land was thought to be barren, the climate uncongenial, and no one would suppose that he could leave the fair fields and the lakes of the province of Ontario and go to that far-off land. But we see how soon a rage is created, how soon a consumption can be started. Now this is an evidence of what can be done if men can only get up an excitement or fever upon any point. You crowd out reason, and men become subject to the law of impulse, and follow out the line of that interest.

You may ask, Do the Jews take any knowledge of this? The Jews throughout the world are getting keenly alive to this question; their papers are now discussing it, and a great change is taking place in the Jewish mind on these points. The London Standard remarks, "It is interesting to notice the way in which the Jews, scattered throughout the world, are beginning to turn their eyes toward their own land. Palestine is not altogether a place to please a capitalist, but yet even such keen financiers as the Jews are busy buying it up. The Jewish Chronicle reckons now some 18,000 Jewish brethren in Jerusalem alone. It is said they are not a desirable population to maintain, yet $300,000, is sent to help these people maintain themselves.

The occupation of Palestine by a people who have retained an indestructability as a race, while they have learned a complete cosmopolitan character during these eighteen centuries—a nation at once European in education and Asiatic origin—would be by no means a bad arrangement. It might not be impolitic on the part of the European Powers to assist in placing so influential a people in so important a position, and would solve what, before many years, will be the vexed question among the nations—namely, the territory of Syria." Now, you might ask one of the Jewish brotherhood in Toronto here, and probably he would not know as much about it as I do, because he is not as much interested in the prophecies as I am. He is interested in doing business; he knows his own line of thought remarkably well, but he does not know the line of thought that runs in this direction. A man's eye is keen in the direction his interest lies.

Some time ago the Hebrew Observer had an article, which asked: "Is there no other destiny for Palestine but to remain a desert? Syria will soon be the entrepot between the East and the West, and the old trade will revive. Old cities will revive, and new ones will be built; the old time will come back, and the steam-car will run in the track of the caravan. Syria will be a place of trade; but the people who are pre-eminently the traders of the world, will they be there when the coming change takes place? The country wants capital and population. The Jew can give it both."

Do you know what the Jews do now at the close of the Feast of the Passover, and have done for the last 1800 years? At the close of that solemn day's services they take each other by the hand and say good-by; We meet at Jerusalem next year." They did so here in Toronto last year, and will do so again next year. They will as surely meet in Jerusalem some year as they have carried out the idea. They say, "Good-by; we meet in Jerusalem next year;" and they will say it until they do. Ah, brethren of Judah, some of your children, I believe, will live to realize this long-expected blessing. The outlines of history are fast filling in, and you will are long be placed in your own land, with the accumulated experience of centuries to guide you to duty and labor.

How will this be brought about? It will be brought about, as was the great deliverance in the land of Egypt; it will be brought about by God's own purpose. "For thus saith the Lord, It shall come to pass that they shall say no more, the Lord God which brought us up out of the land of Egypt, but, The Lord God liveth which brought us from all countries whithersoever he had scattered us, and placed us in our own land"—that is, they will forget about the deliverance from Egypt, and say, "The Lord God which brought us from all countries," etc. And the latter will be as true as the first; and when will it be? God has determined this great consummation, and it must take place. Are the Jews to be always outcasts, wandering over the earth? And yet all their sufferings may be traced to this—they prayed the prayer, "His blood be upon us and upon our children." Oh, that they had a clasp on their mouths when they asked that for their children! But it has been upon them, has it not? If you, free-thinker, if you, man that disbelieves the Bible, if you want a proof of an answered prayer, the blood lines and tracks down the centuries tell you that one prayer, at least in God's Word has been terribly answered.

What is it God said? That they should be wanderers, without national life, without government or king, until he should return them to their own land. And this has been true for 1800 years any way. Has not it? Do you not see that what he has been telling you about them is true? And he says there is to be a great consumption in the land. That is true also. There is to be a great consumption, in the province of God, and they are to be gathered together. They will be persecuted, until they say in their own sorrow: "Let us go into our own land."

We shall be glad to see them go, my brethren, to that land which is theirs of right. We may argue as we will, but I am myself under the impression that the time is now near for the call to go forth, as the cry is said to have run like an electric shock through the French when Bonaparte gave out his first proclamation: "Frenchmen, come home!" And no God will cause those wandering ones to come home, and they will hear the call and return in peace to their ancient land.—Joseph Wild, D. D., in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Wentbee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a convulsating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of unscriptural interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 540 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. ## ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or embalmed the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party bows to Romanism. The national policy be as slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE MAN OF SIN. 2 Thess. ii. No. 8.

POPISH CLAIMS TO MIRACULOUS POWERS.

A considerable time having elapsed since my last article on this subject appeared, it may be of advantage to remind the readers of various points which have been dealt with.

There was first a separate article on "The Antichrist," in which it was maintained that this term had reference to a class of professed Christian teachers in the first century, expressly described by the Apostle John. That they had then appeared was distinctly affirmed by the apostle in his first letter, their chief feature being purely doctrinal, namely, "denying that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh." No political or ecclesiastical significance was attached to them, and they are not mentioned under this name by any other New Testament writer. It was hence contended that the antichrist was not necessarily to be identified with the "Man of Sin," or with any similar ecclesiastical or political personage or power mentioned in prophecy, as having a fulfilment subsequent to the first century.

In the articles entitled, "Man of Sin," it was maintained that the phrase "temple of God" is sometimes used to describe the church, and that the term "worship" is used to express that homage which is paid to persons in authority. This again was found to be a common signification, in the Scripture usage, of the term "god," and instances of this usage were given both from the Old and the New Testaments, where both human rulers and false deities are termed "gods." It is therefore quite admissible to understand the terms referred to in their secondary sense in the passage under consideration, unless forbidden by the particular circumstances of the case. It was maintained that the bishop of Rome exactly answered to the description given in the passage when the terms are taken in this secondary sense, namely, that he opposes and exalts himself against all civil and ecclesiastical rulers.

It was also maintained that the terms "iniquity," in the phrase "mystery of iniquity," and the term "wicked" in the phrase "that wicked," have a special meaning, and signify respectively "lawlessness" and "lawless." This being a clear and definite meaning, must be used to determine the sense of the more vague term "sin" in the designation, "man of sin."

The aim of the whole may be summed up thus, The Man of Sin is a professedly Christian official man, in whom came to be headed up all power, ecclesiastical and civil, and this by a usurpation of the liberties and privileges of Christian disciples and State citizens, in defiance of all laws divine and human, the mystery of which lawlessness was already working in the days of the apostles, and came to a head soon after the undivided Roman empire fell to pieces, in the fifth century.

This last point was treated of at length in the last article, under the verse, "And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time." My contention was that the man of sin found the hindrance to his development in a certain phase of the fourth universal dominion, symbolised by the fourth beast of Daniel's vision, namely the Roman empire in its undivided state, which dominated the entire known world (with the exception of India and China) and that both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs. The intimation, "He who now letteth (hindereth) will let (or hinder) until he be taken out of the way," found fulfilment in that divided condition which supervened upon the dissolution of the Roman Empire in A. D. 476, the way having been prepared by the emperor Constantine a century and a half before, in organising the church after the model of the empire with a gradation of officials, such as Metropolitans or Archbishops, Patriarchs, Bishops (as distinct from Presbyters or Elders), etc., and also in removing the seat of empire from Rome to Byzantium, which he greatly enlarged and embellished, and named after himself, Constantinople. "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," dating from this point, the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, especially in the ecclesiastical sphere, gradually but surely came in its place, attaining even to secular sovereignty of several territories in Italy, known in history as the "States of the Church," besides obtaining supremacy over all civil rulers in the world.

We come now to consider another feature of this remarkable power, namely that indicated in verses 9 and 10 of 2 Thess. ii., "Whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness." The three principal terms here used are identical with those in Heb. ii. 4, which clearly refer to those supernatural works (so-called) by which the gospel message was authenticated. These terms are dynamis, semeion, and teras. Dynamis and semeion are rendered miracle, the first eight times and the second twenty-two times in the New Testament; teras is rendered "wonder" sixteen times, and is not rendered by any other word. From these facts it is evident that the "man of sin" described by Paul in Thess. ii. professes to wield the same power as the apostles of our Lord, such as in speaking in foreign languages, healing the sick, discerning of spirits, and even in raising the dead.

Another point to be noted here is that the term "lying" is in the Common Version applied only to "wonders," but surely it could not be maintained that "lying wonders" are here conjoined with true "power and signs." Without seeking to test the point grammatically, as the question of limitation is of little consequence, I cite the authority of several translators. Wakefield renders the clause, "with all imposture of miracles and of signs and wonders." Dr. Macknight has "with all power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood," and so substantially the translation of Archbishop Newcome. The Paragraph Bible (anonymous, Bartlett, London) has "with all false miracles and signs and lying wonders." From these it appears quite admissible to apply the term "lying" to the three terms here used.

Here then is a description of a person or power professing to wield agencies of the same class as those conferred by Christ on his apostles, and that such agencies are not real, but false (pseudo).

I have to mention here that this part of the subject has proved of much greater extent than I anticipated, and being at the same time of great importance from various points of view, I venture to crave the indulgence of yourself and the readers of THE RESTITUTION, while I present a considerable amount of testimony on this particular feature of the Roman Catholic pretensions; but which I promise the reader shall not be destitute of interest. In truth a knowledge of it is of great value to the student of prophecy.

There has been a good deal of controversy on this subject of Papal miracles, or as some call them, "ecclesiastical miracles." In the last century the claims of the Roman Catholic Church were strongly opposed by Conyers Middleton, D. D., Librarian of the Public Library, Cambridge, who wrote a considerable work on the subject, in which he showed the extreme untrustworthiness of the early Fathers as witnesses in such a matter. Some important extracts from his work will be given anon. In the present century the question was revived in connection with what is known as the Tractarian controversy which started at Oxford in England by the publication (anonymously) of a series of papers entitled, "Tracts for the Times," extending from 1833 to 1841. In Chamber's Encyclopædia it is stated that through this movement "the doctrines of Apostolical succession, priestly absolution, baptismal regeneration, the real presence, the Authority of the Church and the value of tradition, were widely revived and taught. A powerful antidote, however, was not long in being provided. Mr. Isaac Taylor, an eminent and voluminous writer of the period, took up the question, on the appearance of the last of the Tracts (No. 90), and went thoroughly into the whole subject, in a highly masterly style." Some important extracts from this work will also be given.

About this time John Henry Newman D. D., a leading Tractarian writer of Oxford, and the author of Tract No. 90 already mentioned, (who afterwards joined the Church of Rome and was made a Cardinal), wrote an introduction to a portion of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History (translated into English), which he afterwards published in a separate form (1842), extending to upwards of 200 pages. The object of this introduction was to defend the so-called Ecclesiastical Miracles of the early centuries of the Christian era. Special reference will also be made to this work, especially as to the use which the author makes of our Lord's intimation (Mark xvi. 17-20) to his apostles of a promise of working miracles to them that believe.

In the meantime I ask the attention of your readers to some authoritative evidence from an authentic Roman Catholic source, to prove that, even in the present century, the claim of miraculous working exists in full force in that institution down to the present moment. This will serve as a basis upon which further argument, Scriptural or otherwise, can be satisfactorily gone into.

In perusing these quotations, there is one thing I wish the reader to note with special care, namely, the extreme untrustworthiness of what is called tradition in relation to Christian faith and practice. Tradition will be seen to rest chiefly on the testimony of men (known as the Fathers, most of whom were canonised or made saints), whose reasoning powers were either of the feeblest order, or blinded by a degree of credulity reducing them in many instances to the extreme of illiness. This will be seen where the extracts from their own writings are given; but I give here one sample in the case of Justin Martyr, who affirmed that the Greek Version of the Old Testament was made by seventy elders sent from Jerusalem to Egypt who were shut up in separate cells, and each obliged to translate the whole Bible apart. Their several translations agreeing verbatim were thus demonstrated to be of divine authority. It is on the authority of such men that the great mass of popular theology (especially Romish) is found to rest.

J. CAMERON.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 20.

BY DR. J. K. THOMPSON.

THE THEOZOIC, OR AGE TO COME.

From what has already been presented under the head of the Post-tertiary, or Quarternary Age in relation to the gospel and the life-work of the Christ of God, conceptions more or less clearly defined have, doubtless, been formed of the period under present consideration as revealed in prophecy. The Theozoic Age comprises all that pertains to the Kingdom of God from its inception as the future dominant power over the nations of the earth, Jew and Gentile, onward through the infinite duration of the eternal years beyond. It comprehends the completion of the Babylonian King's vision, as prefigured by the finished work of the stone cut out without hands, which after smiting the image on the feet, and breaking it to pieces, became a great mountain that filled the whole earth. It is no longer the stone which the builders rejected, but having fallen on the nations and ground them to powder, has absorbed the elements thereof and reorganised them into a vast theocracy, which in its finished, mountain form, assimilates all of them into one vast universal empire,—the fifth,—to endure forever under the rule of Christ, for whom the age and the kingdom had been prearranged from before the foundation of the world.

The kingdoms of this world uniformly possess certain elements in common,—elements which inhere in every nation, and without which they would cease to exist. They appertain no less to the empires of antiquity than to the subdivisions of the national governments of the present time and it will be observed that the prophecy of the Theozoic Age literally fills the pattern furnished by all the kingdoms of the historic age, in its elemental structure. As an illustration of this great fact we may remark that the kingdoms of the past and present have each had a time and place of beginning, and a period of development and growth before reaching perfect independence, and before attempting to assert supreme control over inferior powers, or reaching the acme of their national glory.

The Babylonian power existed as a monarchy for many centuries before attaining its "head of gold" form, and national standing. The earliest records yet discovered are those of a monarch whose capital was Ur, (now Muheiy). Centuries apparently after this, a fresh invasion from Elam, is recorded, to which the exact date can be assigned of 2289 B. C. Another Elamite conqueror, named Gudur-mabug, extended his sovereignty over Palestine, and it is inferred that a sovereign of this dynasty is the Chedorlaomer of Genesis. Sometime after this the seat of power was finally fixed at Babylon and the Semitic tongue now began to supersede the Accadian." (Library Univ. Knowledge). After struggling for centuries,—a puny, ill-organized nation,—it reached, at length its zenith of prosperity; ruled as the dominant power, and was finally subjugated only through intrigue and strategy by Cyrus the Great.

The Median and Persian powers, too, had their periods of rise, progress, or growth to maturity, time of national supremacy and ultimate downfall. Greece was anciently divided into a number of petty states, each composed of a city and a portion of territory of greater or less extent immediately surrounding it. No King ruled the country, neither were they united by any bond of union; nor had they any common council or government. National emergencies and national dangers begat leagues at various times, but they usually ended in strife and divisions. Growing, gradually, with the advance of years, and with very many interneoine disruptions, it at length, under Alexander the Great, gained the supreme rulership of the known world, and soon fell. Rome, also, had its insignificant beginning, ran its course through bloodshed and the ambition of unscrupulous rulers, to national supremacy and succumbed. Its events of rise, progress to national glory and decline, as well as the illustrious personages who shaped its destiny from its infantile weakness to perfection and ultimate decay are almost as well known as in the history of our own land and nation. It is true, too, that every nation and kingdom from the decline of the barbaric or pagan Roman power to the present time, has had a time of rise and development. None have sprung into national existence, or assumed a noted position among the governments of the earth, except through a protracted period of incubation, growth, and eventually strength and power. Of the incubative portion of the kingdom of God we have already taken notice under the description of the events peculiar to the Quarternary age, and to those of the judgment day with which it was closed. The stone that was cut out of the mountain without hands was not itself a mountain at the first, neither did it fill the whole earth. It had its period of preparation, (of being cut out), then its waiting time, and its time of smiting the image, and the disposal of the image-materials, and subsequently it became a great mountain and filled the whole earth. In illustrating the processes required for its perfect development the Savior left on record many beautiful parables. At one time he compared it to "a grain of mustard seed which a man took and sowed in his field; which is indeed the least of all seeds; but when it is grown it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof;" Matt. xiii. 31, 32; and again, to "leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened," Matt. xiii. 33, and at another to a "net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind; which, when it was full, they drew to the shore, and sat down and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away. So shall it be in the end of the world," (at the end of the historic age and the inception of the judgment era,) "the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth," Matt. xiii. 47-50; and, at another, also, to a "certain nobleman who went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return;" Luke xix. 12; all of which teach of the formation and development stage, prior to the age under present consideration. This is not only true, but it is also equally true that all the prophecies of strife, warfare, anguish and destruction of the nations, relate specially to the incubative time, or period of incompleteness, and not to the completion of the kingdom of God. This rule is imperative. Whenever any scenes are portrayed indicative of, or connected with individual or national calamity, sorrow, distress, suffering, death or destruction, they invariably locate the time in which they transpire before the introduction of the Theozoic Age. The time, place and circumstances concerned in its organization, the national disturbances, etc., necessary to its introduction, are all past ere this age is ushered in, and have been treated somewhat briefly, under former divisions of the subject. It now remains to investigate the elements entering into its formation; its vastness of extent and duration; its superior means of perpetuating life,—and its effect on the earth's inhabitants, and on the earth itself, before closing.

Of the elements which are necessary to national existence, the kingdom of God has the following in common with every nation of the past and present, as is shown by the prophecies concerning it, to wit:

1st. A Territory.....Daniel referred to this when he "saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages, should serve him; his dominion is as an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed," Dan. vii. 13, 14. David, also, saw a time when "all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee. For the kingdom," says he, "is the Lord's and he is the governor among the nations," Psa. xxii. 27, 28. So Isaiah, too, prophecies that "they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Chap. xi. 9. Habakkuk, also, "His glory," says he, "covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise," iii. 3. Confirming this we may read "the Lord Most High is terrible: he is a great King over all the earth," Psa. xlvii. 2, and too, "All the earth shall worship thee, and shall sing unto thee," Ib. lxvi. 4. Isaiah prophesies of the territory of that age by saying, for the Creator "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered nor brought into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a blessing, and her people a joy," Isaiah lxv. 17, 18. If the present globe were stricken out of existence and a new orb, made up of different materials was made to replace it in its orbit, the new creation would not be the earth, old or new, and the fact that the new creation retains the name, Earth, suggests the thought that in its new form the new earth is the same one on which God has wrought through all the lengthened periods of the past ages, and that its being made new again is not by the annihilation and removal of the Post-tertiary earth but rather its renovation and reconstruction, adapting it to the new forms of animated existence to predominate through the age. The change from the Mollusoan age earth, with its corals, crinoids, star-fish and earth-worms, to one supporting an advance to the vertebrate fauna of the Devonian, was as certainly a new creation as will be that of which the prophet Isaiah has proclaimed. And the new conditions necessary to be established, and brought out by the dense flora of the Carboniferous era whereby Devonian fishes were supplanted by a predominance of air-breathing reptiles required a new creation scarcely less note-worthy than that requisite for the Theozoic, from the Post-tertiary. Nor were the mammalian quadrupeds, or man himself equal to the task of subsisting amid the lagoons and morasses, the lakes, fens and moors of the Mesozoic, therefore a wise Creator re-created the old earth of that age and geology has named the new creation the Cenozoic Age. Each age has terminated the predominance of a given form of life, and the new creations of the new heavens and new earth have been adapted to each other, and to the new character of the new earth of that age, as well as to the general plan of an All-wise Creator, so nicely as to merit, and receive the commendation of the Creator at the close of the age, when the earth was again prepared for a new creation, with an advance in the fauna and flora towards the ultimate perfection sought from the foundation of the world. John in his banishment "saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away," and among the physical peculiarities of that new earth he records that "there was no more sea," Rev. xxi. 1.

It is no severe labor to deduce from the quotations already made that the territory of the Kingdom of God will be the earth. That it will be purified and rendered Eden-like in its general characteristics is undoubtedly true as may readily be shown. Each of the ages preceding is have had a flora peculiar to itself. From the oldzhamla phylum of the lower Silurian beds, (the oldest Zoophyte known) to the dense foliage and fleshy stems of the non-fructiferous, flowerless trees and plants of the Carboniferous coal measures, or the beautiful flowers, and profuse fruitage of the Tertiary and Quarternary ages, there have been a perfect adaptation of the products of the earth to the age that produced them. If this is a prophecy of an advance from the present time in the flora of the future age, it is no exaggeration to expect that "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose," Isa. xxxv. 1, or, that "all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off," Ib. lv. 12. It is not beyond expectation that, with the removal of the curse from the earth in the close of the Quarternian Judgment, Edenic fertility and productiveness will prevail, enhanced by the horticultural and agricultural increase and experience of the present time, and that "at the bank of the river, will be very many trees on the one side and on the other," with immense fruitage for the perpetuation of life, and the welfare of the human family. The prophet has borne record that these waters of the river of life "issue out towards the east country and go down into the desert, and go into the sea: which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed. And it shall come to pass that everything that liveth, which moveth, wherever the rivers (margin, two rivers) shall come, shall live: and there shall be a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither: and everything shall live whither the river cometh. And it shall come to pass that the fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim: they shall be place to spread forth nets: their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many. But the miry places thereof and the marshes thereof shall not be healed: they shall be given to salt. And by the river upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed: it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine, (margin, for bruises and sores)," Ezekiel xlvii. 9. To John, also, the angel showed, after having allowed him to behold the new heavens and the new earth, and its glorious metropolitan city, descending down from God out of heaven,—"a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it (the new Jerusalem) and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bore twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations," Rev. xxii. 1. Yes, the tree of life, lost in Eden, is one of the restorations of the Theozoic age; the fruit of which renders the individual partakers Immortal, while its leaves, overcome the morbid conditions, and injuries to which the age-inhabitants may be liable. Truly, the earth will be a desirable abode for the earth-dwellers of that unending age, and it will be readily conceded that, although "the heaven, even the heavens are the Lord's, yet the earth hath he given to the children of men," Psa. cxv. 16. The false delusions of a home in heaven,—a home beyond the skies, etc., will yield to the glories of a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, uncursed by sin, and sorrow, and death, —the long-prepared territory of the everlasting Kingdom of God.

The Peculiar Sphere of Prayer.

He will regard the prayer of the destitute and not despise their prayer. Psa. cii. 17. This Psalm is replete with blessings for God's chosen people, Israel, and in an especial manner when he shall again arise to build up Zion. It is then he will appear in his glory, then comes the words of the text, and the following verses declare his purpose and will, on that auspicious morning, the morning of the creation of the new heavens and the new earth. "Behold I create new heavens and a new earth." This shall be written for the generation to come; and the people which shall be created shall praise the Lord. To hear the groaning of the prisoner; to loose those that are appointed to death; to declare the name of the Lord in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem: when the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms to serve the Lord. Vs. 18, 20-22.

THE LORD'S PRAYER, A MODEL PRAYER.

To pray intelligently, i. e., with the spirit and the understanding also, (and no other prayer is acceptable) will effectually prevent our praying at random, or "for everything in general and nothing in particular." True prayer is the language of want, of desire for some blessing which we need, something specific to meet our wants or needs. But it should be circumscribed within Jehovah's proscribed limits, within the proper circle of his promises. It is not pretended, however, that we should repeat verbatim every item recorded by the different evangelists, for the good reason that they used different expressions, showing conclusively, we think, that the Lord's prayer is merely an outline map, fixing the proper boundaries, beyond which we should not go. It is a model for brevity, yet comprehensive.

One very important item in one of our Lord's prayers to his Father, should not be overlooked or ignored, viz., when he prayed that this cup might pass from him, "nevertheless not as I will, but as thou will." Here he struck the keynote, and this should be the grand characteristic of every prayer which ascends to our Heavenly Father, through our only mediator and antitypical high priest, as well as our prospective King, to reign on his father David's throne on Mt. Zion and in Jerusalem and before his ancients gloriously, in the earth redeemed from the curse. May this auspicious morning soon dawn on this now sin-cursed earth, and may it soon bloom again like Eden, and the kingdom of Israel be inaugurated or restored unto David's greater Son, is the sincere prayer of every true Christian.

The office work of prayer is also to impart a reflex influence on ourselves, to get ourselves right, in order to receive the blessings which our Heavenly Father may see fit to impart, and not what we may think we need. "Not my will, but thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven." This should always be our motto and watchword at all times, and under all circumstances.

A DEFINITE conclusion to hold the contemplated National Conference has finally been reached. A definite notice specifying both place and time from Bro. G. F. Work with some accompanying remarks will be found in the current issue. We hope and pray that such an encouraging beginning may be made as shall lead to important results in the future. Let our distant Western States send two delegates at least, or if very remote, let several churches combine and send one. Very few of our local churches can send a representative, but what one organization can not do alone and by itself, may be done through combined effort with comparative ease. We offer these remarks suggestively.

WE have just received a work of much more than ordinary interest from E.d. D. T. Taylor entitled—A Chariot of fire. The cars in Prophecy and History. With the Wonders of Rapid Travelling and Significance of the Modern Railway System." The work is designed to fully and particularly illustrate Dan. xii. 4, and Nahum ii. 3-5. The author shows, by his careful treatment of these texts, that he is an earnest, sober, pains-taking writer. At times his style is powerfully descriptive. A work well worth reading in our times. Price 25 cts. Address Author Hyde Park, Mass.

GOD'S HAND IN HISTORY.

The Most High ruleth in the Kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. Dan. iv. 25.

Proceeding now in this, our second article, to give some further account of early explorations and settlements in America, and having briefly noticed the earliest explorations and settlements by the Spanish and English, we will now as briefly refer to the earliest colonizations made by the French. It appears that the first attempt to colonize any part of this continent by the French was made by De Monts, some other Frenchman, and a few Jesuits in 1604, who established themselves in Nova Scotia, a country to which they gave the name Acadia. This peninsula is said to have been discovered by the Cabots as early as 1497. The English claimed this country by the right of this discovery. There were several contests between these nations for this part of the land, which were embittered by the desire to have the exclusive right to the fisheries. Finally, as a result of these quarrels, the Acadians were expelled from the country and dispersed among other British provinces to the number of about 18,000 persons. The inhabitants were compelled to give up all their property, their houses and crops were burned, and themselves forced away in such haste that very few families remained together. It was in 1534 that Jaques Cartier, a French navigator, made the discovery of Canada, and took possession of it in the name of the French king, despite the opposition of an Indian chief, who protested that his tribe owned the soil. To announce the religion of the discovering nation, a large wooden cross was erected on an eminence. In a subsequent voyage, made in 1535, he sailed up the St. Lawrence River, and, on Oct. 2nd arrived at an Indian settlement, called in their language Hochelaga, but to which he gave the name Mont Royal—Royal Mount—but which has since been contracted into Montreal.

On his return down the river he landed at the mouth of a smaller river to which he gave the name, Sainte Croix—Holy Cross—and passed the winter. At this place he lost quite a number of his men from scurvy and the severity of the climate. He, however, before sailing away, May 6, 1536, had taken formal possession of the land in the name of the French king, Francis I., by erecting a cross, bearing the arms of France as well as the inscription, "Franciscus primus, Dei gratia Francorum rex, regnat"—i. e., "Francis the First, by the grace of God, king of the French, reigns." Montreal, as a city, was founded in 1642, on the site of the Indian village, Hochelaga, and officially named Ville Marie—Mary-ville, or village.

The next noted navigator, and explorer, in the interest of France, was Samuel De Champlain the first governor of New France, and founder of Quebec. In 1599 he sailed to Mexico, and returned in 1601. In 1603 he made another voyage, and explored the St. Lawrence, carefully examining both shores of the river, and prepared a map. In another voyage, and during the years 1604-6, he and De Monts explored the coast as far as Cape Cod, making careful surveys and maps. In 1608 he was sent out again from France, and sailing up the St. Lawrence, he arrived July 3, at a place called Quebec, i. e., the Narrows, by the Indians, and decided to make a settlement there. In 1609, he ascended the Sorel River, and entered the Lake Champlain thus named from him, as the discoverer.

Without detailing the incidents connected with Indian wars, in which Champlain took an active part, and, also, without particularizing events connected with several voyages to and from Europe, we content ourself with sketching an outline of more subsequent history as connected with this energetic explorer. After having arranged more favorable terms for the fur trade, and after having formed a trading colony, he, in 1615, brought over three priests to attend to the spiritual concerns of the new colony. One of these, Pere Canon, immediately set out for the country of the Hurons on the Georgian Bay. In 1620, Champlain brought over his wife, who remained till 1624 experiencing many severe hardships. Quebec was fortified and increased till in 1629 the Duke de Ventadour obtained the viceroyalty, and went to work to build up Canada. By him the first Jesuit missionaries were sent over to assist those of the Recollect order brought over by Champlain. In this year, 1629, Quebec was captured by the English, but Canada was by treaty restored in 1632, when Champlain was reinstated as governor, who returned in 1633, and who was welcomed back to the government by both settlers and Indians. Under his administration the Jesuits renewed their labors among the Indians, while Champlain directed his entire attention to develop his colony, and strengthening it against any future attack. He established a post on Richelieu Island and founded Three Rivers—Trois Riviers. He died Dec. 25, 1635.

Colonization by the French was of a semi-military, semi-religious character, as will be fully illustrated hereafter. Missionaries of the Recollect and particularly, of the Jesuit order, traversed the wild regions inhabited only by wild Indians, enduring great privations and almost incredible hardships to convert the Indians to the Romish faith. The French had frequent wars with the Indians, especially with the Iroquois a most ferocious tribe that dwelt on the south side of the lakes. As allies they had the Huron tribe who were of a far less warlike character. In 1638, this latter tribe were driven out of Upper Canada by the Iroquois, and compelled to take refuge on the island of St. Joseph, in the north part of Lake Huron, where large numbers of them perished miserably by famine in the winter. As it is our aim to point out the part enacted by the clerical adherents to the Romish faith, we will give some further account of the nature of the government and its administration in the colonization of Canada by the French. In very early times the administration of government was vested in governors and an officer termed an Intendant, so far as pertained to military and civil affairs, and with them another class termed Seigneurs, or lords, who possessed the right of administering justice in their seigneuries, and who exercised judicial functions. It appears that there were three governors at this period of colonial history, one at Quebec, one at Three Rivers and a third at Montreal. Jesuit and other priests became conspicuous in the public service. Later the French King, at the instance of the parliament of Paris, which had the supreme control of colonial affairs, established the conseil souverain de Quebec, "the sovereign council of Quebec." It was composed at first of the governor, the bishop, five councillors annually appointed, and a king's attorney. Subsequently a place was accorded to the intendant in this supreme council, and power given it to hold sittings at Three Rivers and Montreal.

This appointment of a bishop of Quebec became the cause of serious dissensions between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities. "At this early period it was a special object of the ambitious of the ecclesiastical power at Quebec to spread the dominion of the Romish Church as far as the remotest bounds of the western territory, and thus to civilize the Aborigines and establish the dominion of France over those distant regions. First among those who toiled and suffered to achieve these great objects were missionaries of the Jesuit order. This order was founded at Rome in 1539, by Ignatius Loyola, a Spaniard, of warm imagination, which awakened in him a zeal for religion. The members of the order were bound by the vows of poverty, chastity, and implicit obedience to superiors. In addition to these vows, they bound themselves to go unhesitatingly, and without recompense, whithersoever their superiors should send them, as missionaries for the conversion of the heathen, or for the service of the church in any other way, and to devote all their power and means to the accomplishment of the work."

It is recorded that the first mission established by the Jesuits in the French possessions in America was in 1611. Of these missionaries Quebec was the central home from whence they went far and wide. One of the Jesuits sent into Canada to assist the Recollects, about 1625, was named Brebeuf, who proceeded to the Huron country, but was soon recalled by the disasters of the colony. In 1632, he again visited the Hurons, extending his labors to the Neutres tribe on the Niagara. In 1634, he, and another Jesuit named Daniel, joined a party of Hurons who were returning home from Quebec, and going by the way of the Ottawa River, they established a station near a bay of Lake Huron, "where they daily rang a bell to call the savages to prayer, and performed those kind offices which were calculated to secure the confidence and affection of the tribes on the lake shores." Brebeuf clearly apprehended Indian character, and thoroughly acquired their language, which gave him influence and success among them. In a war between the Hurons and Iroquois, the town where he labored was taken and he and his associate, Lalemant, were taken and put to death with the most excruciating tortures.

As early as 1655, some attempts were made to establish missionary stations near the southwestern part of Lake Superior as well as at or near Green Bay on Lake Michigan. In 1668, the first settlement made within the limits of the State of Michigan was made by founding the Mission of St. Mary on the Southern shore of the strait between Lake Superior and Lake Huron. This mission was founded by Allouez, Dablon and Marquette, of whom we shall have more to say hereafter. In 1670 Great Britain had nine colonies in America, which were all established at different points along the Atlantic coast, and it was not till about eighty years later that the English attempted to plant a colony west of the Allegheny Mountains. But the French, in 1670, had extended their settlements along the St. Lawrence, and on the northern borders of Lake Ontario and Lake Erie. As we have seen, the Jesuits had penetrated as far westward as Lake Superior, and Lake Michigan. Not only were missionary stations established, but small stockade forts and trading posts were established to secure the lucrative fur trade. As we have already seen, civil, military and ecclesiastical authorities had been established at Quebec. The French monarch and his minister of finances inspired the colonists to extend the dominions of the French monarchy. Acting under the instructions received from their superiors, the missionaries and traders persuaded a number of the principal men of various tribes to meet them at the Falls of St. Mary, in May 1671. The Intendant of New France, as the country was then called, whose name was M. Talon, sent St. Lusson as his representative, with the Jesuit Allouez, as interpreter, to meet Indian delegates, who came "from the head waters of the St. Lawrence, the Mississippi, the Lakes, and even the Red River; and veteran officers from the armies of France, intermingled with here and there a Jesuit missionary." As had been done in other places, a cross was raised here, the arms of France were marked upon a post, and the representatives of the savage tribes were informed that they were now under the protection of the King of France. "In 1672, the missionaries Allouez and Dablon explored the eastern part of Wisconsin, the northeastern portion of Illinois, and, probably, traversed that part of Indiana which lies north of the Kankakee." We defer to another paper some account of these and others of the Jesuits who were engaged in the early explorations of the wilderness countries of North America.

Communications.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 6, 1888.

Dear Restitution:

We notice the very nice and cordial letter from our Brother Samuel Wilson, commending the idea of the proposed General Conference. Also the business like suggestions from Bro. Chase; the earnest appeal with a ring running through it, true as steel, from Sister Woodward. We trust she will be here. Also the pithy editorials, quite to the point, from our Editor; and the very proper explanations, made by Bro. Underwood. And we are glad to see that so able a body of men, of sober discretion, and who are so fully able to represent the church, have been chosen. The point commented on by Bro. Wilson as to the danger of the formation of a mere sect is a proper one, but, with the business committed to the hands of such delegates, there is no danger to be feared from that source. The explanation made by Bro. Underwood that the suggestion made in the call, relative to a number of small churches uniting upon one delegate was made in the interest of economy, and not to keep small churches, regularly organized, from being represented, is a very proper explanation and fully covers the ground. Every Church in the country should feel (and without respect to size) that it cannot afford not to be represented, and if it cannot send (as it would be best to do) its own delegate, let it select a delegate that may have been chosen by some other church, and have that delegate represent and cast the vote of their church also; but let no church be unrepresented and unknown at the Conference. The churches through the country have until Nov. 18th to arrange this matter among themselves. Then as to the religious exercises. We want a grand religious gathering—a camp meeting in the City,—full of fire and zeal, as well as an orderly business meeting, and we want all our preaching brethren to come (and bring their wives if they can) and help make and help enjoy this gospel feast. Whether elected delegates or not, their experience and advice will help the delegates to come to a proper decision on the business matters brought before them. Every preacher known and accepted by the General Church as such, whether a travelling Evangelist or a settled Pastor over an established church, will be made welcome and receive the same $20.00 toward defraying his expenses that is accorded to a regular delegate. What do some of our old workmates, such as brethren Eychaner, Corbaley, Read, Woodward, Wagoner, Hatch and many others of such like, say to this idea? And brethren and sisters from all over the country, however they may be situated, who love the pure doctrine and are able to bear their own travelling expenses, all such will be welcomed and taken care of during the Conference. Let none that can come, lose this opportunity of meeting each other of like precious faith from every section. Come. For the Church.

GEO. F. WORK.

Notice of the General Conference.

Philadelphia having been chosen by the voice of the Church as the place, and November 16th named as the time for the holding of the General Conference of the Church of God, and of other churches in sympathy with the general doctrines taught in that Church, notice is now given that the General Conference will convene on the afternoon of November 16th at the Blessed Hope Mission, corner of 12th and Dickinson streets, Philadelphia, and continue in session, if found necessary for a period of ten days from that date. The business questions embraced in the call made for this Conference and such other questions as the delegates may themselves decide to consider, will be brought up and decided upon by the regularly appointed delegates from the several churches, who shall cast the votes of the churches they represent in deciding these questions. It is proposed to have devotional and religious meetings carried on simultaneously with the business meetings, and to these, all preaching brethren and all brethren and sisters who can come are cordially invited to be present, and all who come will be provided and cared for during the sessions of the conference. It is hoped that all who can come will do so. Each delegate and each preacher or evangelist regularly appointed, and serving one or more churches, who may attend, will receive from the Philadelphia Church a contribution to make up any deficiency up to, but not exceeding, $20.00 in the amount supplied him from other sources toward his travelling expenses. Any regularly organized church may send one delegate and any group of churches may unite and send one delegate. Any State or local conference of churches may also be represented by a delegate. The following are offered as suggestions to delegates:

1st. A delegate may be appointed at any time before conference meets.

2nd. Let each delegate bring with him official notice of his having been appointed by the church he represents; such notice to be signed by some officer other than himself.

3rd. Let each delegate get together statistics as to membership and officers of the church he represents and of any neighboring church not represented, giving names, etc., of each, for purpose of record.

4th. Let each intending visitor, whether a delegate or not, send his name and address to Elder C. C. Ramsay, 1002 Mount Vernon Street, Phila. who will thus be able to provide accommodations for him.

5th. If any delegate or visitor cannot come for the entire time, he will probably accomplish the most by coming at the latter end of the conference. For the Churches at Phila.

C. C. RAMSAY.

Dear Restitution:

It is now sometime since I wrote you anything, not because I have nothing to write, but because I am such a poor writer that I hate to trouble the Editor to prepare my writing for the press. I left home April 11th, stopped in Illinois till the last of the week in May, and then proceeded to Gladbrook, Iowa. Staid over Sunday with the brethren, and from there I went to the State conference, held the first and second Sundays in June at the Watkins Flowing Wells, Story Co., Iowa. There I was chosen Evangelist. Commenced work June 18th, and continued to work for them till the last day of July. As harvest was on hand and the evenings so short, the committee thought best to stop.

Commenced preaching again when conference convened at Marathon, Buena Vista Co., Ia. Here we had a splendid meeting; four were baptized. We are having good meetings. One was baptized yesterday. The prospect for good is encouraging here.

During the time that I was released from evangelistic work I made a trip to Nebraska. Was met at Central City by Brother Fox on the 17th of August, and conveyed to his place of residence. He having obtained the Christian or Campbellite church to hold meeting in, we commenced on Saturday evening and continued until the next Friday evening when closed out or requested to stop. Their preacher abandoned us after our second discourse, not only staying away himself but keeping others away, until pressed by some of his own members to debate with me or attend and hear what I had to say so he might be able to refute it after I was gone. This he utterly refused to do, saying he would not attend the meetings and he would not give a challenge to debate, but said he would debate with me if I would challenge him. Then his brethren came and requested me to challenge him. I said I did not wish to challenge him, but after considerable talk I agreed to submit the following proposition:

"Do the Scriptures of divine truth teach that the kingdom of God spoken of in them is to be a future government of earth?"

That is what I was preaching and that I would affirm. But he would not accept, saying the proposition did not suit him; he raised objection to me on the ground that I was not an educated man. His brethren told him if I was not educated he would have that advantage, but all that could be said to him he could not be induced to debate with me. Then I offered to furnish him an educated man to debate with, and he could form the proposition to suit himself, set his time and I would have my man on the ground, and still he would not debate, but made a blow about his brethren voting him out of the house and letting me have it; he would just as soon a Mormon would have it as me.

This was about to make a church quarrel, so they requested us to withdraw. The way he received his brethren of voting was, that he was a Good Templar, and they voted the Good Templars out of the house, that is, they could not hold their meetings there any longer. We then moved our meetings to the school house and continued till the next Wednesday night. Thursday Brother Fox took me a distance of twenty-five miles to attend, will receive from the Phila. Church a contribution to make up any deficiency up to, but not exceeding, $20.00 in the amount supplied him from other sources toward his travelling expenses. Any regularly organized church may send one delegate Brother A. B. Thompson, where we held meeting again from Thursday night till Sunday night, having full and attentive houses. Thus ended our labors in Nebraska. Returned to Iowa in time for the conference at Marathon, and now we have commenced work for the conference again. Yours waiting for the King is his beauty. T. J. WHITESITT.

[Write again Brother Whitesitt; it is no trouble to "prepare" your writings for the press.]

The Depth of Bible Thought.

In the Bible there are certain little incidental—and apparently careless—touches, either direct statements or implied inferences, that are sometimes startling when the attention becomes fixed on them—for they may have been read a thousand times without exciting any particular thought. We have frequently been arrested by such passages in both the Old and the New Testament, and it has at the time appeared to us they could not have been put where they are found by any human hand. They involve truths so profound, and utter those truths in so unforced and artless a manner, and their significance is so veiled to the casual reader, that it seems impossible that they can have an earthly source. Such passages often occur in the Evangelists, in the discourses of our Lord—declaratives that find their echoes in the very depth of nature, and that seem to descend, like the rains of heaven, from outlying realms. When Jesus cried on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—that was no human cry—though it came from the human side of his nature. But no other man, under the same circumstances, would have uttered that passionate appeal to God amid the agonies of the cross, for it was a dying testimony to the veracity of his life, and implied a consciousness of a relation to an extra mundane power which no human being could feel except through the Holy Spirit. We could point out many such verses in both the Gospels and the Epistles. They occur also in the Old Testament. For example, "It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." We find this right at the beginning of the Bible—in the beginning of the very first book. There is no sense in it, taken in its lower significations; and if it had appeared for the first time in one of the Gospels, or one of Paul's epistles, it would not have been remarkable. But in Genesis, it is remarkable. The Messiah had not been developed at that time in Hebrew thought. But at the very moment man falls those two great thoughts find utterance—the Serpent, the kingdom of evil, and the Christ, the kingdom of heaven. They are at once in conflict. The serpent symbol runs through the Jewish theology, and finds its most vivid expression in the imagery of the last book of the New Testament, the Revelation. Now, to predict (say in the times of Moses—though it is doubtless much older), that the seed of the woman was to bruise the Dragon's head, is a conception impossible to human thought, for no son of man could possibly destroy the kingdom of Satan, unless he were at the same time the Son of God. And our remark is, that to find this little statement of a couple of lines, carelessly as it were, thrown into the narrative of the early chapters of Genesis, may well rivet our attention. The inspired writer strikes at once—and at the very outset—the key-note of the whole burden of Revelation. That is the theme of all the subsequent books of the Bible—history, prophecy, and psalm. It is an arrow, as soon as the bow is lifted, in the very center of the mark, piercing on the first attempt the very focus of all the human speculation of all the subsequent ages; imbedded like a hidden gem in the very oldest page of the Hebrew books.

Another statement of this sort is found in the same connection, and uttered on the same occasion. It is the curse pronounced on humanity after the fall, and on the earth.

It has been the effort of men of genius and of great writers to represent human life as in many respects a very satisfactory affair. A great deal has been written about human happiness, and the pursuit of happiness. Our works of fiction, and children's books, represent earth as a very pleasant place, and human life under favorable conditions, as a very agreeable state of things. The fairy books of the middle ages are all based on this thought and fairly express the popular sentiment. The Bible, on the contrary—while indulging in no extended talk—at the very outset, as soon as the tragedy in Eden is enacted, in one single stroke, gives us the true delineation of human life: "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." And to the woman he said: "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." There is no rose-colored view of human life here, but a deep significance in every syllable. When we cast the eye back over human history—take the history of the Jews—how fearful has been the amount of human suffering! Or take the world today; take even London, the metropolis of one of the most prosperous and flourishing of all the nations of the nineteenth century, and what is the condition, and who can estimate the sorrows of nine-tenths of the population? And then go to China—to India—to Africa—and how deep is the wretchedness of the sons of Adam! It was all foreshadowed in the few verses we have quoted—and here again too in the third chapter of Genesis, on the very threshold of the sacred books, the inspired penman strikes the key-note of another strain which runs through the pages of Holy Writ—the ruin of man, and the bitterness as well as the utter vanity of human life. On these two texts are preached all the sermons that run through the prophets, the chronicles, and the lyric strains of the old economy; and through the Gospels and the Epistles and the apocalyptic visions of the New Testament. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread"—"And in the sweat of thy brain shalt thou nourish thy spirit: and "the seed of the woman shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel,"—this is the summation of the history of humanity, and of the conflict between Good and Evil to be fought out through the ages on the theatre of human thought until Victory shall perch on the banners of the mysterious champion who in "the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God" was to overwhelm with confusion the Serpent-Prince of the powers of darkness.—Central Presbyterian.

Announcements.

The annual conference of the Church of God, for the Northwest, will meet at Scholl's Ferry, Oregon, commencing Friday evening, October 19, 1888, and holding over the following Sunday.

This being during the time for the "Mechanic's Fair" at Portland, those attending conference can take advantage of the reduced railroad fare at that time.

Teams will be at Portland to meet those from a distance. Please notify us if you wish to be met.

We hope to see all who attended last year and many more besides.

If we are among those whom the Lord, when he comes, shall find doing his will, happy shall we be. If meeting in conference and building each other up, and planning for the spread of the Gospel, is his will, happy indeed will we be in that day if we have done what we could in that direction. By order of Executive Committee.

"He Came to His Own."

A Jew of the Jews, when He came to his own—
The people he chose from the children of men—
The manger, the prison, the scourge and the stone
Were forms of the welcome they gave to him then.

Descendant of David, he came to his own,
The last of King David's legitimate line;
A cross was his guerdon, instead of a throne,
And thorns on his brow were his royalty's sign.

The Father of all, when he came to his own,
His children refused him, denying their birth;
Nor knew that he came for their sins to atone,
To wipe the dark stain from the suffering earth.

A friend and a brother, he came to his own,
But never knew where he should pillow his head;
He died for earth's millions, but perished alone,
And journeyed alone to the place of the dead.

Son, Father, and Spirit, he came to his own,
Who mocked him, and scorned him, and put him to shame;
His name was derided, his mission unknown,
Until he returned to the heights whence he came.

PRE-REFORMATION INTERPRETERS.—No. 1.

Romanism—foretold. Such has been our subject in the four previous lectures—the Scripture prophecy, and the papal history. That a deep and widespread apostasy has taken place in the Christian Church; that this apostasy has produced organized forms of Christianity, the chief of which is that of the Romish Church; that the apostasy of the Romish Church has culminated in the Papacy; that the Papacy has lasted through long centuries, and lords it still over half Christendom; that it has persecuted the faithful unto blood, striving for the destruction of the gospel of God as if it were deadly heresy, and for the extermination of the saints of God as of accursed heretics; that it would have been completely triumphant still but for the glorious Reformation, which burst its bonds, emancipated the enslaved consciences of millions, and created a new departure in the convictions and actions of the world,—such are the facts with which history presents us. They are broad, unquestionable facts, which are so notorious as to be beyond all controversy, so long lasting as to fill the records of a thousand years.

And that this great apostasy was foretold; that it was foretold ages before its accomplishment by Old Testament prophets and New Testament apostles; that Daniel dwelling in Babylon foretold it, and John, the exile in Patmos, and Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles; that those men, surrounded as they were by ancient heathenism, and knowing nothing by the evidence of the senses or by observation of the complete corruption of Christianity which has since darkened the world, as a long and awful eclipse of the Sun of righteousness—that those men, prophets and apostles, living in antecedent times, should have predicted the extraordinary events which have come to pass, and should have painted them in vivid colors on the venerable pages of the writings they have left us; and that those predictions have for eighteen centuries confronted apostate Christendom with their accusations, and reflected as in a faithful mirror the entire history of its ways; this is the profound prophetic truth we have endeavored to elucidate.

We have now to study the interpretation and use of these marvellous prophecies by the Christian Church. How has the Christian Church understood and employed them? Of what practical benefit have these prophecies been to her during the last eighteen centuries? It is evident that they were written for her guidance, protection and sanctification. The prophecies of Paul and John are addressed to Christian Churches. The voice of inspiration expressly invites the whole church to study them, and the church has obeyed this command. She has read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested the "sure word of prophecy." What moral effect has it had upon her? To what extent has it guided her footsteps and sustained her hopes? If these prophecies have proved to be a mighty power in her history; if they have preserved the faith of the church in times of general apostasy; if they have given birth to great reformation movements; if they have inspired confessors, and supported martyrs at the stake; if they have broken the chains of priestcraft, superstition, and tyranny, and produced at last a return on the part of many millions of men to a pure, primitive Christianity,—they have answered their purpose, and justified their position in the sacred Scriptures of truth. Nor may we lightly esteem that interpretation which has produced such results. Had the prophecies been misinterpreted, applied otherwise than according to the mind of the Spirit, we cannot believe that they would have been thus productive of blessed consequences. The fact that, understood and applied as they were by the reformers, they have produced spiritual and eternal good to myriads of mankind is a proof that they were rightly applied, for "by their fruits ye shall know them" is true, not only of teachers, but of their teachings. Protestantism, with all its untold blessings, is the fruit of the historic system of interpretation.

On the other hand, all that leads us to expect that the sufferers under antichristian tyranny would correctly interpret the prophetic word written for their guidance and support prompts also the expectation that their persecutors would as surely wrongly interpret it. As apostate Jews wrongly interpreted the prophecies of the Old Testament, so we should expect apostate Christians wrongly to interpret those of the New. In our study of the last eighteen centuries of interpretation we shall not expect to find the true interpretation therefore among the apostates, but among the faithful; not among the persecutors but among the persecuted; not among those who have waged war against the gospel of Christ, but among those who have confessed its pure teachings, and sealed that confession with their blood.

We shall not be surprised to find antagonistic schools of prophetic interpretation, but, on the contrary, we shall expect such; and we shall expect the apostates and persecutors to belong to one school, and the faithful confessors and martyrs to another. If an officer of justice arrest a man because he perceives he answers exactly to a description of a notorious criminal published by the Government as a help to his identification, is it likely that the man himself will admit that the description fits him? He will of course deny the correspondence, but his denial will carry no weight. On turning to the history of prophetic interpretation this is precisely what we find. With many variations as to detail we find there have existed, and still exist, two great opposite schools of interpretation, the Papal and the Protestant, or the futurist and the historical. The latter regards the prophecies of Daniel, Paul and John as fully and faithfully setting forth the entire course of Christian history; the former as dealing chiefly with a future fragment of time at its close.

The former, or futurist, system of interpreting the prophecies is now held, strange to say, by many Protestants, but it was first invented by the Jesuit Ribera, at the end of the sixteenth century, to relieve the Papacy from the terrible stigma cast upon it by the Protestant interpretation. This interpretation was so evidently the true and intended one, that the adherents of the Papacy felt its edge must, at any cost, be turned and blunted. If the Papacy were the predicted antichrist, as Protestants asserted, there was an end of the question, and separation from it became an imperative duty.

There were only two alternatives. If the antichrist were not a present power, he must be either a past or a future one. Some writers asserted that the predictions pointed back to Nero. This did not take into account the obvious fact that the antichristian power predicted was to succeed the fall of the Cæsars, and develop among the Gothic nations. The other alternative became therefore the popular one with Papists. Antichrist was future, so Ribera and Bossuet and others taught. An individual man was intended, not a dynasty; the duration of his power would not be for twelve and a half centuries, but only three and a half years; he would be an open foe to Christ, not a false friend; he would be a Jew, and sit in the Jewish temple. Speculation about the future took the place of study of the past and present, and careful comparison of the facts of history with the predictions of prophecy. This related, so it was asserted, not to the main course of the church, but only to the few closing years of her history. The Papal head of the Church of Rome was not the power delineated by Daniel and St. John. Accurately as it answered to the description, it was not the criminal indicated. It must be allowed to go free and the detective must look out for another man, who was sure to turn up by and by. The historic interpretation was of course rejected with intense and bitter scorn by the church it denounced as Babylon and the power it branded as antichrist, and it is still opposed by all who in any way uphold these.

It is held by many that the historic school of interpretation is represented only by a small modern section of the church. We shall show that it has existed from the beginning, and includes the larger part of the greatest and best teachers of the Church for 1,800 years. We shall show that the Fathers of the church belonged to it; that the most learned mediæval commentators belonged to it, that the confessors, reformers, and martyrs belonged to it, and that it has included a vast multitude of erudite expositors of later times. We shall show that all these have held to the central truth that prophecy faithfully mirrors the church's history as a whole, and not merely a commencing or closing fragment of that history.

It is held by many that the futurist school of interpretation is represented chiefly by certain Protestant commentators and teachers, who deny that the prophecy of the "man of sin" relates to the Pope of Rome.

We shall show that the futurist school of interpretation, on the contrary, is chiefly represented by teachers belonging to the Church of Rome; that the popes, cardinals, bishops, and priests of that apostate church are all futurists, and that the futurist interpretation is one of the chief pillars of Romanism.

Two interpretations of prophecy are before us, the historic and the futurist.

The historical school of interpretation regards these prophecies as reflecting the history of the fourth or Roman empire, in all its most important aspects, from first to last, including especially the dark apostasy which has long prevailed in Christendom, the testimony and sufferings of God's faithful people amid this apostasy, and the ultimate triumph of their cause.

On the other hand, the futurist school of interpretation regards these prophecies as dealing almost exclusively with the distant future of the consummation; regards them as dealing chiefly, not with what has been for the last eighteen hundred years, but with what will be in some final spasm at the close. The war against the saints waged by the Roman "little horn" of the prophecies of Daniel, the proud usurpations of the "man of sin," and his antagonism to the cause of true religion, foretold by Paul, the blasphemous pretensions and persecuting deeds of the revived head of the Roman empire set forth in the prophecies of John—all these are regarded by this futurist school as relating to a brief future period, immediately preceding the second advent. The futurist school denies the application of these important practical prophecies to the conflicts of the church during the last eighteen centuries. It robs the church of their practical guidance all through that period. This is the position taken by the Church of Rome, this is the position taken by the popes, cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and other great teachers of that apostate church. This is the prophetic interpretation they have embodied in a thousand forms, and insisted upon with dogmatic authority. This has been the interpretation of proud Papal usurpers, of cruel persecutors, of merciless tyrants, of the Romanist enemies of the gospel and of the saints and servants of God.

We shall find, on the other hand, as we study the subject, that the historic interpretation of prophecy, the interpretation which condemns Rome, and which Rome consequently condemns, grew up gradually with the progress of events and the development of the apostasy of Latin Christianity; that it slowly modified its details under the illuminating influence of actual facts, but that it retained its principles unaltered from age to age; that it was defended by a multitude of earnest students and faithful expositors; and that it shaped the history of heroic struggles and of glorious revivals of spiritual life and testimony.

This is the interpretation whose history during fifteen centuries we propose to review this evening.

We shall divide these fifteen centuries into three periods:

I. The period extending from apostolic times to the fall of the Roman empire in the fifth century.

II. The period extending from the fall of the Roman empire and rise of the Papacy in the fifth century to its exaltation under the pontificate of Gregory VII. (or Hildebrand), the founder of the Papal theocracy in the eleventh century.

III. The period from Gregory VII. to the Reformation.

First, then, let us glance at the history of prophetic interpretation in the interval extending from the apostolic times to the fall of the Roman empire in the fifth century. This was the period of the so called Fathers of the Christian Church. A multitude of their writings remain to us, containing not only almost countless references to the prophecies in question, but complete commentaries on Daniel and the Apocalypse. It is boldly claimed by many that the Fathers of the first five centuries belonged to the historical school of interpretation. It was impossible for them, owing to the early position which they occupied, rightly to anticipate the manner and scale of the fulfilment of these wondrous prophecies; but as far as their circumstances permitted they correctly grasped their general significance, and adhered to that interpretation which regards prophecy as foretelling the whole course of the church's warfare from the first century to the second advent.

It is impossible at this time to do more than present a brief summary of the views of the Fathers on this subject, and to name and refer you to their works.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

Dear Restitution:

In your last issue, Sept. 26, Bro. S. Wilson, desired an expression from Iowa in regard to a General Conference. I can only speak for myself.

The "Call" is before me. I have read and re-read it again and again. As I ponder over it two phases are presented by its wording: One is the need of concentrated effort for the truth, the care of weak churches, the correction of irregularities and the careful cultivation of the moral and Godlike; the other phase and the one to be shunned and evaded is expressed by the wording of the call itself in which there lurks a creed more dangerous than disorganization.

The former of these we all feel and deplore. We need business tact and foresight. We need the tender fostering care of elders to feed the lambs and the whole flock. We need a systematic aid bureau for sustaining our ministers in the field. We need co-operative effort everywhere and these we must have if we would prosper. But the latter phase strikes a blow at Christian liberty and conscience. It retards progress and stops investigation and when a people sign a creed they deliberately weld the shackels that bind their hands and hearts, and inactivity and death are the results. To be more explicit here let me call attention to the wording of the call. "During the last twenty years churches .....have been formed." "In many cases churches built up on the doctrines first taught them have had fatal discords introduced among them by later and unauthorized preachers teaching contrary doctrines." Also proposition "a" upon which delegates will have power to vote. "A covenant, the same in all churches, short and Scriptural. Which shall be subscribed to by all members as they are received into the church."

Had the call been limited to the former phrase we could all have said with glad hearts "Yea! Let the conference be held. We are in favor of it" and would vote for it with the whole heart and both hands. But when the doctrines upon which any church was built up can no longer be called in question or when "teaching contrary doctrines" to those which may have been held even for twenty years by any of us dare no longer be spoken against without being by those termed authorized preachers, and when a "covenant" is proposed however short and Scriptural it may be "which shall be subscribed to by all members as they are received into the church," When we read these things in a call for a General Conference whose delegates shall have the power to decide we enter this domain with slow haste. We feel that here is dangerous ground. That covenant which the conference may make may not be the standard of admittance into the church which God requires. It may be short and Scriptural. Yet it may contain too much or too little. We are not infallible. Doctrines which we may have believed twenty or ten years ago may have been errors and we could never vote to make them a standard for any church. We have a right to investigate and advance in all Bible truths; but we have no right to make our views of truth the standard for my brother whether he be authorized or unauthorized by us as a preacher.

Having known Bro. Wort, through his able pen for years it is my joy to know his effort at calling the Conference is to do good. We hope there will be no covenant or creed making as the condition of entering the church. Whether it is the purpose in the call to do this or not it has had the effect of keeping many at home, fearing the action of such a Conference would bind the churches to accept the action of the General Conference because of the presence of their delegate. Then again many hold doctrines which were not known twenty years ago, and many honest ministers have been preaching for years with no other authority than that of their Bibles and sense of duty to God and love for their fellows, and we cannot say to them you must stop because you are a step in advance of us.

We have been in an unorganized condition so long, and with no rules of government in financial matters, and now that a reaction is setting in there is danger of going to the other extreme and adopting a name and a creed. When this is done our Christian liberty is at an end and every one who has an advanced truth or is not strong enough to come up to our man-made standard will be turned away or turned out. I am no croaker or dismal prophet of evil, but a study of the call has brought up these thoughts. Brethren we cannot be too careful here. Let us carefully examine every inch of the ground in advance.

We say then in conclusion if the Conference shall be to unite us in work for Jesus, we are with you, and in sympathy with the call; but if it be to form a creed though called by any other name, by which any man's views are made the standard of faith we are opposed to it. Let us have charity in all things.

Iowa Conference Report.

Our meeting began on Thursday evening as per notice, near Marathon, Buena Vista Co. We had a pleasant and profitable time. The weather proved too cool for holding the meetings in the grove as was contemplated doing. Yet we had a nice school house which was at our service. Our meetings consisted of preaching of the Gospel and exhorting one another and prayer. All together we had three social and prayer meetings, two business meetings and nine sermons, of which Bro. T. J. Whitesitt preached three and the writer preached six. On Monday morning we went to the creek and Bro. Whitesitt baptized his son George and wife, Miss Jessie Whitesitt and Mrs. Zee Hurbut into the name of Jesus Christ. It was a happy time for Bro. Whitesitt, thus to assist his children into the Father's household.

At the business meeting it was determined to continue our plan of evangelistic work throughout the State, and the brethren at Marathon alone subscribed and paid into the fund for that purpose at the meeting thirty dollars in addition to what they had already paid at the Watkins meeting in June, besides defraying the expenses of the meeting. This is noteworthy because these brethren are not rich in worldly goods but they are rich in faith and good works. Their number is about twenty, and at the conference business meeting they determined and completed a church organization with Brethren R N. Scott and John Garton as elders. They have a Sunday School.

The call for a General Conference was duly considered, and A. J. Eychaner was appointed as delegate at large, while each church was instructed to take action as per call. While the conference in Iowa was in favor of a conference of union and uniformity in church matters of business, yet it was very decided against covenant making or creed forming, and discussed at length the "a" question in the call upon which the delegate shall have power to vote. They held that any covenant however "Short and Scriptural" could not be received as the condition of admittance "into the church" since the Bible alone contains those conditions; and the danger would be in making the "covenant" contain too much or too little "to be subscribed to by all members as they are received into the church" thus forming an iron creed. They further expressed themselves that while they are willing to send delegates to the General Conference for the purpose of furthering the Master's cause, by maturing plans for the spread of the gospel and uniting our efforts to that end, yet they will be bound by no creed, or covenant as the conditions of voteing God's Church. Those conditions must remain where they are, in the Bible, and remain as they are without giving to any conference the power to say just how much or how little shall be subscribed to as a condition of being received into the church.

The meeting was characterized by unity and brotherly love and has had a power for good among the prairie homes of northwestern Iowa. Come to our next meeting if you were not at this one for we found it good to be there. Yours in Hope.

A. J. EYCHANER.

To the Church in Iowa.

The Conference at Marathon, Ia. Sep. 13–16, appointed me to represent Iowa in the General Conference, and that an appeal be made for donations to defray my expenses.

Let contributions be made at once for this object and sent direct to me. Our state ought to be represented and the money shall not be taken from the evangelist fund. If more is contributed than is needed to send your delegate, the amount will be turned over to the evangelist fund.

A. J. EYCHANER, Marshalltown, Ia.

A SEPTEMBER MORNING TALK.

I have just read the following—which is worth pondering—from a recent address by Geo. Macdonald in London. "The longer I live, the more I am assured that the business of life is to understand the Lord Christ. Nothing else is to be called the business of life. I am extreme, you may think,—but this is liberty and life to me, to know Christ." Paul had some extraordinary views of the glory and need of this knowledge. So much for introduction this cool, breezy autumn morning. In contrast, let me mention a recent stroke of "enterprise" of the very enterprising Express of Buffalo, a Mammoth Extra, and "Souvenir of the International Industrial Fair" in that city recently. In September and October the civilized world erupts in a universal ardor and constellation of fairs. And here is this great pamphlet of 60 pages—a leviathan pamphlet, with much decorative art, prepared to illustrate Buffalo. A pamphlet full of local history, and crowded with photographs of successful business men. And among the rest are the beer princes. Here are their faces and their records. Four and a half millions of dollars are invested in the brewing business in Buffalo, and 500 men are employed.

You can see malt-piles containing over 100,000 bushels—huge vats of 25,000 gallons capacity—"mash tubs in which the product of a 100 acre farm can be handled at one filling." Is this what men are born for? Is this what life is good for? To brew the liquid oceans and send them every whither? Men are imperial in the domain of sense. By and bye, faith and God's fear will abound and abide, and the old follies will be despised.

I heard a man say last night, "If there is a hell on earth, it is in the foundry where I work. Such infinite swearing, the live-long day!" And this led to a calculation. Say that one quarter of the people swear in the United States—and this fifteen millions, utter ten oaths a day. Then, here we have a hundred and fifty millions of blasphemies per diem. As a matter of fact, the confirmed swearer is likelier to swear as many as ten times ten times a day—and these would aggregate fifteen hundred millions.

Then add Canada, and South America, and Europe, where there is some knowledge of a true God. And who shall compute the bewildering sum total?

Every man can reckon for himself. Some day this will stop. Men will fear God and love him. Good and glad day, hasten,—and "let them be ashamed which transgress without cause!" If there ever was a case of gratuitous, causeless, ungodly wrong and foolishness, this is it. What a horde of sins, are sins of the mouth—of the tongue, palate and stomach! Drinking, smoking and swearing! What natural and perverse association!

Allow for fifteen million smokers in this country—with an average of four smokes a day. There are sixty million conflagrations, enough to drive, I can not tell how many engines and trains of cars. But to what end all this fire—except self-indulgence?

Who and where are you O "Christian" maker, raiser, or seller of tobacco? "Christian" door of evil!

I am sorry to see that Harriet Beecher Stowe, is a weak and low. We would gladly have her live yet another ten years, unless purchase life should be a burden. The world would seem bereft, if she were no more living and breathing with us. How heartily she ascribes the work she did, to God. "I did not write Uncle Tom's Cabin," she declares. "It was not mine, it was given me." O, that all were so full of God and his breath, as that! How immediately this world would then be heaven-like! Come, O breath! Come, O influence and potency! Come and stop the storm and disorder of the times!

Now in contrast with this rage of ill-dealing with God the good Giver, and the exaltation of self and sense, return to Geo. Macdonald's secret of wisdom, and synopsis and suggestion of noble ambition—the knowledge of God in Christ. I am refreshed with reading-baths in the blessed pentecostal and apostolic chapters of Acts. Let the contestants in matches regale themselves, and the rivals in races strain both brain and muscle in petty competitions. O, that we may learn and enjoy ever so much more of God! O, that we may have the spirit that moved Paul, kindled in our own hearts.

I have just read a declaration imputed to Bismark as follows: "What a failure my life has been! Without my existence three great wars would have been avoided, 80,000 men would not have been killed, many families would not have been plunged into sorrow. However, it is done, and that account I must settle with God when I die. I have made thousands unhappy—derived no joy from my success, and led a life so far, of endless regret, vexation, contest, worry and overwork. If any life has been a perversion and disappointment, it is mine." This confession, if authentic, needs no comment.

I like to read and study the Revised Version. Suppose improvements are still possible. Shall we not be thankful for what advancement we have? And shall we not credit modern scholarship with capacity to bring us nearer to the very heart and mind of the good God, in his word? The shrinking of good souls from changes in phraseology, is not very strange. But give us the truth at any cost,—the true sense of the original,—and if we will, we may make our own, the preferred renderings of the American Committee. Here is a marked change in 2 Tim. ii. 26, "And they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, having been taken captive by the Lord's servant, unto the will of God." Here is another, Psa. lxxxvii. 4. "I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon as among them that know me."

I have referred to health-getting and health-keeping. How glad and grateful you ought to be who have this treasure! Papers teem with advice on sanitary topics, and sometimes opinions actually conflict. I would like to refer to one of the materials used in food, to wit: Baking Powder. It is a fact that can be easily demonstrated that the great majority of baking powders are impure. Even the much used, and much praised, Royal baking powder is not pure—because is contains Ammonia. This is very easily shown with an alcohol lamp. Many sorts are badly adulterated. I speak from personal knowledge. Cleveland's—however, is entirely pure—and worthy of universal patronage,—for besides purity, it has the quality of efficiency in a very high degree. There is great prevailing ignorance on this class of agents, in culinary work, and the culinary world.

I will close. I hope I have not overgone the two columns to which I think I ought to be restricted. In closing—what is my treasure? There is one treasure believers have. It is the sum total of all the toils and troubles, interests, cares, disappointments and annoyances, they have in simple and good faith, committed to God for his management and keeping, for his conduct to a good and blessed issue. If the bulk and substance of these committed interests, is great, then is not your treasure great? O. C.

SOME TIME.

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things which our weak judgment here has spurned—
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet—
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deepest tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans were right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

And we shall see, that, while we frown and sigh,
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
How, when we called he heeded not our cry,
Because his wisdom to the end could see;
And e'en as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweet to craving babyhood,
So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things, because it seemeth good.

And if, some time, commingled with life's wine,
We find the wormwood, and rebel and shrink,
Be sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this potion for our lips to drink;
Alas! if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses cannot reach his face
Oh! do not blame the loving Father so,
But bear your sorrow with obedient grace.

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends his friend,
And that sometimes the subtle pall of death
Conceals the tenderest boon his love can lend.
If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within, and all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery could find a key.

But not today. Then be content, poor heart!
God's plans, like lilies pure and white, unfold;
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart;
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.
And if, through patient toil we reach the land
Where tired feet, with sandals loosed, may rest,
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we shall say that "God knew best."

The Covenant and Creed of the Church of Christ.

How can sinners get into Christ, or into his church? The answer is plain. By a living faith in the gospel of Christ, repentance, or a change of mind and purpose (meta noia), and baptism for the remission of sins. "As many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Gal. iii. 27. Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Rom. vi. 4. Repenting sinners then gained remission of their sins, and got into Christ by baptism. They also gained the right to be called by the name of Christ by baptism. "Is Christ divided?" "Was Paul crucified for you?" "Or were ye baptized into the name of Paul?" They were baptized into the name of Christ, therefore should be called by that name, which "is above every name," and by that name alone.

The Christian, if he remain in Christ till the end of his life, will sleep in Jesus till the waking at the resurrection morn. Thus no power on earth or in heaven can separate him from the love of Christ. But what is meant by getting into Christ? It means to get into his body, which is his church. Eph. i. 23. "And hath put all things under his feet and gave him to be the head over all things to the church," "which is his body." "And he is the head of the body, the church." Col. i. 18. Whoever gets into his church in God's appointed way, is safe, whether he is in man's church, or not. The churches of God in the apostle's day were independent of all authority above them except that of Jesus, their Head, and the revealed word of God. Each church ordained, or appointed (R. V.), their own elders, or bishops (overseers). These elders who were bishops, that is overseers, were elected by stretching out the hand (cheirotoneow). See Young's Concordance on the word ordain. These officers were guides, not rulers. See margin. Each one of the members of these churches entered into a covenant with the Lord when he believed the gospel and was baptized. A covenant is an agreement between two parties.

Exceeding great and precious promises are offered to all who comply with certain revealed conditions. When the sinner repents or changes his mind, and resolves to comply with the law of Christ, he enters into a solemn agreement with him "to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and "by patient continuance in well-doing, to seek for glory, honor and immortality," and to such seekers Jesus promises to give everlasting life, and a crown and a throne in the kingdom that is shortly to be "set up under the whole heaven." Paul writes to Gentile converts at Ephesus, "that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." Eph. ii. 12. "But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometime were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ." Whenever a company of baptized believers, having, one by one, entered into this covenant with Christ, they are a church or congregation of God by a divine organization, bound together by one faith and hope and love and baptism, and this without any human organization. When such a church appoints its elders or other Scriptural officers, it is still a divine organization "set in order." The members of the church were a part of the body of Christ when they were baptized into Christ and before they were "set in order."

All that the churches need to do is to recognize and adopt the covenant they have already entered into with their glorified Head. This covenant consists of all the promises made in the Bible on the one hand, and on the other, of all the revealed word and will of God, that we are commanded to obey. All that can be required of us is to engage to fulfil all the conditions taught us in the Bible, and then believe all those Scriptures that contain the promises of the gospel of Christ. Our churches in this part of the country have agreed to take the Bible as the only infallible rule of faith and practice. Thus we have recognized the covenant and confession of faith that is revealed in that book. We have stood on this platform for about thirty years, and found it a safe standing place. Our articles of faith and covenant are not very short, but they are the same in all the churches. They are not in words of man's wisdom, but in the words which the Holy Spirit has taught us. "All Scripture, given by inspiration of God, is profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17. I desire the inspired word of the Holy Spirit for both my covenant and creed, instead of an explanation of that word. I desire to build my faith and hope on the broad "foundation of the prophets and apostles and Jesus Christ as the chief corner stone." On this rock I desire to wait until we "come to Mount Zion, and unto the city of our living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven; and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the New Covenant and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel." I very much desire to be one of the elected delegates to that "General Assembly" that is now so "nigh at hand." E. HOYT.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 41.

LESSON CHAPTER, MATT. VI.

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt and where thieves break through and steal. Matt. vi. 19.

Question. Where then are we to lay up our treasures?

Answer. Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal. Matt. vi. 20; xix. 21; Luke xii. 33; xviii. 22; 1 Tim. vi. 19; 1 Peter i. 4.

Q. Why should we lay up our treasures in heaven?

A. For the reason that where our treasure is, there our heart will be also. Matt. vi. 21; Luke xii. 34. We must set our affections on things above, not on things on the earth. Col. iii. 2.

Q. Why not set our affections on the things of this world?

A. Because the fashion of this world passeth away. 1 Cor. vii. 31; 1 Peter i. 24.

Q. If we lay up our treasures in heaven, when will we receive them?

A. Behold the Lord God will come with strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him; behold his reward is with him and his work before him; Isa. xl. 10; Rev. xxii. 12; and behold I come quickly and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be; to them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honor and immortality, eternal life. Rom. ii. 7. Therefore we must lay up our treasures in heaven, so that they will be ready. For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Matt. xvi. 27.

A glance through the pages of Wide Awake for October gives one the feeling that the editors are very "wide awake" indeed, in securing the best work of authors and artists for the pleasure of young people.

The instructive articles are spiced with entertainment, and the purely amusing or entertaining stories and poems serve their special purpose admirably. The historical paper on the home life and heart traits of Daniel Webster tells a great deal about him that very few people know.

George Parsons Lathrop has a droll dog story "Puck and Puppypult." Miss Seward's article, "A Dogocracy," is descriptive of the strange dog communities existing in Constantinople. The Webster and "Dogocracy" articles alone are worth the price of the number, if looked at merely as furnishing fresh material for supplementary reading in our schools. Such subjects appeal to a pupil's intelligence and at the same time are as entertaining as a story. We need more such reading of this nature in our schools.

The two serials are nearing the end, increasing in interest. Edward E. Hale's "Story of Boston Common" is completed with his description of it as a pleasure ground. The poems, together with several stories and articles, complete an altogether delightful issue.

This number gives the Prospectus for 1889—announcing a serial by Trowbridge, "The Adventures of David Vane and David Crane," and another by Margaret Sidney, author of the famous "Five Little Peppers," entitled "The Peppers Midway." There are two other serials also, by Susan Coolidge and Charles R. Talbot.

Wide Awake is $2.40 a year. A great deal for a little money. D. Lothrop Company, Boston. Send five cents for a specimen.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weather.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the falsities of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It shows us that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to some, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contain over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $3.50. # ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD, THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to carry success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already allowed or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partizan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth bound, 126 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 21.

BY DR. J. H. THOMPSON.

THE THEOZOIC, OR AGE TO COME.

CONTINUED.

2nd. A Metropolitan City. Each nation of the past and present has had its capital, or chief city, where the principal executive officer dwelt, with his cabinet, and from which, also emanated the edicts and laws for the suppression of evil, and the protection and encouragement of its law-abiding subjects.

Central cities of this kind have been noted in the past, especially among the nations of antiquity, for their opulence, grandeur, glory, wealth and power. Babylon, the metropolis of ancient Babylonia, Athens of Greece, and Rome of the Italian peninsula, were notable examples of this class. Later years have developed London, the capital city of England, Paris of France and Washington of the United States of America, etc.,—each separate government sustaining its own metropolitan center.

That the Theocracy of the future age is not an exception to its predecessors of this age is largely shown in the prophetic record, thus;—"I say unto you, Swear not at all;—neither by heaven for it is God's throne; nor by the earth, for its footstool; neither by Jerusalem for it is the city of the great king," Matt. v. 34, 35.

"Behold, I create Jerusalem a blessing and her people a joy, and I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people; and the voice of weeping shall no more be heard in her, nor the voice of crying," Isaiah lxv. 18.

John "saw the holy city, the new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband,"—that great city, the new Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God; "and her light," says he, "was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal," Rev. xxi. 1. As to its centralizing effect he writes, "the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it," verse 24

The promised reward to him that overcometh, is, I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God and he shall no more go out; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my name," Rev. iii. 12.

Isaiah and Micah both prophesy that "the law shall go forth of Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem," defining the exact relation of the city of the Great King, and the nations of the earth in the age to come. Such are some of the testimonies in regard to the metropolis of the new earth. Its grandeur, its pomp and beauty, its splendor and magnificence, as described by the sacred writers, cause the capital cities of this age to fall into significance, even as the brilliant light of the moon and brightest stars become dim and lost under the influence of the sun's rays. Contemporaneous cities and towns will doubtless exist, but the glory of Jerusalem eclipses them all, so greatly that their very existence is ignored in the descriptions of scenes and events of the Theocrole, in the Word of God. Its glory surpasses description. Its gates shall not be shut at all by day: the glory of God and the Lamb is the light of it; the earth-nations shall walk in the light, bringing their glory and honor into it; going up to it from year to year, to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles, while their kings contribute of their splendor and national glory and honor for its aggrandisement. Truly, then will be fulfilled the words of the Psalmist: "Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, in the mountain of his holiness. Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the Great King. God is known in her palaces for a refuge.....As we have heard, so we have seen in the city of the Lord of hosts, in the city of our God. God will establish it forever. Selah. Psalms xlix. 1.

3rd. Subjects....Another element of every kingdom and nation, in which, also, the kingdom of God will form no exception in the future age, is that which stands at the head of this division of the subject under consideration. Who will constitute the kingdom of God? The answer comes from the sure word of prophecy. and we hear the Psalmist saying, "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion. I will declare the decree; the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them to pieces like a potter's vessel," Psalms ii. 6–9, and again, "All the ends of the earth (world) shall remember and turn unto the Lord. Ibid xxii. 27: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee."

The prophet Daniel, after having seen in the night visions "one like the Son of Man who came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him," tells us, "there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion," he states, "is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed," Daniel vii.

John's testimony is no less plain on this point, thus, "The seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever," Rev. xi. 15.

It is the nations of them which are saved who dwelleth in the light of the holy city, it is the glory and honor of the nations that is brought into it, and that contribute to its glory, splendor and perpetuity on the world's capital. These nations in the present age are divided into two general classes, to wit: Jew and Gentile.

Of the restoration of the former class, extended notice has been already taken under the caption, Jewish nation, in the Quarternary age, where it was shown that they were beloved for the Father's sake, were acknowledged through a long series of years as the subjects of the kingdom of God, that by their defection in this dispensation, a way was opened for the acceptance of the gospel by the Gentiles, through faith, reformation of character and obedience, and that God's covenant to the fathers and to them as a nation, embodies their national restoration to their own land and to God's favor, as an integral part of the kingdom of God.

Paul stood at the tribunal of King Agrippa and was judged "for the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers, unto which promise," pleads Paul, "our tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come," Acts xxvi. 6. And to show more conclusively that this hope was the grand hope of the gospel he adds, "for which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accursed of the Jews." When Peter asked of Jesus, "Behold, we have left all and followed thee, what shall we have therefore? his reply locates the true standing of Israel in the restoration; he says, "Verily, I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Jesus further told his disciples, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me: that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel," Luke xxii. 28, 30.

It is very evident no other nation or people can be included in these quotations than the Jewish nation, and that the rulership pertains directly to the twelve apostles of the Lord, for it is the twelve tribes of Israel, and none other than are specified, and nowhere either in history or prophecy is any other people know by that appellation.

To be judged and ruled over by the twelve disciples, Israel must of necessity be so arranged as to be subjects, and this fulfils the expectation of Israel for which they have been so long nationally waiting,—the type of the ark and temple service,—the promise of God to the fathers, while at the same time it dispels the clouds of obscurity from the prophecies of inspiration in relation to that peculiar people.

John it will be recollected, in his Apocalyptic vision, after beholding the scenes accompanying the events pertaining to the great day of his (God's) wrath, "heard the number of them which were sealed: and there were one hundred and forty-four thousand of all the tribes of the children of Israel," Rev. vii. 4, to the number of twelve thousand from each named tribe, and in connection with Paul's positive testimony to the Roman brethren, heretofore quoted, that "all Israel shall be saved," as well as the many other positive assurances of almost all the biblical writers to the same effect, it certainly almost savors of blasphemy to doubt that Israel will be nationally restored to their own land as subjects in the kingdom of God during the infinitude of the Theozoic age. Let the careful reader, and candid enquirer search the Scriptures and become satisfied that there is no evidence in the inspired volume which militates against this grand truth, remembering that their restoration to the holy land for a perpetual possession does not depend on their fealty, but that it is predicted on the promise of God to the fathers, and in fulfilment of God's types, and the prophecies.

The subjugation of the Gentiles, as nations, to the rule of the kingly power of the Theozoic age, too, is taught incidentally, with nearly the same force and clearness as is the restoration of Israel, and we hear the prophet Isaiah prophesy that "in that day there shall be a root of Jesse which shall stand for an ensign of the people: to it shall the Gentiles seek; and his rest shall be glorious," chap. xi. 10. Among other prophecies of the future age in connection with the earth nations outside of the children of Israel we refer to a few as follows, to wit: "And the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him," Daniel vii. 27.

"He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations," etc., Rev. ii. 27. This cannot be true unless there are the nations to be subjected to that power, and if they are there then they must be in the form of subjects, since there is another class to rule over them, and bring and keep them in subjection to the theocracy of the age, hence the object to be attained by the judgment seems depicted by our Lord as recorded by Matthew, chapter xxv. 31–46.

"And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles," Zech. xiv. 16.

"And the sons of strangers shall build thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee: for in my wrath I smote thee, but in my favor have I had mercy on thee. Therefore thy gates shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day or night; that men may bring unto the forces of the Gentiles and that their kings may be brought. For the kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted," Isa. lx. 10.

When we reflect that there are nations of them which are saved and that these shall walk in the light of the holy city, the new Jerusalem, seen of John descending out of the heaven from God,—and that the glory and honor of the nations are brought into it;—that the leaves of the tree of life are for the healing of the nations,—that the gospel of the present dispensation is a witness to the nations, testifying, (for that is the mission of a witness), that in Abraham's seed shall all the nations be blessed,—and that to Christ and the overcomers through him, is promised the power over the nations, with peace on earth and good will among men, we may reasonably conclude that in the future age every knee shall bow and every tongue confess of the honor, majesty, power and glory of God, who has wrought all this order from chaotic formlessness, in the material world, and the salvation of the earth nations Jew and Gentile, among men, through their subordination as subjects in the glorious kingdom of our God.

Note. An objection is sometimes made that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." In reply it is perhaps sufficient to notice that the subjects of a kingdom never inherit the kingdom. They live under the laws and ordinances of the supreme ruler, and enjoy every benefit to be divided from their allegiance, but may never hope to be any thing except subjects in that kingdom.

The prospective rulers may and do inherit it, but the subjects never: therefore a just discrimination between the ruling class, (of whom we shall treat presently), and the subjects, answers the objection, since the former are nowhere accounted of the flesh and blood class, or order of beings, but, on the contrary, having been accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead they neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection:" no longer earthly, Adamic and natural, but rather, spiritual, heaven-like, quickening and quickened spirits like their federal Head.

AN OCTOBER MORNING TALK.

It is good to follow the apostles and their helpers in their early work. If one goes with them in sympathy, sweet and earnest sympathy now, that is some proof that he would have been fit to go with them in person, if he had lived when they did. Look at the earthly immortality, so to speak, of Silas and Timothy and Barnabas and Apollos, who helped Paul. And there was that good hearted woman Lydia at Philippi. How happy she was to receive the gospel, and receive baptism, and entertain her ministers! And how happy was Paul to enjoy her hospitality—to have her genuine womanly sympathy and appreciation! And still more, after that cruel beating that he got along with Silas.

We can keep all these people company by reading and pondering their acts. We can travel with them, we can love them. Paul is good company. If we are not called to do a work like his, we can mentally participate in it. We can say, "how noble his soul! How noble his love! How singular his courage!" In that Philippi matter, when the praetors stripped off the garments from Paul and Silas, and said to the lictors, "lay the rods on their backs," why did not they say—"Beware; we are Romans;—touch us at your peril." No, they waited: They endured the scourging, and did not reveal their Roman citizenship till later. And still more, in our day, men of the world have said, after the scourging and imprisonment—"You have come to set us free, have you? You have treated us most unjustly. You have broken Roman law. Now give us a thousand dollars a piece. Do that, or we will prosecute you for assault and battery and for false imprisonment." But the men of God had no spirit of greed. They coveted rather the salvation of men.

Paul did good at Philippi. He did good to that lunatic woman that followed them with monotonous and harrassing cries,—by rebuking the evil spirit. He did good by preaching,—by submitting to be imprisoned without being nervously excited or angry, by singing hymns at midnight, and exciting the interest of jailor and prisoners, by saving the jailor from suicide, and preaching the gospel to him, by being always zealous, loving, orderly and wise. He had a good mission—and he kept to it.

Suppose we, whoever we are, in early life, or in later life, copy this wonderful man. Why not? We read and hear of a revival of religion. Well,—a revival of religion—is a manifest increase of interest in the will and work and power of God, or it evolves the interest, if you like that better. And the word of God comes in as potent or plani-potent, factor. A revival of religion! Yes I go for that—so may we all,—by being in the heart of the good things of God, loving the company of our heavenly Father, and loving the company of good men, and especially the best men. It is no wonder if we choose the best, and like their company the best. Let sins and memories of sins, go to the bottom of the sea, if they will, but let God and his glory rise on us. "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." What good does darkness do? O, it may do good by making light all the more lovely, to be sure. But I would be baptized in light I would be white with it, and joyful with it, the light of God. There is need enough of this balm for us. But pondering and pondering and pondering on old shortcomings and sins, is not specially edifying, that I know of. Let us come up by faith to meet and trust and rest in God who forgives,—and forgives for good and all.

I go to meetings sometimes and hear the speaking of the children—but I wonder why so many are but children after all. Why is there not more spirituality, more depth, more force? Why are remarks so over and utterly common-place? There is so little unction;—there is so little growth in knowledge;—there is such and so much going in mere rote, and and walking and talking in routine. There is the solemnizing and solidifying of a reasonable and wholesome fear—but then again there is the weakness and dwarfing of an unreasonable and unwholesome fear, that nurses selfishness—and even a mean and narrow selfishness. If people in meeting would only get more out of themselves—and more into God! Is it my fault that I am so little edified by the oft repetitions of common place things? Perhaps it is. "What! Can truth change—and is it possible to avoid what you call common place?" Truth changes not, but give us a little growth in knowledge. Give us the generous susceptibility to improvement in ideas of God's majestic greatness of nature and administration. Gives us deliverance from utter reduction to a mere stereotyped way of thinking or speaking. Is it not time to awake and put on strength? I presume it is a good time after an illness. In the resuscitation, in the autumnal reviving of life and health, in the October coolness in the morning or evening passes from manual or other work, it is grand to get a "new start," as the saying goes, get an apostolic breeze or breath of life like an air from heaven, and be just in the frame to grow up freely. Not under the repressive influence of an unmovably prejudiced opinionated habit of mind that is proof against expansion. But elasticity with wisdom—expansiveness or expansibleness—with reasonable caution, a look to the front and a footstep always forward in whatever is right and good, that is what I plead for. Let us stand for that or die, stand for it and die, if necessary, be quiet and meek, and no matter how obscure even, and unnoticed so for the matter of that, but ever walking with God; or after him.

Over in Springfield, is now current, or co-current, if you please, the great "Bay State Fair." I do not seem to covet a glance even, at its opulent assemblage of things wonderful or curious. But among the many things that are seen in like places, one does feel thankful for such a beautiful and useful creature as I have a picture of, now on my writing stand. It is a Holstein cow named Jewel, and "clearly proven to be the best Holstein cow in the world." So somebody says. But here is Pietertje 2nd with a milk record of 30,316 pounds in one year. That does seem marvelous. Such beauty and utility in any creature of God is worth noticing. I have heard of people who object to eating butter and cheese—and even milk is discarded by some advanced adviser in dietetic topics, if I am not mistaken.

But all have their uses, I imagine. And I am thankful for good food. Butter and cheese are good—(cases of dyspepsia of course being allowed for) are good I say, and nutritious. And the cow that produces them easily and in abundance, is good, (is good as a creature of God); splendidly moulded and innocently and wholesomely resourceful. One can hardly help saying, that if the human race were under culture as careful and intelligent as the Holstein herd of F. O. Stevens of Attica, N. Y. the health, the beauty, the intelligence, the capacity and happiness of that race would be, O, how greatly promoted! Then longevity would be astonishing, I guess. Take away tobacco and alcohol, and self-allowances in all wrong, and what a blessing would come after! But alas for the craniks who inculcate what they call "Edenic diet," or subsistence on uncooked food only. Opinions are plenty and many of them strange. C. C.

Note. The figures in regard to the yearly milk production of the Holstein cow were taken from the Buffalo Express. But it seems almost certain that there is an error, as the amount is difficult to conceive as possible. C.

To the Brethren and Sisters of the Household of Faith in Iowa.

Once more I wish to talk with you through the columns of our paper in regard to the work of our Conference in this State. As Bro. Eychaner will give a report of the meeting I will only say that we met together at Marathon where we found a little band of earnest faithful workers with whom we had a blessed season indeed, such a spirit of abiding faith and love seemed to be possessed by all, and the few days we spent with them were among the happiest of our lives. On Monday morning our hearts were rejoiced to see the labors of our dear Bro. Whitesitt rewarded by his being permitted to lead his three children and the wife of Brother Hurlbut down into the stream and baptize them into the Christ, and now he writes me that one more has followed them, and four more were going to last Sunday. But this is not what I wish to tell you as you will hear this from others, but that the little band of brethren there bore the expenses of the conference nearly alone, and paid into the evangelist fund about thirty-five dollars, I have not the exact amount, so you see they are truly dedicated to the work of the Lord; but are not able alone to meet all the obligations that the church in Iowa were placed under by the action of that conference. It was thought advisable by all present in view of our State work, and the advance of thought and acceptance of Bible truth among us, to send Bro. A. J. Eychaner as a delegate at large from this State to the National Conference now being called, and Brother Eychaner is not a man rich in worldly possessions able to bear the expenses of this work alone; therefore I appeal to you that you aid him in this. Send your mites direct to him and I assure you a correct record will be kept, and if there is more received than is needed for his expenses, it will be put into the Evangelist fund, but judging from the results of appeals for our State work heretofore there is no fear of a large surplus. Oh dear brethren and sisters, we are God's stewards and these opportunities are the talents he has left in our hands; then let us all be able to show a big increase by discharging our duty faithfully. Brother Whitesitt is doing a good work, and must be supported, therefore it is not expedient at present to bear the expenses of our delegate from the Evangelist fund, neither are we free to do so as we hold the money on trust for the gospel work. Our Conference was held so far to one side of the State that but few were there from the churches, therefore the necessity of bringing this before you. And we hope also that you will remember our evangelist work, that it is to abide with us, and must be supported, and I think all would be glad as the season for his manual labor closes, to send Bro. Eychaner also into the field for the winter, can we not do this? Oh that we might all come out of self; put him in the background and let God to the front; and arise as one man to do battle for the truth, for if indeed we are looking for the Master to return will we not think his truth more to be maintained and advanced than all worldly pursuits.

Bro. Eychaner's address is Marshalltown, Iowa.

Yours for the cause,

LIBBIE PALMER.

"TIME OF HARVEST."

This refers, of course, to the Jordan Valley, for the difference between harvest time there and in the mountains varies from two to five weeks. The "first month" when the Hebrews crossed the Jordan would correspond to a part of March and April. I am frequently asked if the Jordan Valley is now inhabited, and if the land there is tilled? Many square miles of it are under cultivation, but the work is done chiefly by people who live in the mountains. I have passed through wheat-fields that were miles in extent, and have noticed as many as three different stages in the growth of the crop. The Arabs explain that it was sown at three different times, so that it might not all ripen at once. This is necessary, because they gather the grain by the slow process of reaping with sickles; and should a vast field ripen at once, they could not command men enough to harvest it properly. Thus, even in the valley, harvest-time may extend over two or more weeks. Again, there, as in every other part of the world, some seasons are earlier than others. The Jordan Valley is the winter resort of many of the Arab tribes in Bashan and Moab. During this season the climate there is as lovely as could be desired. The air is soft and mild, and green fields are on every hand. Scattered in little groups up and down the valley, I have counted thousands of black tents belonging to those who had come down from the great table-land above where the winds are cold and bleak. I suppose the Israelites came down from the mountains of Moab to enjoy the winter on the Shittim plain, covered, as it then was, with a rank growth of tropical vegetation. The abundance of fresh water at their command, the grass and flowers, the mild air, must have filled them with delight after their rough experience in the desert. They could not attempt the conquest of the mountainous region west of the Jordan until the winter storms were over. "Harvest-time" in the valley was as early as it was practicable for them to enter upon the great campaign that was before them.

The crossing.—Having spent more than three months in the work of exploration in the Jordan Valley, I feel familiar with every part of it. One point to which I wish to call your attention is the large mound called Dumieh, near Shechem. It has ruins upon it, and appears to be wholly or in part artificial. There are some arguments in favor of this being the site of the Adam of our lesson, although this I do not attempt to prove. The Jordan Valley is sixty miles long, and from six to twelve miles wide, and lengthwise through it the river has cut a channel for itself to a depth varying from fifty to one hundred feet. Down in this gorge the river flows through banks that are lined with canes and trees. The Jordan plain itself is never touched by the water of the river; that would be simply impossible. It is only the lower banks that are overflowed. This lower portion is referred to in books under the name of the "lower Ghor." The soil is alluvial, and the banks and level places near them are frequently soft, so that the water can be approached only at certain points. I have known a mule with a light load to swim the river, and reach the opposite bank, where he found that he could not stand. He began to sink in the soft earth, and soon disappeared, load and all, and lost forever. There was no way of getting to the animal or of saving him. During my work there, I came near suffering the same fate on two or three different occasions. At a few places only the banks are firm, and there the water can be reached with ease, and without danger. People have asked me, "If the river-bed was dry from the Dead Sea to Adam, thirty or forty miles above, why could not the Israelites have crossed anywhere?" What I have said will answer the question. Furthermore, at some points the river bottom is hard and pebbly; such points are chosen now by the Arabs for crossing, and the Israelites must have done the same.—Selah Merrill, in S. S. Times.

STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association will be held at Plymouth, Ind., on Saturday, Nov. 10, 1888, (as per Articles of Association), for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors and for the transaction of such business as may come before the meeting. It is important that stockholders take an interest in this meeting, and be in attendance.

J. H. WILLEY,
Pres. Board Directors.

SOME of our friends who send us inquiries concerning books, remittances, etc., do not exactly understand our connection with THE RESTITUTION. The Editor has no concern whatever with money sent for any purpose, nor with sending out books or tracts. All advertising of books, pamphlets, railroad time cards, notices of excursions, etc., is a concern with which he has nothing to do, as all this is a matter arranged by the Board with the publisher. All that has been made the Editor's duty for the last three years has simply been to attend to the reading matter—original and selected—that appears in the columns of the paper. Aside from this responsibility, we have positively no concern with any business matter whatever, excepting books sent to us personally for editorial comment.

If any one notices an error in the time of his paper as marked by the slip on it, the error will be corrected if he will send us word. Any package of books not received we will hunt up, or send duplicates if they cannot be found. The Publisher has received no complaint or inquiry, that has not been attended to promptly.

IN these times of wild political excitement, it is a matter of imperative necessity for us to be carefully on our guard. The highest concern of the Christian is not with the political principles that are now so strenuously agitated and discussed between the bitterly contending parties. Though temporarily interested in the governmental administrations of this present world, still "our citizenship is in heaven" if we truly belong to our Lord Jesus Christ, and form a part of the family of God. As the children of our Heavenly Father we are called out of the world that we may attain to everlasting life and win the crown of glory that our dear Savior has to bestow upon all the faithful at his coming. To be forever with our Lord in his future glory we must be made like him by a transformation of our nature and character. Are political rabblings, with all their insane noise, and extravagant confusion, the proper places of resort to come in contact with those blessed, renewing influences that will mold us into the likeness of the Son of God? Would our Lord Jesus, the great "Captain of our salvation," lead us into the demoralising crowds that now so frequently congregate, to order that we might grow in grace and become prepared for a part in the kingdom of God? To be strictly a follower of the Redeemer is emphatically enjoined upon us in God's holy word. Where he would lead the way, it would be perfectly right and proper for us to go, and where he would not be found, is no place for his disciples. As to the expediency of simply voting for the exaltation of the best men, as any one may think, and for the establishment of what one may be persuaded are the best principles, we are disposed to let each person conscientiously and prayerfully settle this matter with himself. While we have most decided preferences, as to the candidates for the highest place in the gift of the people of these United States, and although the course we may deem it best to take, as a minister of the gospel, may be thought to be unpatriotic and blameworthy, we may and probably shall decide on neutrality. Our supreme preference is for a heavenly administration of the affairs of the universal world's Christ. One sure choice is for the laws of government provided in divine revelation — a theocracy pure and simple.

Communications.

Dear Restitution:

I notice in your issue of Oct. 10th the communications from Brethren Eychaner and Hoyt. Am glad to see that Brother Eychaner is to come east as a delegate. Both these brethren and probably some others with them seem to be timid as to the use of a Common Covenant in the Church. Do our brethren realize that if in their judgment, it is best not to have a Common Covenant, even though it be entirely unexceptional and "short and Scriptural," the proper thing for them to do is to attend as delegates and vote it down? The first thing that would probably be considered is the question as to whether or no the church shall adopt any Covenant, before they consider the question of what Covenant they shall adopt. I mention these good and well known Brethren, only because they probably represent a number of others who have the same fears, though unexpressed. All such, I ask to consider whether, when they were themselves baptized, or when they baptized others, they did not themselves give and to turn require of others an expression of a belief on the strength of which they were baptized? Would any Evangelist or preacher baptize an applicant whom they did not consider sound in the faith? Every such confession followed by baptism is a Covenant both with our God and with those who are heirs with them to the same crown. You have all given expression before baptism, in answering questions, to some creed or form of belief, and it was right that you should. In some cases it was long, in other cases shorter; as dissimilar as the moods and teachings of those who baptized you. Dear Brethren, are you not making too much out of so simple a thing, and, to my mind, so proper a thing? But if it is wrong, by all means come and oppose it. But be sure to offer some other better way by which, while our churches remain independent they may feel themselves united in loving bonds pledged to support and sustain each other. Let us all come bringing with us the determination to subordinate our own wishes and prejudices in non essentials to the advancement of the good of the whole Church, if need be. Let us take up the business interests of the church and the advancement of the cause in a businesslike way giving it the same intelligent thought that we would bestow on our own business. Order and system are apparent in all God's ways, and if we are his church, order must rule also with us. Has it been so with us? The simile of the church as a perfect man whose head is Christ, covers the thought of symmetry; of unity in all its parts, and of help accorded by one part of the body to all other parts. Every other church fills out this idea of united action and work better than our own. After thirty years of disorganized work with the church smaller now than then, is it not time for us to bestir ourselves to improve our plans and drop all hinderances?

GEO. F. WORK.

Dear Restitution:

I am very glad that the time and place for holding the National Conference has been definitely fixed. Now let the churches, which have not already done so, appoint their delegates at once.

Our people have knowledge and are also strong in faith. What we lack is work.

To accomplish much good in the world, or to hold even what we have, we must have united and systematic effort.

Let no one give themselves any uneasiness about a creed being adopted by the conference. The delegates which will compose that body and the churches they will represent, are opposed to a creed, none more so than the church at Philadelphia and Bro. Work, who called the conference.

There are a number of churches where Brother Connor has been holding services, which will not likely send delegates, as they are not very strong. I would suggest that such of them as do not send a delegate of their own number, unite on Brother Connor as a delegate to represent them and send him.

It is very desirable that all the churches be represented, so that they may take part and assist in the deliberations of the conference.

Let us hear from eastern Indiana. There is the church at Claysville and the church at Gospel Grove, in both of which there is timber that would make excellent delegates. Brethren do not all live west. Let us have delegates. They would be welcome.

Let us also hear from Argos and Antioch. In fact we want to hear from every church in the State upon this very important matter.

Shall we always fight on the picket line, with here and there a random shot, or shall we unite our forces and buckle on the whole armor of God, having our loins girt about with truth and having on the breastplate of righteousness, our feet shod with the preparation of the gospel, taking the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit, go forward conquering and to conquer.

Let us meet together, in the name of the Lord, in the City of Brotherly Love, with charity in our hearts, zeal in our souls, and our whole person wrought up to a determination to do a good work for the Lord. And may it be said of us, as it was said of that other church at Philadelphia, in the long ago, behold I have set before thee an open door and no man can shut it: for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name.

R. S. DWIGGINS.

[The church at Claysville selected Dr. C. W. Fry as their delegate.]

Quick and Powerful.

For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Heb. iv. 12. Christians are sanctified through the truth. Jesus in his prayer says, "Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth." John xvii. 17. There is spirit in the words of Jesus. It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are Spirit, and they are life. John vi. 63. Faith comes by the word of God. So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. The Scripture came by inspiration. And that from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is Christ Jesus. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. 2 Tim. iii. 15–17. We are to believe on Christ through the word. Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word. John xvii. 20.

The Scriptures were written for our learning. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. Rom. xv. 4. Gladly receive the word. Then they that gladly received the word were baptized, and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls. Acts ii. 41. Is the word of God our guide? Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path. Psa. cxix. 105. The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul, the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple, the statutes of the Lord are right rejoicing the heart; the commandments of the Lord are pure, enlightening the eyes. Psa. xix. 7–8 Man lives by the word of God. And Jesus answered him saying, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God. Luke iv. 4.

Is there Spirit in the word of God? Jesus says my word is Spirit and it is life. Can we be sanctified through the truth? Jesus says, Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth. Are we begotten by the truth? Seeing ye have purified your souls, obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently, being begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever; the word of God endureth forever, and this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you. 1 Peter i. 22–25.

The gospel the power of God. I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. Rom. i. 16 From this we learn that God's power is in the gospel of Christ, there is spirit and power in the gospel of Christ. Dear ones of like precious faith, is God's word a true guide or not? After all God's love to man in sending his Son into the world to die for sinners, and after he has spoken by his servants the prophets, and apostles, and his Son, then shall poor, frail man say we want more than these and contend we must have God's Spirit aside from all this? As for me I believe there is Spirit in God's word. Men were inspired to speak as God moved upon them, by the Holy Spirit; therefore there is Spirit and power. It will sanctify, it will purify, it will save, it will judge us in the last day. It enlightens the eyes, it rejoices the heart, it is a lamp to our feet, a light to our path. If we live up to its teaching it will give us an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom.

We must meditate upon his law day and night. David says, before I was afflicted I went astray, and again he says I was envious at the wicked; but when he went into the sanctuary of the Lord then he learned their end, thou castest them down to destruction. David learned all this from the law of the Lord. God's word teaches the doctrine, we get the reproof, we get the correction, we get the instruction, so that the man of God is perfect and thoroughly furnished unto all good works. Now are we men of God? Yes, we say. Well, dear brother, are you about to engage in a good work? Yes, I am a man of God, and I want to engage in a good work. Well, what do you want now to help you? Well, says one, I can't work without the direct outpouring of God's Spirit. Will not God's word furnish you unto all good works? No, some say, it is good as far as it goes. And you are a man of God? Yes. And it is a good work you are about to engage in? Yes. Well, dear brother, please settle this with Paul.

Dear ones, I have been preaching for about twenty four years, and I find the gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation, and I will continue to preach the word of the kingdom. And when Philip preached the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women. Lord cleanse us by thy word for it is full of Spirit and power. Paul says, let the words of Christ dwell in you richly. Why? For there is Spirit and power in Christ's words. All can see I believe in the Spirit operating on the heart of man, for there is enough spirit in God's word. Love to all the dear ones.

J. S. HATOR.

"A HARD YEAR."

"A hard year?" No, brother; it has been a most bountiful year. At every turn there have been poured out blessings into our laps, until there is scarcely room to receive, and we are ready to affirm that the Lord is a gracious God, and a faithful. He has said, "bring your tithes into my storehouse and prove me therewith." We have brought them; we have proved him, and have found him able "to multiply the seed sown," that we might "abound to every good work."

Every crop harvested, has had added thereto, many bushels beyond our expectations, and gladly do we bring our thank-offerings to him. It is good to serve the Lord. That has been and is our actual experience. We have walked out by faith upon his gracious promises and they have been more than realized.

"A hard year, brother?" We never see hard years, because the dear Lord is always with us, and always supplies our need. The more we give, the more we have to give. Nothing, to pay the preacher? Nothing, for the dear Lord who has given you every penny that you possess?

Nothing for the cause of the dear Savior, who died for you?

Nothing? Nothing, towards saving men? Nothing?

I do not wonder that you have hard years! Give! give! give and you will have plenty to give to those who need, for that is the promise of a God who never lies. Give, and be thankful.

"And when thou hast truly thanked thy God,
For every blessing sent,
But little time will then remain,
For murmur or lament."

J. L. and S. R. WINER.

Dear Restitution:

I would like to quote a little Scripture.

Woe unto him who putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips. No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven. Look not on the wine when it is red, etc. Can any Christian man or woman pray, lead us not into temptation, and yet place temptation before others, and with due deference to others, can we expect to share in the Millennium if we do not do our duty.

We do not need to be like the boy who could not carry water to help put out the fire, and when his father asked what he did, said he stood back and hollowed Amen. Where much is given much is required, and we can do more than say Amen. We can help make it. Would you, father or mother, do anything that you know would ruin your son, than have you the right to do the thing that will ruin your neighbor's son, or may be sisters or brothers? I cannot see how any person with the religion of Christ in their heart can see that daily threaded annually going to their graves lost to this world and the world to come.

God speed the day when this accursed evil shall be put down. When it not only shall be, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, But, Thou shalt not ruin my son, nor thy son. Then will it be the nearer the ushering in of the Millennium. Men will steal, men will kill, but they are punished, and must we needs license them to steal or kill? Nay. Then let us work for the bettering of humanity. Yours for Truth.

ALICE V. SHIELEY.

POPERY, RESUSCITATED AND CONSUMMATED PAGANISM.

The plan which Satan has followed from the beginning, in opposing God, has been to substitute the counterfeit for the real. He does not forbid man to worship; he gains his end just as well by teaching him to worship in a wrong way. He does not boldly and directly affirm that there is no God; he employs his art and cunning in seducing man to worship a false God. Satan did not set up a system of atheism among the ancient nations; on the contrary, he taught them to be very religious. There was no end to their gods, temples, and rites. But all the while he hid from their knowledge the one true God, the Maker of the heavens and the earth. He pointed to the sun in the heavens, who year by year brings the world out of darkness and death, and by the power of his beams clothes it with the fertility, the growth, and the glory of summer. He said to men, There is your god; it is this divine and glorious object to whom you are to pay your homage.

And coming yet a stage lower, Satan said to men, It is meet that you should have a representative on earth of this god in the sky; choose ye some renowned warrior, some mighty monarch, whom you may appoint the vicegerent of the heavenly luminary, and through whom you may offer your worship to the Sun-God. Thus did Satan substitute the counterfeit for the real, and thus did he elaborate a system of worship for the early nations, which spread with their extension over the earth, and in due time became a world-wide idolatry. It traveled eastward into India and China; it journeyed westward into Egypt and Greece; it went on to Rome, and overspread Europe. In the course of its peregrinations it multiplied its gods and its rites; it diversified their names, and the form of worship paid them; it was mystical in India, utterly gross in Egypt, redolent of beauty in Greece; at Rome it surrounded itself with a halo of battles and victories; but in all lands it was the same idolatry—it was a counterfeit god, and a counterfeit worship, cunningly put in the room of the true God; and the longer men continued to worship, the deeper they sank in ignorance, in sensuality and vice.

When the gospel came, a new epoch opened on the world. It was now to be seen that as God had not yet developed his whole plan of grace, Satan had not yet produced his master-piece of imposture. The deceiver at this crisis exhibited a craft and ingenuity which eclipsed by their success all his former efforts. On what plan did he work in rearing his new edifice, or rather, rebuilding the old; for it was a restoration, not a new building he set up, when he took up the old stones of Paganism to reconstruct his new temple of Popery? His plan was the same he had pursued from the beginning. He once more palmed upon the world the counterfeit for the true. He now gave himself to the study of the Gospel—not that he might be a devout disciple, or an able preacher, but that he might be a cunning perverter and a clever imitator. He carefully marked the order and arrangement of the Gospel Church; he searched out the sources of the gospel's power, and noted the ends the gospel sought to attain, and went his way and erected an ecclesiastical system as like the gospel Church as it was possible to be; like it in appearance and form, but distinct and antagonistic in its essence and in its ends. Even Satan had never succeeded so well as before. The imitation was perfect. As in those days when God had his theocracy among the Jews, Satan had his theocracy among the Gentiles, so was it now; God had set up his gospel church in the world, and Satan set up his church also.

The counterfeit church of Satan lacks nothing in appearance which the church of God possesses. Let us run our eye over it, and mark how exactly the form has been copied, while the spirit is utterly extinguished, and the end completely inverted. First of all, Satan's counterfeit church has its high priest. Not to speak of its Pontiff, who, like the great Druid of our islands, and the Pontifex Maximus of the Romans, stands at the top of the system, there is a body of men in the church of Rome who profess to offer for the sins of the living and the dead, and to mediate between God and men in virtue of their powers as a priesthood. Second, this church has its great sacrifice—the mass, to wit: The worshiper is bidden look, not to the Sacrifice on Calvary, but to the sacrifice on the altar, for the pardon of his sin and the salvation of his soul. Third, this church has its Bible—the traditions of its Fathers, together with the Canon Law: the Canon of the Council of Trent occupies the place in the Church of Rome which the Scriptures do in the Church of Christ. They are her rule of faith, and are held by her to be an infallible revelation of the will of God, and an infallible director of the conscience. Thus Christ as the One Priest, his death as the one all-sufficient sacrifice, and the Bible as the one infallible guide, Popery throws aside, and puts counterfeits in their room.

For an apostolic succession which consists in the doctrine of the apostles, it substitutes a succession of matter—a succession of official men, who alone have the power of conveying grace; a chain which has not in it, from beginning to end, one broken link: while the fact is, if history is to be believed, that all the links are broken, and one whole link there is not in it at all. All the persons in the Godhead popery denies. It denies them after its usual manner of supplanting them, and adroitly substituting counterfeits for them. It denies God the Father by installing the Pope as Divine Vicegerent of the world and infallible ruler of the conscience. It presents him sitting aloft, above magistrates and kings, with power to annul their laws, cast them down from their thrones, plant or pluck up nations, and abrogate even the precepts of the moral law. Popery writes on the Papal chair, This is the seat of God, the throne of the infallible and holy one. He who sits here can pardon or retain men's sins; in other words, save or destroy their souls.

Popery denies the Son of God. It robs Christ of his priestly office by assuming the power of offering efficaciously for the sins of men. It is the priest's sacrifice, not Christ's that saves the sinner. Popery robs Christ of his prophetical office, by presenting itself as the infallible teacher of the will of God, and the only authorized expositor of the true sense of Scripture, without whose guidance we are sure to err in interpreting the Bible. It robs Christ of the office as the one Mediator and Intercessor, by making Mary and the saints intercessors with God for men. It robs Christ of his kingly office, by exalting the Pope to his royal seat as head of the church, and head of the world for the church. On his vesture and on his thigh the Pope has a name written, "King of kings, and Lord of lords."

Popery denies the Spirit of God. For the Spirit substitutes the Sacrament, by giving to the Sacrament the power, by its own inherent efficacy, to regenerate the soul, and to make men holy, and heirs of heaven. It robs the Spirit of his honor as the medium through which divine blessings are communicated to the soul, and by which it at last is made perfect in holiness, by making its priesthood the only channel of communication betwixt God and men, without whose agency all grace and blessing are utterly beyond the reach of men. Here, then, is what professes to be a church, a perfect and complete church; and yet in an out-and-out counterfeit. Every element of strength, and every principle of evil that were found in the ancient idolatries live over again in the Papacy. That same Paganism whose cradle was rocked in Chaldea, whose youth was passed amid the olive groves and matchless temples of Greece, and whose manhood was reached amid the martial sounds and iron organization of Rome, has returned anew in the Papacy, bringing with it the old rites, the old festivals, the flowers, the incensings, the lustral water, the vestments, the very gods—but with new names; everything, in short. And were an old Pagan to rise from the dead, he would find himself amid his old environments, and, without a moment's doubt, would conclude that the ancient Jove was still reigning, and was being worshiped by the same rites that were practiced in his honor two thousand years ago.

To conclude, Popery is an assignment of the Christian Church by the substitution of a Pantheon of idols. Extinguishing the great lights of revelation, it rolls back the world, and places it once more amid the ideas, the deities, and the rites of early and idolatrous ages.—J. A. Wylie, LL.D., in Watchword.

Notice of the General Conference.

Philadelphia having been chosen by the voice of the Church as the place, and November 16th named as the time for the holding of the General Conference of the Church of God, and of other churches in sympathy with the general doctrines taught in that Church, notice is now given that the General Conference will convene on the afternoon of November 16th at the Blessed Hope Mission, corner of 12th and Dickinson streets, Philadelphia, and continue in session, if found necessary for a period of ten days from that date. The business questions embraced in the call made for this Conference and such other questions as the delegates may themselves decide to consider, will be brought up and decided upon by the regularly appointed delegates from the several churches, who shall cast the votes of the churches they represent in deciding these questions. It is proposed to have devotional and religious meetings carried on simultaneously with the business meetings, and to these, all preaching brethren and all brethren and sisters who can come are cordially invited to be present, and all who come will be provided and cared for during the sessions of the conference. It is hoped that all who can come will do so. Each delegate and each preacher or evangelist regularly appointed, and serving one or more churches, who may attend, will receive from the Phila. Church a contribution to make up any deficiency up to, but not exceeding, $20.00 in the amount supplied him from other sources toward his traveling expenses. Any regularly organized church may send one delegate and any group of churches may unite and send one delegate. Any State or local conference of churches may also be represented by a delegate. The following are offered as suggestions to delegates:

1st. A delegate may be appointed at any time before conference meets.

2nd. Let each delegate bring with him official notice of his having been appointed by the church he represents; such notice to be signed by some officer other than himself.

3rd. Let each delegate get together statistics as to membership and officers of the church he represents and of any neighboring church not represented, giving names, etc., of each, for purpose of record.

4th. Let each intending visitor, whether a delegate or not, send his name and address to Elder O. C. Ramsay, 1002 Mount Vernon Street, Phila. who will thus be able to provide accommodations for him.

5th. If any delegate or visitor cannot come for the entire time, he will probably accomplish the most by coming at the latter end of the conference.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 14.—The China mail received here today per steamer City of Pekin, from Hong Kong and Yokohama, says a disastrous flood occurred near Fang-Shan-Hsein, in the vicinity of Pekin. The night of Aug. 18 seven and a half inches of rain fell in Pekin and immense volumes of water collected in the ravines about Lien-Li Ho and suddenly broke in upon twenty villages. More than 10,000 people were drowned; also a large number of draft animals. Villages in valleys near Pekin are in danger every season, as the hills are destitute of trees, and waters flow together in fearful torrents unimpeded by the vegetation. News of the catastrophe was brought by missionaries who had been living near the scene of the disaster.

VANVACTOR—FENSTERMACHER.—At the residence of Mr. H. S. Watson, near Argos, Indiana, by Eld. S. A. Chaplin, Oct. 10, 1888, Mr. David VanVactor and Miss Matilda Fenstermacher, both of Marshall Co., Indiana.

The services of the "Church of the Second Advent," Montgomery Ave., west of Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., are held each Sunday morning by the Pastor, Elder O. C. Ramsay, who also holds the services at the "Blessed Hope Mission," at Twelfth and Dickinson Streets, each Sunday evening, the morning service being led by Elder Wm. H. Noel.

HYMN OF THE WALDENSES.

Hear Father, hear thy faint, afflicted flock
Cry to thee from the desert and the rock,
While those who seek to slay thy children hold
Blasphemous worship under roofs of gold;
And the broad goodly lands with pleasant airs
That nurse the grape and wave the grain, are theirs.

Yet better were this mountain wilderness,
And this wild life of danger and distress—
Watchings by night, and perilous flight by day,
And meetings in the depths of earth to pray,—
Better, far better than to kneel with them,
And pray the hopeless rite the laws condemn.

Then, Lord, dost hold the thunder: the firm land
Totters in billows when it feels thy hand.
Time dashest nation against nation, then
Stillest the angry world to peace again.
Oh, touch their stony hearts who hunt thy sons,—
The murderers of our wives and little ones.

Yet, mighty God, yet shall thy frown look forth
Unveiled, and terribly shall shake the earth,
Then the foul power of priestly sin and all
Its long-upheld blasphemies shall fall.
Thou shalt raise up the trampled and oppressed
And thy delivered saints shall dwell in rest.

THE MAN OF SIN. 2 Thess. ii. No. 9.

POPISH CLAIMS TO MIRACULOUS POWERS.

Page 64. "Bernardine de Busto relates that a bird was taught to say 'Hail Mary.' A hawk was on the point of seizing it when the bird cried out, 'Hail Mary!' In an instant the hawk fell dead. God intended to show thereby that if even an irrational creature was preserved by calling on Mary how much more would those who are prompt in calling on her when assaulted by devils, be delivered from them."

Page 70. "David fearing the horrors of death encouraged himself by placing his reliance in the death of the coming Redeemer, and in the intercession of the Virgin Mother. 'For though,' he says, 'I should walk in the midst of the shadow of death, thy rod and thy staff they have comforted me.' Cardinal Hugo explaining those words of the Royal Prophet says that the staff signifies the cross, and the rod is the intercession of Mary; for she is the rod foretold by the prophet Isaias. 'And there shall come forth a rod out of the root of Jesse, and a flower shall rise up out of his root.' 'This Divine Mother,' says Saint Peter Damian, 'is that powerful rod with which the violence of the infernal enemies is conquered.' And therefore does St. Antonious encourage us saying, 'If Mary is for us who shall be against us?'"

Page 89. "One of the titles which is the most encouraging to poor sinners, and under which the church teaches us to invoke Mary in the Litany of Loretto, is that of "Refuge of sinners." In Judea in ancient times, there were cities of refuge in which criminals who fled there for protection, were exempt from the punishments which they had deserved. Now-a-days these cities are not so numerous, but there is one and that is Mary, of whom the Psalmist says, 'Glorious things are said of thee, O city of God.' But this city differs from the ancient ones in this respect, that in the latter all kinds of criminals did not find refuge, nor was the protection extended to every class of crime, but under the mantle of Mary, all sinners, without exception find refuge for every sin that they may have committed, provided only that they go there to seek for this protection. 'I am the city of refuge,' says St. John Damascene in the name of our Queen, 'to all who fly to me.'"

Page 106. "We often obtain more promptly what we ask by calling on the name of Mary, than by invoking that of Jesus. Her Son is Lord and Judge of all and discerns the merits of each one; and therefore if he does not immediately grant the prayers of all he is just. When, however, the Mother's name is invoked, though the merits of the supplicant are not such as to deserve that this prayer should be granted, those of the Mother supply that he may receive.' St. Anselm."

"'Many things,' says Nicepeorus, 'are asked from God, and are not granted; they are asked from Mary, and are obtained.' And how is this? It is 'because God has thus decreed to honor his Mother.'"

"In the Franciscan Chronicles it is related that brother Leo once saw a red ladder on the summit of which was Jesus Christ; and a white one on the top of which was his most holy Mother; and he saw some who tried to ascend the red ladder, and they mounted a few steps and fell; they tried again, and again fell. They were then advised to go and try the white ladder, and by that one they easily ascended, for our Blessed Lady stretched out her hand and helped them, and so they got safely to heaven. Doris the Carthusian asks, 'Who is there that is saved? Who is there that reigns in heaven?' And he answers, 'They are certainly saved and reign in heaven for whom this Queen of mercy intercedes.' And this Mary herself confirms in the book of Proverbs, 'By me kings reign,' 'through my intercession souls reign,' etc."

Page 226. "'If then, O brethren,' concludes Thomas A. Kempis, 'you desire consolation in every labor, have recourse to Mary, invoke the name of Mary, honor Mary, recommend yourselves to Mary, rejoice with Mary, weep with Mary, pray with Mary, walk with Mary, seek Jesus with Mary; in fine, desire to live and die with Jesus and Mary.'"

Same page. "Saint Ephrem goes so far as to say that the name of Mary is the key to the gates of heaven in the hands of those who devoutly invoke it."

Pages 227 and 228. "Blessed is the man who loves thy name O Mary,' exclaims Saint Bonaventure 'Yes, truly blessed is he who loves thy sweet name, O Mother of God! for,' he continues, 'thy name is so glorious and admirable, that no one who remembers it has any fears at the hour of death.'"

"O, that we may end our lives as did the Capuchin father Fulgentius of Ascoli who expired saying, O Mary, O Mary, the most beautiful of creatures! let us depart together;' or like blessed Henry Cistercian, who expired in the very moment that he was pronouncing the most sweet name of Mary. Let us then, O devout reader, beg God to grant us, that at death the name of Mary may be the last word on our lips, and that it may be there at that moment. This was the prayer of Saint Germanus: 'May the last movement of my tongue be to pronounce the name of the Mother of God.' O sweet, O safe is that death which is accompanied and protected by such a saving name, for God only grants the grace of invoking it to those whom he is about to save!"

Also page 228. "Saint Bernard, 'I ask thee, O Mary, for the glory of thy name, to come and meet my soul when it is departing from this world, and to take it in thine arms.' 'Disdain not, O Mary,' the Saint continues, 'to come then and comfort me with thy presence. By thyself my soul's ladder and way to heaven. Do thou thyself obtain for it the grace of forgiveness and eternal repose.' He then concludes, saying, 'O Mary, our advocate, it is for thee to defend thy clients, and to undertake their cause before the tribunal of Jesus Christ.'

Page 231. "Prayer of Saint Ephrem, 'O immaculate and entirely pure Virgin Mary, Mother of God, Queen of the Universe, our own good Lady, thou art above all the saints, the only hope of the patriarchs, and the joy of the saints. Through thee we have been reconciled with our God.' O great Princess, Mother of God, cover us with the wings of thy mercy and pity us. No other hope but thee is given us, O most pure Virgin. Oh! then permit not that Lucifer should drag us to hell.'"

Page 237. "Prayer of Saint Andrew of Candia (or of Jerusalem, foot note), 'O Mother of Mercy, appease thy beloved Son. I implore thee, then, O Holy Virgin, to grant me the help of thy prayers with God; prayers which are dearer and more precious to us than all the treasures of the earth; prayers which render God propitious to us in our sins,' etc."

Page 239. "Prayer of Saint Athanasius," 'Give ear to our prayers O most holy Virgin and be mindful of us. Dispense unto us the gifts of thy riches, and the abundance of the graces with which thou art filled. The archangel saluted thee, and called thee full of grace. All nations call thee blessed. The whole hierarchy of heaven blesses thee; and we who are of the terrestrial hierarchy also address thee, saying, Hail, O full of grace, our Lord is with thee; pray for us, O Holy Mother of God, our Lady and our Queen.'"

Same page, "Prayer of Saint Anselm, 'We beseech thee, O most holy Lady, O lend us a willing ear. If thou deignest to pray to thy Son for this, he will immediately grant it. It suffices that thou willest our salvation, and thou we are sure to obtain it, But who can restrain thy great mercy? If thou, who art our Mother, and the Mother of Mercy, dost not pity us, what will become of us when thy Son comes to judge us.'"

Page 244. "First point. In the first place it was becoming that the Eternal Father should preserve Mary from the stain of original sin, because she was his daughter and his first-born daughter, as she herself declares: 'I came out of the mouth of the Most High, the first born before all creatures.' Ecol. xxiv. 5. For this text is applied to Mary by sacred interpreters, the holy Fathers, and by the Church, on the solemnity of her conception.' It was quite becoming that Mary should never have been the slave of Lucifer, but only and always, possessed by her Creator; and this she in reality was, as we are assured by herself: 'The Lord possessed me in the beginning of ways.' Prov. viii. 22. Hence Denis of Alexandria rightly calls Mary 'the one and only daughter of life.'"

Page 371. "St. Antoninus, 'As the mistress is, without comparison, above her servants, so is Mary, who is the sovereign Lady of the Angels, exalted incomparably above the angelic hierarchies.' To understand this, we need only know what David said: 'The Queen stood on thy right hand,' Psa. xlv. 10, and in a sermon by an ancient author, among the works of St. Athanasius, these words are explained as meaning that 'Mary is placed at the right hand of God.'"

Page 384. "Saint Bonaventure. This saint, considering Mary on Mount Calvary present at the death of her Son, questions her in these words: 'O Lady, tell me where didst thou stand? Was it only at the foot of the cross? Ah, much more than this, thou wast on the cross itself, crucified with thy Son.' Richard of Saint Lawrence, on the words of the Redeemer, spoken by Isaias the prophet: 'I have trodden the wine press alone, and of the Gentiles there is not a man with me,' says, 'It is true O Lord that in the work of human redemption, thou didst suffer alone, and that there was not a man who sufficiently pitied thee; but there was a woman with thee, and she was thine own Mother; she suffered in her heart all that thou didst endure in thy body.'"

On this point there is a quotation on page 389 from Saint Bonaventure, who, addressing this blessed Virgin, says, 'And why, oh Lady, didst thou also go to sacrifice thyself on Calvary.' Was not a crucified God sufficient to redeem us, that thou his Mother, wouldst also go to be crucified with him?'"

Page 478. "The devotion of the most holy rosary was revealed to Saint Dominic by the Divine Mother herself, at a time when the Saint was in affliction, and bewailing with his Sovereign Lady, over the Albigensian heretics, who were at that time doing great mischief to the church. Suffice it to know that this devotion has been approved by the Church, and that the sovereign Pontiffs have enriched it with indulgences. The following are the principal indulgences which may be gained by those who use beads, to which the Bridgetine indulgences have been attached."

'I. A hundred days' indulgence for every 'Our Father,' 'Hail Mary,' and 'Creed.' Leo X. July 10, 1516.'

'II. For reciting the whole rosary of fifteen decades, besides the above indulgences, one of seven years, and seven quarantines. Ib.'

'III. If the rosary is said with another person, or persons, the same indulgence may be gained. Ib.'

'IV. Those who say at least five decades of the rosary, every day for a year, can gain, on a day at their own choice, a plenary indulgence, provided that, truly contrite for their sins, they approach the holy sacrament of Penance, and the Eucharist, and pray for the welfare of the Church. Clement XI. Sep. 22, 1716.

'V. Those who say at least five decades of the rosary once a week, can gain a plenary indulgence on the feast of St. Bridget (8th of October), on condition that they approach the holy sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist, and in their parish church, or some other church pray as above. Benedict XIV. Jan. 15, 1742.'

'VI. Those who are in the habit of saying the rosary as above, can, in the article of death, having confessed and received the Holy Communion, gain a plenary indulgence by pronouncing the holy name of Jesus, with sorrow for their sins, at least mentally, if they are unable to do so with their lips.' Ib.

'VII. Those who say the rosary as above, every day for a month, can, on a day at their choice within the month, gain a plenary indulgence, by going to confession and communion, visiting a church, and praying as above.' Ib.

'VIII. Those who have the rosary with them, and contrite for their sins, examine their consciences, and say an 'Our Father,' and three 'Hail Marys,' gain an indulgence of twenty days. Ib.'

'IX. Those who have their rosary with them, and hear mass on any day, hear a sermon, or accompany the holy Viaticum to a sick person, convert a sinner, or perform any act of piety in honor of our Lord Jesus Christ, or of the Blessed Virgin Mary, or of Saint Bridget, and say three 'Our Fathers,' and 'Hail Marys,' gain an indulgence of a hundred days. Ib.'

'X. All the above indulgences are applicable to the souls in purgatory.'

'Very many other indulgences have been granted to this devotion by various pontiffs; it would therefore be well for all to have the intention to gain all the indulgences which have been granted. The beads must have had the indulgences of Saint Bridget annexed to them by a priest, who has received power to do so. Only the first person who uses them, after the blessing, can gain the indulgences. If the beads are given away after they have been once used they must be blessed again." J. Cameron.

"It is worthy of note here that Saint Athanasius was the author of the Creed that bears his name, and that is ordered to be recited on certain occasions in the (Protestant) Episcopal church of England, and probably in other Episcopal churches throughout the world. That Creed is a detailed lengthy statement of what is known as a doctrine of the Trinity, with a brief reference at the close to the death, resurrection, ascension, return for judgment of our Lord, and the resurrection of the dead. This is called the Catholic Faith, of which it is declared, "Which Faith except every one do keep whole and undefiled: without doubt he shall perish everlastingly." J. C.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich

Dear Restitution:

With regard to Brother Geo. F. Work's communication to the Church of God in No. 31, Aug. 16, may I lovingly suggest, can we not meet in a broader, a more Scriptural platform or basis, i. e., the name of our Lord Jesus Christ alone? By gathering because you are looking for one Lord, and adopting a "Covenant," however Biblical in itself, for all to adopt, you shut out all who may not have learned such teachings. Is not the name of the Lord Jesus the all-saving foundation? Acts iv. 12; xi. 43; 1 Cor. iii. 11. Into that name we are immersed. Acts xix. 5. R. V. All in him are members of his body, his church, whatever their knowledge or intelligence as to the teachings of the word. Should we not then assemble and organize in every place on this same alone, welcoming all, irrespective of doctrines, in that name? There are some who profess to have no creed but the Bible, but, alas their unwritten creed is so narrow, that the coming of the Lord, non-eternity of torment, and many other things, must not be mentioned.

But would not such a meeting, having believers with all kinds of ideas, be a scene of endless quarrels and disputes? How can two, much more many, walk together except they be agreed?" Only those thus unite in Christ Jesus who are agreed, they are gathered by the Spirit in his name, and he will be there by his Spirit. Matt. xviii. 20; 1 Cor. vi. 19; Eph. ii. 22. Love, not agreement as to doctrines, is their bond of perfectness. Col. iii. 14.

"Blest is the tie that binds Believers hearts in one."

On this Scriptural basis or rock, the church will be a nursery for the newborn, a school for the untaught, a hospital for the feeble. All will be brethren, with only one Master, Matt. xxiii. 8. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. 2 Cor. iii. 17. All are to "desire earnestly the greater gifts," 1 Cor. xii. 31, but rather that they may prophesy, i. e., speak to men edification (or building up) and comfort and exhortation. xiv. 1, 3, 4. Two or three may speak in a meeting, the others discern, (Gr. discriminate,) in love. All may prophesy one after the other, not to show off their knowledge, for argument or mastery, but that all may learn, and that all may be comforted or exhorted, or built up. As love reigns, through the Spirit, all are subject one to the other, 25-34, 40; Rom. xiv. 13, 7, 8, doing nothing through faction or vain glory, but in lowliness of mind, each counting the other better than himself. Phil. ii. 3, 5. If one brings a teaching contrary to what another sees to be correct, let the latter take him lovingly and expound unto him the way of God more carefully. Acts xviii. 26-28. If he does not accept, bear with him, pray with him and for him. Let it be fully understood that no one is responsible for another's sight, belief or teaching, but that all are equally free in love for edification, etc., to say what he has learned from the word of truth.

Here will arise occasions for forbearance, patience, prayer and love, for what praise is it if we love those only who agree with us? Let hobbies be drowned in love, overcome by prayer. In the course of time, longer or shorter, as the grace of God may give us humble, forbearing and teachable minds, we shall have our own mistakes corrected—for no one is without them—our ideas enlarged, our grace and knowledge increased. 2 Peter iii. 18.

That such was the apostolic manner is evident. When the saints at Antioch were troubled with words and subverted, there was no direction to put them out or withdraw from them. Acts xv. 24; compare xx. 29, etc. The bishop, overseer, or elder, was to hold to the faithful word according to the (apostolic) teaching, not that he may separate from all of the contrary mind, but that he may be able to exhort in the sound or healthful teaching, and to convict the gainsayers. Titus i. 9. Will that not require patience, forbearance and prayer? Certainly; so act that he that is of the contrary part (to sound speech) may be ashamed, etc. ii. 7, 8. Speak and exhort and reprove with all authority. Yet "the Lord's servant must not strive, but be gentle towards all, apt to teach, forbearing in meekness, (not in argument or disputings), correcting, or as it is in the margin, instructing them that oppose themselves, if peradventure (here again is room for patience) God may give them a change of mind unto the knowledge of the truth, etc. 2 Tim. ii. 23-26. If any man teacheth a different teaching, and consenteth not to sound words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the teaching which is according to godliness, he is puffed up, etc., but he is not to be expelled; according to R. V.

It is a case for shepherd care, prayerful love. 1 Tim. vi. 3-5. If one is idle and disobedient, he is to be noted, admonished, and not companioned, but neither is he expelled. 2 Thess. iii. 12-15. From eighteen characters we must turn away, but holders of what we suppose to be false doctrine are not one of them. 2 Tim. iii. 1-9. In Rom. xvi. 17, we are besought to mark them which are causing the divisions (separations into denominations) and occasions of stumbling, contrary to the apostolic teaching, and to turn away from them; but not to turn them out or to leave the assembly of God. In the second epistle of John the lady was told not to receive certain into her house or to give such a greeting, but no direction to leave the assembly. Diotrephes did wrong to cast out certain brethren, yet the apostle did not order him to be put out or separated from. 3 John 9-11. In the message to the seven churches, the Lord Jesus did not command the faithful either to put out the unfaithful or to leave them. Rev. ii. 3. The Corinthian fornicator was to be delivered to Satan, 1 Cor. v. 1-5, and on repentance to be restored, 2 Cor. ii. 5-11, while we are not to keep company, or to eat with a brother, who is a fornicator, covetous, idolater, reviler, drunkard, or extortioner. 1 Cor. v. 9-13. Here again it is no question of creed, doctrine, belief, or understanding of the word.

I hope to hear from you, Brother Work, and others. Yours in the Lord,

H. Veysey.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 42.

GOD; THE SOURCE OF OUR STRENGTH.

Lesson Chapter, Psalm xx.

GOLDEN TEXT:—The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?

DEFINITIONS OF STRENGTH.

Force, power, might, the idea being that when God gives strength he makes us powerful inwardly, makes us firm, hardens us to endure.

Q. What do we find is the lesson of the Bible in regard to strength?

A. That God is the strength of his people. Psalm 28: 7, 8-29; and that he is not the strength of wicked men.

Read the history of Goliath, 1 Sam. 17: 38-51 and the Israelites experience, when they trusted in Pharaoh, Isa. 30: 2.

Q. When is God the strength of those who trust in him?

A. The salvation of the righteous is of the Lord; he is their strength in times of trouble, Psalm 37: 39.

Q. Can we believe that he really and truly interposes for the deliverance of his people?

A. It is so taught. The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him and delivereth them. The righteous cry and the Lord heareth and delivereth them out of all their troubles, Psalm 34: 7, 17. See history of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, Dan. 3: 13-27.

Q. Is there any promise of strength to the sick.

A. Yes. If he have considered the poor, the Lord will keep him alive. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing and will make all his bed in his sickness, Psalm 41: 1, 2, 3.

Q. Through whom can we do all things; overcome all evil?

A. David said, it is God that giveth me strength; it is he that teacheth my hands to war, he has given me the shield of his salvation, Psalm 18: 32, 34, 35

Paul said, I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me, Phil. 4: 13.

The Lord stood with me and strengthened me. 2 Tim. 4: 17.

Q. Through what other mediums does this God-given strength come?

A. Through the Word;—The gospel is God's power unto salvation unto every one that believeth. Rom. 1: 16; Psalm 140: 20.

Through faith;—The gospel is God's power unto salvation, unto every one that believeth. Abraham was strong in faith. Rom. 4: 20.

Through angelic ministration;—Are they not all ministering spirits? Heb. 1: 14.

In heaven the angels do always behold the face of my Father. Matt. 18: 10. See also Acts 27: 23; Dan. 10: 18, 19.

Through the Spirit;—Paul's prayer for the Ephesians was, that they might "be strengthened, with might by his spirit in the inner man," Eph. 3: 16.

Q. Can God make the workman strong?

A. Yes. His strength is made perfect in weakness. 1 Cor. 12: 9; Heb. 11: 34. He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might, he increaseth strength. Isa. 40: 29.

Q. How can our strength be increased?

A. In the fear of the Lord there is strong confidence. Prov. 14: 20. He that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger. Job 17: 9. Gideon, and Barak and Samson and Jepthe and David and Samuel, and the prophets, through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions.

Others were tortured not accepting deliverance that they might obtain a better resurrection. Heb. 11: 32, 33, 35.

B. If our strength is in the Lord, will it be enduring strength?

A. In the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength. Isa. 26: 4. The strength of the Christian will endure to eternity, for the Lord, being the strength of the life of the Christian, his strength cannot be broken, he overcomes the world, through the power of the faith that is given him of God.

"Fear not, I am with thee,
Oh be not dismayed,
For I am thy God,
And will still give thee aid.
I'll strengthen and help thee,
And cause thee to stand,
Upheld by my righteous
Omnipotent hand."

Conference Report.

The Church of God in Southwestern Nebraska met in a beautiful grove on the banks of the Republican River, owned by John Prime, seven miles southwest of Arapahoe, Sept. 20th and closed Monday, the 24th. The brethren came with their tents and camped on the ground.

Brother Eschaner, of Iowa, preached the word and it was well received. Five were baptized into Christ. The names: Mrs. Dollie Gray, Mrs. Cora Prime, Mr. T. G. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Palmer Smith: all seemingly in good faith.

Brother A. Adams was selected as State Evangelist for Nebraska.

Committee on Evangelistic work: G. V. Misner, of Arapahoe, Neb.; J. V. Prime, of Oxford, Neb.; J. W. Sisla, of Columbus, Neb.

Officers elected for the ensuing year: Almus Adams, Pres.; G. V. Misner, Sec.; John Adams, Treas.

The question of a national conference, suggested by Brother Geo. F. Work, was taken up and discussed at length, the result being the following:

Resolved, That we, the Church of God in conference assembled for the State of Nebraska, favor the convening of a general conference, as per call of Brother Geo. F. Work in RESTITUTION, and we hereby instruct our delegate at large to not enter said conference or to withdraw from it, if when said conference assemble he shall ascertain that upon Art. I., concerning a church covenant, his entering said conference as a delegate, binds his State by the action of said conference to any creed or covenant whatever to be subscribed to by a candidate as a condition of his entering the church. We favor the city of Philadelphia as the place for holding the conference.

Brother Almus Adams was selected to act as delegate at large for the State of Nebraska.

We had one of the best meetings ever held in Southwest Nebraska. Much was said about our Lord and Savior's return. May the language of every heart be, Come Lord Jesus, come quickly. G. V. MISNER, Sec.

M. Joblin has changed his address from Murfreesboro, Tenn., to 624 Woodland Ave., Cleveland, O.

DIED.

ROBEY.—At Dundee, Blackford Co., Ind., Sept. 27, 1888, Volney Wilson Robey, aged 22 years, 4 months and 1 day.

His wife and child, the only members of his once happy little family are left with his father and mother two brothers and two sisters, to mourn the loss of one whom they so much loved. To them his loss is irreparable, the remembrance of his love is indelible. But in the hour of bereavement our only consolation comes from the promises of him who only hath power to restore that which is lost. But "What is our life? 'Tis but a vapor that appeareth for a little while and then vanisheth away." Funeral services Sept 30th were conducted by the writer, after which we laid him away to await the return of the Master to "judge the quick and dead." He was the Son of our esteemed Brother and Sister Robey of Blackford Co. His moral standing in society was attested by the interest manifested by his neighbors at his funeral, and one of the largest attendance ever witnessed by the writer. 'Tis sad to know that the enemy is fast closing his claim on both old and young. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." L. B. CORBIN.

Our Mollie is Dead.

Yes, Mollie M. Harris, of Meadow Brook, Henderson Co., N. C., for whom prayer from all the good was requested by her father, for the restoring of her mental sanity. She died Oct. 2, 1888, aged about forty years. She lived an exemplary life in the Baptist Church; saw and owned the truth and importance of the resurrection, and died in the hope of first meeting her husband, then her father, then all the rest of her people in the morning. Yes, Mollie is dead, but yet she speaketh, for her husband says that her influence and superior Christian graces, counsel and prayers seem to hedge him in, so vividly that he can almost see it as a literal wall around him to protect him from evil; also he says he never saw the importance of a resurrection till he learned it from her. Hence she speaketh. Her influence on her old parents was such as to cause them to double their efforts to keep nearer, if God will help, the path that leadeth to life. I ask the readers and writers of THE RESTITUTION to remember her parents in prayer. We have seen seventy-five winters; we are left alone in our large house, and Mollie gone. But she sleepeth well; asleep in Jesus, she sleepeth well. Yours in hope of eternal life J. T. FREEMAN.

THY WILL BE DONE.

How many lips these words repeat
As though they held some magic sweet;
Some potent charm for human grief
That looks in vain for man's relief—
That seeks all aid, and finding none,
Despairing cries—"Thy will be done!"

"Thy will be done!" how oft we say
When tolling through the burdened day;
But do we really mean the while,
To labor on with patient smile
And willing heart till set of sun,
The Master says—"My will is done!"

"Thy will be done!" with sobs we moan
When pain makes every sigh a groan;
But do we really mean to bear
The heavy cross which none can share
Till he who bore a heavier one Shall gently say—"My will is done?"

"Thy will be done!" we strive to say
When cherished forms are torn away;
But do we really bow the soul
Till faith resumes its calm control,
And love can all fondness resign
To say with truth—"Thy will is mine?".

Ah, could we but more fully feel
The depth of trust these words should seal;
The childlike trust to call most blest
The rod—or staff—as God sees best—
Then surely heart and lips unite one
When e'er we say, "Thy will be done."

—L. L. H.

Come to living Savior
Leave the fleeting dross,
Find what ne'er shall perish,
Hid beneath the cross:
And when the coming ages
Bring Eden back again:
Crown of beauty wearing
Then with Christ shall reign.

The Year and the Calendar.

On the day after the 4th of October, 1582, the people in Italy, Spain, and Portugal, wrote the date October 15. Ten days had been dropped altogether. This was because of the adoption of what is known as the Gregorian calendar, because it was decreed by a bull issued by Pope Gregory XIII.

The early division of time was very irregular, and inaccurate. The reckoning by months did not bring out even years, and it was only when astronomy became something like an exact science, that the actual length of the year was known. In the time of ancient Rome, there were but ten months, and the Roman kings fixed the length of the year at three hundred and sixty-five days. When this inexact division caused trouble, an extra month was inserted here and there, to restore the system to a degree of order.

We owe it to Julius Cæsar that the year was fixed at three hundred and sixty-five days, with an additional day once in four years. The fourth year in which the day is added, is bissextile, or as we call it, leap year. The year of 365¼ days is known as the Julian year. But even this is not accurate. The true solar year is 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, and 49.62 seconds long. That is, it is 11 minutes and 10.38 seconds shorter than the Julian year. The Julian calendar was adopted forty-six years before Christ, so that in A. D. 1582, more than sixteen centuries later, the error had amounted to about ten days.

It was this error which the Gregorian calendar corrected. But in making the correction, it was necessary to guard against a similar accumulation of error. That object was accomplished in this way: The error amounts to very nearly eighteen hours in a century. Accordingly it was decreed that each year whose number was divisible by one hundred should not be a leap year, unless it was divisible by 400. Consequently the year 1900 will not be a leap year, but the year 2000 will be one. Three leap years are omitted every four hundred years by this plan, and the result is that the average civil year differs from the true solar year by less than twenty-three seconds. This difference will amount to a whole day in something less than four thousand years.

The new system was adopted gradually. By the Roman Catholic world it was adopted almost at once, the last of the Catholic countries making the change in 1587. But it was not until 1700, that Protestant Germany adopted it; and in England and America the Gregorian calendar was not used until 1752.

It is also a curious fact, of which few are aware, that until one hundred and thirty years ago, the year began in England and this country, not with the first of January, but on the twenty-fifth of March. Before that time, however, the practice had become common of indicating that there was a doubt to which year the days in the first three months belonged. Thus in the old Boston newspapers of the last century we see such dates as this: "February 4, 1742-3," from which anybody can discover that the date, according to the Gregorian calendar, is February 15 (eleven days' correction,) 1724.

The year is a varying quantity, according to the standard by which it is measured. Of course it is the time within which the earth makes her passage around the sun. But if this be measured by the period of the earth's return to the same apparent place in the heavens, as seen from the sun, it is a "sidereal year," 366 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, 9.6 seconds. The time in which the earth makes the circuit from her perihelion, that is, the point in her orbit where she is nearest the sun, around to the same point again, is the "anomalistic" year, 365 days, 6 hours, 13 minutes, 48.8 seconds.

The "tropical" year, however, is that which astronomers have selected as the true solar year. It is the time included between two "vernal equinoxes." This vernal equinox is that instant in the spring of the year when the equator of the earth, if extended, would pass through the center of the sun. It is also the time when the days and nights, all over the globe, are of equal length. The period between two vernal equinoxes is 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, and 48.6 seconds.—Youth's Companion

ROME AND THE BIBLE.

"The Bible has at all times been accessible to Catholics," so saith the Catholic Mirror, as quoted in a recent number of the Observer. Much research would not cover another so deft a re-enactment of Joab and Amasa. How gently the left hand fingers the silky beard of Truth; how surely the dagger finds the spot under the fifth rib!

"The Bible has at all times been accessible to Catholics." There are three senses in which this is literally and obtrusively true, and there is a fourth sense, the plain, obvious meaning of the writer in the Mirror, which is as far from the truth as the Pope is from a return to the Quirinal.

First, it is literally true that the Bible has been at all times accessible to Catholics. To how many Catholics? To the Pope and the officials, and to a handful of the laity here and there, one person in tens of thousands. And as these are "Catholics," the Mirror has mirrored both the strict and literal truth in the words, "The Bible has been at all times accessible to Catholics."

Again the Bible has been a good deal too accessible to Catholics. What is this we see in Toluca not far from the City of Mexico? The plaza alive with people; in the midst of the excited crowd a number of Catholic priests, and out of the midst of the priestly circle a pyramid of flame and a column of smoke from a pile of burning Bibles! Inquisitorial visits from house to house, threats of penance, purgatory and perdition have extorted from trembling families their copies of the Word of God for the fagot pile! Yes, the Bible has been only too "accessible to Catholics."

Like transactions are taking place all the time, and in every land where Romanism can exact itself outside the range of the Protestant eye. Not long ago in one of our mission stations in Brazil, a "Catholic" priest found access to a Bible in a Romish family, and bearing it forth into the street, he expended a good many lucifer matches in the effort to set it on fire and burn it. Finding the book somewhat stubbornly non-combustible, he actually drenched the sacred volume with kerosene and so consumed it.

This is a venerable sin of the church of the Vatican. During the desolating persecutions in Bohemia and Moravia, when Ferdinand, of Styria, declared that he had rather reign over a desert than over a population of heretics, the "Catholic" government year by year made a money appropriation for the burning of Protestant books, and especially the Bible.

Dr. Cattell while in Prague saw and handled a precious copy of the Word of God. It belonged to a mother in Israel, and one day from her window she saw a party of "Catholics" approaching and seeking "access" to it. As she was making bread, she kneaded her Bible in with the dough and baked it, and the Inquisitors failed to find access to it. That baked Bible is read in the Bohemian churches today.

There is a third sense in which the Bible is ever accessible to Catholics. Any one of their Protestant neighbors will lend them, yea gladly give them a copy. The Bible Society, if allowed to do so, will tomorrow despatch their agents to put a Bible in every Catholic family in the land. Yes, Protestants will give them without money and without price, copies of the Romish version of the Bible; so in this sense it is true that the Bible is "accessible to Catholics."

But in the sense intended by the writer that Roman Catholic peoples in any land under the sun have free access to the Bible, are encouraged by their church to read it, is even flagrantly untrue. There is a Bible House in Rome, the sight of which the Pope can see from the windows of his gorgeous palace across the Tiber, and he curses it every time he sees it. The Rev. Hobart Seymour of the English church, while yet the Pope had fall away in Rome, asked high papal officials why the Bible was disallowed. The reply was; "It is not disallowed." "But," said Mr. Seymour, "I have inquired in every bookstore in Rome, and in every case the answer was non è permesso. The only copy I found was one in several volumes which cost twenty dollars."

"But," said his interlocutors, "why should the people have the Bible, when not one in hundreds can read?"

"Strange," said Mr. Seymour, "that none can read the Bible when there is in Rome a priest for almost every ten people."

The first thing our missionaries do in a heathen country is, as soon as possible, to give the people the Word of God in their own language and teach the people to read it. Whenever did Romish missionaries do this? In their three centuries of mission work in America have they ever given one gospel to the Indians in their own language?

More untruth could hardly be compacted into an equal number of words than lies wrapped up in the sentence, "The Bible has at all times been accessible to Catholics."—W. P. Breed, D.D. in New York Observer.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Westhus.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are acquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving earnest study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It continues the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, as reported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is to the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the will of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $4.00. Send to this office for this work.

The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $3.00. ## ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, than there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth 16mo, 188 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 75 cents.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCTOBER 24, 1888. NO. 40.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS [illegible]

The Restitution is to usher in the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE MAN OF SIN. 2 Thess. ii. No. 10.

FASTING.

There are many devout clients of Mary who, to honor her, fast on bread and water on Saturdays, and the vigils of her feasts. It is well known that Saturday is dedicated by the holy church to Mary, because, as Saint Bernard says, on that day, the day after the death of her Son, she remained constant in faith. Therefore, Mary's clients are careful to honor her on that day by some particular devotion, and especially by fasting on bread and water, as did Saint Charles Borromeo, Cardinal Toledo, and so many others. Nittardo, bishop of Bamburg, and Father Joseph Arriaga, of the Society of Jesus, took no food at all on that day. The great graces which the Mother of God has dispensed to those who do this, are recorded by Father Auriemma in his little work. Let one example suffice: it is that of a famous captain of brigands, who, on account of this devotion, was preserved in life after his head was cut off, and was thus enable to make his confession; for the unfortunate creature was in a state of sin. After confession, he declared that, on account of this devotion, the Blessed Virgin had obtained him so great a grace, and immediately expired."

Many of the instances I have given in the above extracts are of ancient date, and this may be a suitable place to introduce an example of "the glories of Mary," which took place a few years ago in Ireland. The following record caused a considerable sensation at the time the events occurred, and I observed that there was a revival of it this year at the same place. This modern instance of so-called miraculous cures took place at Knock, County Mayo, in Ireland, in 1880. An alleged apparition of the Virgin Mary took place at the church of "Our Lady." The incumbent Archdeacon Cavanagh published from his diary several hundred cases, 150 of which are contained in the Dublin Weekly News for May 15, 1880, now before me. The list begins with No. 282 and ends with 300, "to be continued." Insanity, blindness, deafness, dumbness, inability to walk for twenty-four years, epilepsy, and other ailments are alleged to have been cured. Pilgrimages from many parts of the world were made by persons suffering from disease. A town of wooden houses soon arose in the vicinity. But cures were not limited to those present at the church. The cement of the gable where the apparition of the Virgin was seen, had been carried away, and being soaked in water which was then applied to the patients, many cures were effected. The correspondent of the Weekly News says: "Father Cavanagh told me that the clay about the gable is just as efficacious, and large holes have been made by the people, from which large quantities of clay were taken away to various parts of the Catholic world." It is mentioned that the gable had to be "covered with boards to the height of over forty feet, to prevent further damage." Father Cavanagh is reported to have said that "he felt that the Blessed Virgin signified her desire that a more costly church should be erected to perpetuate her name." And also that "last October two years a storm occurred here; it stripped off the roof of the church, smashed the windows, threw down the statue of the Virgin and the candlesticks on the altar. It appeared to him then as it does now, that it was a premonition that a more fitting temple for the worship of God should be erected. At that time his friend, Father Anderson, undertook to purchase a statue to replace the one broken by the storm, and he bought the beautiful statue of our Lady of Lourdes which stands upon the side altar, and about which many manifestations and miracles are reported to have taken place. Some people have called this miraculous, and it was not for him to say it was not so."

This is the account given of the origin of the so-called miracles by the chief actor in the matter, and when I mention that "a handsome sum of money was subscribed by the members (of the Augustinian Confraternity, Drogheda then on a visit) and presented by Father Anderson to Father Cavanagh, as the first offering for the building of the new church of our Lady of Knock"—the reader has the sum of the matter before him.

I should not omit to mention that "the gable is covered with a countless array of crutches, sticks and trusses, left as mementoes of their ailments by people who were cured." And also that Lourdes is a well known shrine of the Virgin in France, to which many pilgrimages are undertaken by devotees of the Roman church.

I now come to the work of Dr. Middleton already mentioned. This work consists of two volumes, the first of which was published separately as an introduction to the principal work, and as a healer as to the manner in which such a subject would be received. My principal quotations shall be from the Introduction. The extracts from the work contain both quotations from the Fathers and from modern writers on the subject, and also the views and arguments of the author. This work is entitled "An Enquiry into the Miraculous Powers which are Supposed to have Existed in the Christian Church from the Earliest Ages through Several Successive Centuries." Dr. M. says:

"It is an opinion commonly received among Christians, and above all, among those of the Romish communion, that after the days of the apostles, there resided still in the primitive church, through several successive ages (or centuries) a divine and extraordinary power of working miracles, which was frequently and openly exerted in confirmation of the truth of the gospel, and for the conviction of unbelievers. This is generally alleged by the divines of all churches, in their disputes with the sceptics, as a subsidiary proof of the divinity of the Christian doctrine; and as it is managed by the Church of Rome is rendered more persuasive and affecting to the multitude than what the gospel itself affords, by deducing the succession of those apostolical gifts down to our own times, and offering the testimony of the same miracles to the senses even of the present age (century)." Int. Dis. p 1.

He quotes a writer to the effect that "God has been pleased in every age to work for more evident miracles in his church by the ministry of his saints; in raising the dead to life; in curing the blind and the lame; in casting out devils; in healing in a moment inveterate diseases, and the like stupendous works of his power; attested by the most authentic monuments; and very frequently, as may be seen in the acts of the canonization of saints, by the depositions of innumerable eye-witnesses; examined upon oath; and by the public notoriety of the facts; which kind of miracles, so authentically attested, will be to all ages a standing evidence, that the church, in whose communion they have all been wrought, is not that idolatrous, pagan church which the Doctor pretends, but the true spouse of Christ." p. 6.

He also says, "These pious cheats of the Romish Church, as Mr. Leslie says, are the secret disgraces of Christianity, and bid the fairest of any one contrivance, to overthrow the certainty of the miracles of Christ, and the whole truth of the gospel by putting them all upon the same foot." Leslie's Short Method I. 94.

It must be confessed, however, that this claim of a miraculous power, which is now peculiar to the Church of Rome, was universally asserted and believed in all Christian countries and in all ages of the Church, till the time of the Reformation. For Ecclesiastical History makes no difference between one age and another, but carries on the succession of its miracles, as of all other common events, through all of them indifferently, to that memorable period" (the Reformation). p. 6.

"But the light of the Reformation dispelled the charm; and what Cicero says of the Pythian Oracle may be as truly said of the Popish miracles; when men began to be less credulous their power vanished. For that spirit of enquiry with which Christendom was then animated, detected the cheat and exposed to public view the hidden springs and machinery of those lying wonders by which the world had been seduced and enslaved to the tyranny of Rome." p. 7.

Referring to Protestants and their views on this subject he says: "The most prevailing opinion is that they subsisted through the three first centuries and then ceased in the beginning of the fourth; or as soon as Christianity came to be established by the civil power. This I say, seems to be the most prevailing notion at this day, among the generality of the Protestants; who think it reasonable to imagine that miracles should then cease, when the end of them was obtained, and the church no longer in want of them, being now delivered from all danger, and secure of success, under the protection of the greatest power on earth."

"Agreeably to this notion" Archbishop Tillotson says, "that on the first planting of the Christian religion in the world, God was pleased to accompany it with a miraculous power, but after it was planted, the power ceased, and God left it to be maintained by ordinary ways." And in another place, speaking of the particular gift of casting out devils, he observes, "that it continued the longest of any, and there was reason that it should continue, as long as the Devil reigned, and Pagan idolatry was kept up. But when the powers of the world became Christian, and Satan's kingdom was everywhere destroyed, then this miraculous gift also ceased, there being no further occasion for it." "The late Dr. Marshall also, who translated the works of St. Cyprian into English," expressed himself on this point in similar terms.

"Mr. Dodwell, one of the most zealous admirers of primitive antiquity, and who has deduced the history of its miracles with the greatest accuracy, through the first three centuries, closes his account of them with the conversation of the Roman Empire to Christianity, not daring as he frequently declares, to venture any farther, on account of fabulous gentus and manifest impostures of the fourth century. But though he supposes the true miracles to have generally ceased from that time, yet he finds some particular instances of them so strongly attested by the Fathers of the best credit, through the rest of the same century, that he cannot but admit them as exceptions to his general rule." p. 10.

[*] Some of their bones were brought to London, and publicly broken there at St. Paul's Cross, in the sight of the people, that they might be fully convinced of the juggling impostures of the Monks. And in particular the Crucifix of Boxeley in Kent, commonly called the Rood (or Cross) of Grace, to which many pilgrimages had been made, because it was observed sometimes to bow, and to lift itself up, to shake and stir its head, hands and feet, to roll its eyes, move the lips, and bend its brows, all of which were looked upon by the abused multitude, as the effects of a divine power. These were now publicly discovered to be cheats, for the springs were showed by which all these motions were made." Bennet's History of the Reformation. Vol. I. 94.

It is the Christian's duty to endeavor to prolong his mortal days to the utmost, notwithstanding there is much that seems hard to bear. We may, according to our own reasoning, think we have undergone enough of some kinds of trial; that we have had our full share. And as we observe others who have the same hope with us, not suffering as we suffer, we are apt to be impressed much by appearance. But there is an Eye more penetrating than our own: there is understanding deeper than ours: there is wisdom far surpassing ours, although we may have learned much wisdom by prayer and searching the word, by affliction and experience. Let then resignation be complete, saying with Job, "all the days of my appointed time will I wait, until my change come."

And while it is right to desire the speedy coming of our Lord, let us not murmur at repeated trials, but make the most of present opportunities to serve God. If his service require damage to health and the shortening of mortal days, let us heartily bear all suffering; but let us not sacrifice health for anything short of God's service. Let us economise strength so that we may serve God all we can. H. H.

Selections.

PRE-REFORMATION INTERPRETERS.—No. 2.

1. The Fathers interpreted the four wild beasts of prophecy as representing the four empires, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome. Here we have the foundation of the historical interpretation of prophecy. Take as an instance the words of Hippolytus on the great image and four wild beasts of Daniel: "The golden head of the image," he says, "is identical with the lioness, by which the Babylonians were represented; the shoulders and the arms of silver are the same with the bear, by which the Persians and Medes are meant; the belly and thighs of brass are the leopard, by which the Greeks who ruled from Alexander onwards are intended; the legs of iron the dreadful and terrible beast, by which the Romans who hold the empire now are meant; the toes of clay and iron are the ten horns which are to be; the one other little horn springing up in their midst is the antichrist; the stone that smites the image and breaks it in pieces, and that filled the whole earth, is Christ, who comes from heaven and brings judgment on the world." This statement is remarkable for its clearness, correctness, and condensation, and expresses the view held still by the historic school.

Hippolytus says, in the treatise on "Christ and antichrist:" "Rejoice, blessed Daniel, thou hast not been in error; all these things have come to pass" (p. 19). "Already the iron rules; already it subdues and breaks all in pieces; already it brings all the unwilling into subjection; already we see these things ourselves. Now we glorify God, being instructed by these" (p. 20).

2. The Fathers held that the ten-horned beasts of Daniel and John are the same. As an instance, Irenæus, in his book "Against Heresies," chap. xxvi., says: "John, in the Apocalypse, . . . teaches us what the ten horns shall be which were seen by Daniel."

3. The Fathers held the historic interpretation of the Apocalypse. As Elliott says, none of the Fathers "entertained the idea of the apocalyptic prophecy overleaping the chronological interval, were it less or greater, antecedent to the consummation, and plunging at once into the times of the consummation." Here, for example, is the commentary of Victorinus on the Apocalypse of John written towards the end of the third century. This is the earliest commentary extant on the Apocalypse as a whole. In this, the going forth of the white horse under the first seal is interpreted of the victories of the gospel in the first century. This view, you will observe, involves the historical interpretation of the entire book of Revelation. Victorinus interprets the woman clothed with the sun, having the moon under her feet, and wearing a crown of twelve stars on her head, and travailing in her pains, as "the ancient church of fathers, prophets, saints, and apostles;" in other words, the Judæo-Christian body of saints. He could not of course point to fulfilments which were at his early date still future, but he recognises the principle.

4. The Fathers held that the little horn of Daniel, the man of sin foretold by Paul, and the revived head of the Roman empire predicted by John, represent one and the same power; and they held that power to be antichrist. For example, Origen, in his famous book, "Against Celsus," thus expresses himself (bk. vi., chap. xlvi.) After quoting nearly the whole of Paul's prophecy about the man of sin in 2 Thessalonians, which he interprets of the antichrist, he says: "Since Celsus rejects the statements concerning antichrist, as it is termed, having neither read what is said of him in the book of Daniel, nor what the Savior in the gospels has predicted about his coming, we must make a few remarks on this subject. . . . . Paul speaks of him who is called antichrist, describing, though with a certain reserve, both the manner and time and cause of his coming. . . . . The prophecy also regarding antichrist is stated in the book of Daniel, and is fitted to make an intelligent and candid reader admire the words as truly Divine and prophetic; for in them are mentioned the things relating to the coming kingdom, beginning with the times of Daniel, and continuing to the destruction of the world."

Jerome, in his commentary on the book of Daniel (chap. vii.), says, with reference to the little horn which has a mouth speaking great things, that "it is the man of sin, the son of perdition, who dares to sit in the temple of God, making himself as God."

5. The Fathers held that the Roman empire was the "let," or hindrance, referred to by Paul in 2 Thessalonians, which kept back the manifestation of the "man of sin." This point is of great importance. Paul distinctly tells us that he knew, what that hindrance was, and that it was then in existence. The early Church, through the writings of the Fathers, tells us what it knew upon the subject, and with remarkable unanimity affirms that this "let," or hindrance, was the Roman empire as governed by the Cæsars; that while the Cæsars held imperial power, it was impossible for the predicted antichrist to arise, and that on the fall of the Cæsars he would arise. Here we have a point on which Paul affirms the existence of knowledge in the Christian Church. The early Church knew, he says, what this hindrance was. The early Church tells us what it did know upon the subject, and no one in these days can be in a position to contradict its testimony as to what Paul had, by word of mouth only, told the Thessalonians. It is a point on which ancient tradition alone can have any authority. Modern speculation is positively impertinent on such a subject.

As to the "let" or hindrance to the manifestation of the "man of sin" referred to in 2 Thess. ii., Mr. Elliott says: "We have the consenting testimony of the early Fathers, from Irenæus, the disciple of the disciple of St. John, down to Chrysostom and Jerome, to the effect that it was understood to be the Imperial power ruling and residing at Rome." "Horæ Apocalypticæ," vol. iii., p. 92.

Irenæus held that the division of the Roman empire into ten kingdoms would immediately precede the manifestation of antichrist. In his work, "Against Heresies," book v., chap. xxx., he says, "Let them await, in the first place, the division of the kingdom into ten; then, in the next place, when these kings are reigning, and beginning to set their affairs in order and advance their kingdoms, (let them learn) to acknowledge that he who shall come claiming the kingdom for himself, and shall terrify those men of whom we have been speaking, having a name containing the aforesaid number (666), is truly the abomination of desolation." Thus, according to Irenæus the manifestation of antichrist required the previous overthrow of the then existing Roman empire.

Tertullian's "Apology" thus describes the habit of the Christian Church of the second century to pray for the security of the Roman empire, in the knowledge that its downfall would bring the catastrophe of the reign of antichrist and the ruin of the world. Addressing the "rulers of the Roman empire," he says: "We offer prayer for the safety of our princes to the eternal, the true, the living God, whose favor, beyond all others, they must themselves desire, . . . Thither we lift our eyes, with hands outstretched, because free from sin; with head uncovered, for we have nothing whereof to be ashamed; finally, without a monitor, because it is from the heart we supplicate. And without ceasing for all our emperors we offer prayer. We pray for life prolonged; for security to the empire. . . . With our hands thus stretched out and up to God, (and as with your free glaive, hang us upon the crosses, wrap us in flames, take our heads from us with the sword, let loose the wild beasts upon us,—the very attitude of a Christian praying is the preparation for all punishment. Let this, good rulers, be your work, wring from us the soul, beseeching God on the emperor's behalf. Upon the truth of God and devotion to his name put the brand of crime. . . . There is also another and a greater necessity for our offering prayer in behalf of the emperors, nay, for the complete stability of the empire, and for Roman interests in general. For we know that a mighty shock impending over the whole earth—in fact, the very end of all things, threatening dreadful woes—is only retarded by the continued existence of the Roman empire. We have no desire then to be overtaken by these dire events; and in praying that there coming may be delayed, we are lending our aid to Rome's duration."—"Apology," ii 30–32.

What then was the view of the earthly Church? Look at the words of Tertullian. Quoting Thessalonians, he says: "Now ye know what detaineth that he might be revealed in his time, for the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now hinders must hinder until he be taken out of the way. What obstacle is there but the Roman state; the falling away of which, by being scattered into ten kingdoms, shall introduce antichrist, . . . . that the beast antichrist, with his false prophet, may wage war on the Church of God."

In his magnificent "Apology," addressed to the rulers of the Roman empire, Tertullian says that the Christian Church—not himself, mark, but the Christian Church—prayed for the emperors, and for the stability of the empire of Rome, because they knew "that a mighty shock impending over the whole earth—in fact, the very end of all things, threatening dreadful woes—was only retarded by the continued existence of the Roman empire."

Read the words of Chrysostom in his "Commentary on 2 Thessalonians:" "One may first naturally inquire what is that which withholdeth, and after that would know why Paul expresses this so obscurely, . . . the who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way.' That is, when the Roman empire is taken out of the way, then he shall come; and naturally, for as long as the fear of his empire lasts, no one will readily exalt himself; but when that is dissolved, he will attack the anarchy, and endeavor to seize upon the government both of man and of God. For as the kingdoms before this were destroyed, that of the Medes by the Babylonians, that of the Babylonians by the Persians, that of the Persians by the Macedonians, that of the Macedonians by the Romans, so will this be by antichrist, and he by Christ."

Thus accounting for Paul's reserve in alluding to this point he adds: "Because he says this of the Roman empire, he naturally only glanced at it and spoke covertly, for he did not wish to bring upon himself superfluous enmities and useless dangers. For if he had said that, after a little while the Roman empire would be dissolved, they would now immediately have even overwhelmed him as a pestilent person, and all the faithful as living and warring to this end."

From Irenæus, who lived close to apostolic times, down to Chrysostom and Jerome, the Fathers taught that the power withholding the manifestation of the "man of sin" was the Roman empire as governed by the Cæsars. The Fathers therefore belong to the historic, and not to the futurist school of interpretation; for futurists imagine that the hindrance to the manifestation of the man of sin is still in existence, though the Cæsars have long since passed away.

6. The Fathers held that the fall of the Roman empire was imminent, and therefore the manifestation of antichrist close at hand. Justin Martyr, for example, one of the earliest of the fathers, in his "Dialogue with Trypho," chap. xxxii., says: "He whom Daniel foretells would have dominion for three and times and a half is already even at the door, about to speak blasphemous and daring things against the Most High."

Cyprian, in his "Exhortation to Martyrdom," says: "Since . . . the hateful time of antichrist is already beginning to draw near, I would collect from the sacred Scriptures some exhortations for preparing and strengthening the minds of the brethren, whereby I might animate the soldiers of Christ for the heavenly and spiritual contest."

7. The Fathers held that the "man of sin," or antichrist, would be a ruler or head of the Roman empire. A striking illustration of this is the interpretation by Irenæus and Hippolytus of the mysterious number 666, the number of the revived head of the beast, or antichrist. Irenæus gives as its interpretation the word Latinos. He says: "Latinos is the number 666, and it is a very probable (solution), this being the name of the last kingdom, for the Latins are they who at present bear rule."

Hippolytus gives the same solution in his treatise on "Christ and antichrist."

8. The Fathers held that the Babylon of the Apocalypse means Rome. On this point they were all agreed, and their unanimity is an important seal on the correctness of this interpretation. Tertullian, for example, in his answer to the Jews, says: "Babylon, in our own John, is a figure of the city Rome, as being equally great and proud of her sway, and triumphant over the saints" (chap. ix.). Victorinus, who wrote the earliest commentary on the Apocalypse extant, says, on Revelation xvii.: "The seven heads are the seven hills on which the woman sitteth—that is, the city of Rome."

Hippolytus says: "Tell me, blessed John, apostle and disciple of the Lord, what didst thou see and hear concerning Babylon? Arise and speak, for it sent these also into banishment." You notice here the view that Rome which banished the Apostle John is the Babylon of the Apocalypse.

Augustine says, "Rome, the second Babylon, and the daughter of the first, to which it pleased God to subject the whole world, and bring it all under one sovereignty, was now founded." In chap. xxviii. he calls Rome "the western Babylon." In chap. xii. he says: "It has not been in vain that this city has received the mysterious name of Babylon; for Babylon is interpreted confusion, as we have said elsewhere."

It is clear from these quotations that the Fathers did not interpret the Babylon of the Apocalypse as meaning either the literal Babylon on the Euphrates, or some great city in France or England, but as meaning Rome. And this is still the interpretation of the historic school, though for the last 800 years events have proved Babylon to represent Rome, not in its pagan, but in its Papal form.

It should be noted that none of the Fathers held the futurist gap theory, that the book of Revelation overleaps nearly eighteen centuries of Christian history, plunging at once into the distant future, and devoting itself entirely to predicting the events of the last few years of this dispensation. As to the subject of antichrist, there was a universal agreement among them concerning the general idea of the prophecy, while there were differences as to details, these differences arising chiefly from the notion that the antichrist would be in some way Jewish as well as Roman. It is true they thought that the antichrist would be an individual man. Their early position sufficiently accounts for this. They had no conception and could have no conception of the true nature and length of the tremendous apostasy which was to set in upon the Christian Church. They were not prophets, and could not foresee that the Church was to remain nineteen centuries in the wilderness, and to pass through prolonged and bitter persecution under a succession of nominally Christian but apostate rulers, filling the place of the ancient Cæsars and emulating their antichristian deeds. Had they known these things, we may well believe their views would have, completely harmonized with those of historic interpreters of latter times. The Fathers went as far as they could go in the direction in which historical interpreters of these last days have travelled. Further, much that was dark to them in prophecy has become clear to their successors in the light of its accomplishment. Divine providence has thrown light, as it could not fail to do, on Divine prediction.—H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S.

As there are five Wednesdays in October our next paper will bear date of Nov. 7.

THE way now seems to be opening for the Editor to attend the contemplated Conference in Philadelphia in November. We hope some one, two, or three of our brethren from Michigan will arrange to be present to take a part in the deliberations. Some suggestive letters have appeared in previous numbers of our paper, and some others will find a place in this and our next.

SOME few years ago we had a letter from Jerusalem addressed to us personally from Mr. H. G. Spafford, whose career and death are summarily given in the following taken from the Chicago Journal of Oct. 20. We have occasionally mailed our paper to him, and several, who take THE RESTITUTION will be interested in knowing something concerning the close of his singular career as well as something concerning the present condition of the colony that went to Jerusalem with him. For these reasons we give the notice in full. We printed his letter in THE RESTITUTION a while after receiving it.

Tidings have been recently received in this city of the death of Mr. H. G. Spafford, formerly a well-known citizen of Chicago and a leading member of the bar, who, accompanied by his wife, several years ago went to the ancient city of Jerusalem, as a missionary to convert the Jews of the Holy Land to Christianity. He died in that city September 25. He was the leader of a company of twelve enthusiasts who left Chicago for Jerusalem in 1880, and settled in that city with the purpose of gradually converting its inhabitants. Five of the number are dead.

Previous to the big fire, and the financial depression which followed it, Mr. Spafford was a man of considerable means, his wealth being estimated at about $250,000; but the disasters of that time swept them all away. About the same time he lost all his children through the shipwreck of the ocean steamer Ville du Havre. His wife also was on board that ill-fated vessel, but she was among the saved, and on reaching land sent to her husband a telegram which has since become memorable. It was: "Saved alone." These sore and repeated afflictions pressed heavily on Mr. Spafford, and it was believed by his friends that they affected his mind. At all events, his religious ideas underwent a considerable change, and he adopted some very strange views, which were continually undergoing some modification or change. He believed himself to be some great prophet and that his wife was a prophetess. Their commission was to go and convert the Jews, and their arrival in Jerusalem was to be the signal for the return of the Israelites to their own land. Then he announced that he was the representative of the Messiah on earth. Strange as these views were, he got a number to adopt them, whom he took with him to Jerusalem. Since their arrival there they have lived together in one of the best houses in the Christian quarter of the city, though their means of support has been a mystery. It is known that Mr. Spafford borrowed some money before he left here from parties in this city and that he borrowed some more after he arrived there, but what other means of livelihood he had are not known.

EVER since we have made prophecy and its historical fulfilment a study it has been our firm persuasion that the Great Image seen by the King of Babylon was a perfect symbolization of the four great world powers, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome, in their consecutive order and particular changes; and that the period of "seven times," or 2520 years, was designed, as a mystic number, to measure the entire duration of those successive monarchies. Now as the full development of the Babylonian Empire was B. C. 606, the termination of this long period would be about 1914. The great movement culminating in 1844 took place just 70 years before the expiring of this date, 1914. As 70 years is the Bible measure of a generation, Psa. xc. 10, was the movement out of time? Compare the close of the Jewish dispensation when, during the period of 70 years, our Lord and his apostles so faithfully warned the Jews. See Matt. xxiii. 36. Without saying more now we add the following extract:

"In the study of prophecy we must take up a certain line; we must either regard things as symbolical or literal: and on reading certain passages it would be impossible and absurd to interpret them literally. You are compelled to interpret the whole Apocalypse as symbolical. The beasts are symbols, and the duration of the little horn, three and one-half years, is a symbol. You find one vision of times which has unquestionably been fulfilled. Seventy weeks — 490 days. The period in which Messiah came was 490 years, therefore the 490 days are symbolic, and this is a clue to the rest.

"If you deny the year-day view, where are you? You have absolutely no chronological prophecy to guide you unless it is a traditional one of the 6,000 years. Besides, when you compare this chronological prophecy with the chronology of history you find those prophecies have been fulfilled on the year-day scale.

"Where are we? Living in the supplementary times which follow the three and one-half times. A brief period is added of 75 days, or years, to the 1260, terminating in an era of blessedness. We are living in that period."—H. Grattan Guinness.

A note from Brother Geo. F. Work, received just before we go to press, and too late to place with the call for General Conference, wishes us to state that the meeting will commence at three o'clock, p. m., of Nov. 16, and in addition to the offer of the Philadelphia Church, he now adds: "In order that no delegate may be prevented by lack of means from attending this Conference, the churches at Philadelphia, while not intending to bear all of a delegate's expenses, recognize that the expenses of delegates coming from the far west will be greater than the others, and offer to increase the contribution to such delegates, but to delegates only, who attend from points west of the central line of the State of Illinois, to an amount not exceeding $50 00 per delegate in all, to each one, to be paid to the delegate at the close of the conference."

AN OCTOBER MORNING TALK.

I received recently a copy of a book of about 200 pages, by Sir John Lubbock, on the "Pleasures of Life,"—and somewhere he gives a list of 100 volumes by different authors, that in his judgment would be most useful and interesting for average readers. I do not specially object to his selection, as he places the Bible first in the list, and yet I hardly think I should follow his choice throughout.

What I wonder at, is, the immense and almost incredible number of books now in the world. I look at a clear pure little stream of running water, and wonder how it is, that it flows on unfailing and unweary for years, and hundreds of years. The good God is never troubled to recruit the brook, and keep it leaping and murmuring. But think of the stream of books pouring from the press. Volume after volume is announced. Novels and romance and story books come teeming forth. Who can begin to read the tenth, or even hundredth part? Then there are the newspapers and magazines by the thousand, and copies by the million. Who can read them, or who would wish to? Much of the reading is useless or worse. Who can afford to read the romances even? Who can afford to write them, who has "his hope set on God?" I can hardly see, though I have no doubt there are some instructive and edifying books of fiction. And yet even this admission needs to be very guarded. On and on rolls the flood. The two main motives of so much writing and printing, I suppose are money and fame—though the desire to do good has its place. "It suppose one read the Bible more and understood and remembered it ever so much better. That would be to be better filled with what you may say are God's ideas, and with good and true ideas of God. This would seem more like a right use of the mind and a right improvement of time. Think of wasted time in this little hurrying life—or the danger of it.

I find if I can do nothing more or better, I can at least wait on God. I can ask him to give me a better mind, and turn and turn and turn my heart, over and over, and more and more towards him. I can ask him to re-construct it. That is what is always wanted. That is the radical and fundamental thing;—the forever necessary and indispensable thing. And so through wakeful and watchful hours of night, I think it right for me to look with mingled prayers and praises, with seeking and longing, for this perfect re-construction. And what have I to do with so many thousands and millions of books? I can not tackle the teeming myriads. In fact I cannot afford to do anything that will lead me to forget this one thing—that God is all to me—that without him, I am nothing.

I think with trembling of the misery and peril of those who are swallowed up and devoured with romance reading, and so having the interest enlisted in unprofitable topics, and the mind filled with unprofitable ideas.

I wish we had more of such ideas as Paul had. Would they not be safe to have? Would they not be good and notable and useful,—temporarily and everlasting profitable? Yes, they would. Suppose we had Paul's love and zeal, his singleness of aim. Suppose we had his unquenchable longing and indomitable striving after the one grand prize of life—the Lord, and sympathy, union and co-operation with him. Then it would pay to live.

As it is, how many flutter through life in a kind of butterfly way! How many daily with the hours listlessly—and drift through the years! How many repine and murmur at mis-adventures, or disappointments, and go through the precious years, disconsolate or secretly fretting and dissatisfied!

There is a better way. It is the praising way. It is the appreciative way. It is the intelligent faculty and habit of recognizing God in everything and good in everything, while always seeking redemption and perfection. It is a secret, and yet not a secret, that to go through life in the best way possible. We are to forever praise the Lord. And if we lack wisdom or knowledge or alertness or adaptness in this, then we are to learn, and forever increase in this learning. We must have—should have,—the principle and the practice, for both are necessary. We are to cultivate ourselves, forever in this way. Cry, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord." Say—"Praise ye the Lord," a thousand times in secret, and all you please before others. There is virtue in it, blessing in it, medicine in it: without bitterness. Praising God, and praising him always,—is a defence, it is a panoply. Evils shrink away before this expedient, this privilege, this propriety and dignity of life.

There are thousands of lying advertisements in the papers. Many of them promise falsely. But if there is anything that comes within a hair's breadth of being true panacea, or is a true panacea for ills of life, it is the ever undiscouraged, persevering and life-long spirit and practice of praising the Great God.

Do any say—"This must be wearying by oft repetitions?" Not more than dew drops or sun-shine are wearisome to things that grow. We grow happy and healthy and even prosperous, through praises, little praises, if God please, but always real, and hearty and I don't care if I say, eternal praises. Let us have the element of something eternal in good, here and now. If praises are to be eternal, hereafter, let them be eternal now. If God is to be our glory by and by, let him be so now. This is the blessed and accepted hour.

Have we missed heretofore? Then let our failures be the very reason and ground why with all our mind and soul we be God's henceforth and forever. Let our very mistakes preach the perpetual sermon, of all hereafter and always, with all wholeness and holiness, in, with and unto the Sun and Sum of things, the God of fulness in presence and excellence. By how much we have lacked, by so much let us be more and more abundantly supplied. The very gapes of our past deficiencies, shall be the deeps, even if they be yawning deeps, into which shall come pouring the ocean floods of Divine fulness. Thus shall the Good God make all things work together for good wonderfully. And in order to this, it must be vigilant, alacrity, seeking and striving. And there may be many golden hours of precious midnights, in which we may be thriving in this mind of seeking, and coming and communing. It is the beginning of eternity, and eternity in good exercises and true growths of soul. And all the more is this emphasized, if we are advanced or advancing in life. Infinity in good, opens its door to us, stretches out its hand to us, urging and helping us on. If we suffer, let us suffer, let us take it patiently. If we are delayed, let us wait with unshaken and unchanging unity and entireness of mind on the One God, who gives in good time bountifully.

If we know that we do wait, then we shall remember that we have waited, and this is no small thing. The clearer is our determination now, the clearer will be our assurance afterward. If we doubt and hesitate how, we lay up weakness and unfruitfulness for time to come. But let hesitations go back into the past,—far back into the things of oblivion, while growths and achievements loom up ahead. Praise God evermore, and then who hast suffered in days and ways long and numerous, shall begin to find thy health and gladness coming and growing, and blessings singly or in troops waiting on thee, as thou also hast waited on God, and rendered to him that which was and is, a tribute due and true. For praise is no misspent breath. It is no wasted opportunity or misdirected action. It is justified by the fitness of things, and has in it the secret of good, and is the key of knowledge, prosperity and happiness. C. C.

A FEW SCRAPS OF HISTORY.

The Apocraphal New Testament, or Apostolical Fathers, or Clement of Rome, Polycarp, Ignatius, Barnabas, and the Pastor of Hermas, cotemporaries of the apostles, never in their writings gave expression to the conventional phrases of modern "orthodoxy" about the soul, its separate existence, and its immortality! Immortal soul; never-dying soul; deathless soul; disembodied spirit! Such phrases are not found in the primitive writings, and if not, why now? They never allude to a state of consciousness between death and resurrection; and if not why now? They spoke much of their hope of being raised out of their graves by their Lord. "The resurrection and the life." Polycarp said in his Epistle to Philip, "If we please the Lord in this present world, we shall also be made partakers of that which is to come, according as he has promised to us, that he will raise us up from the dead."

Ignatius expressly states his belief that "immortality is not inherent in the constitution but a communication through the Christ." To the Trallians he wrote, "Jesus Christ was truly raised from the dead by his Father after the manner he will raise us up also who believe in him by Jesus Christ, without whom we have no true life." Like expressions are found in all their writings. It is undeniable that they believed nothing about "disembodied immortal souls" and states of reward and punishment between death and resurrection from the dead. Oh how greatly perplexed are many honest minded persons today on this question; they wonder, yet dare not question. The need of a day of judgment, if at death the soul enters upon its state of reward or punishment in going either to heaven or to hell, those statements are made today and in my own hearing by a Rev. D. D. "He lived a Christian here on earth, and now he is crowned a saint in heaven." Strange, that after the lapse of centuries these souls should come to earth again united to this "carcass," "casket," "shell," then to be subjected to such scrutiny in questioning as shall then determine the fate. Surely such as teach such things are dumb dogs (D. D.), and are far astray if not from God, they certainly are from his blessed revelation, the holy Scriptures.

All along through the centuries up to a council of the Lateran held A. D. 1513, the question of the immortality of the soul had not received clerical sanction, and it was for Pope Leo X. to pronounce on this which he did, making it an article of Christian faith. He discarded the distinction between theological and philosophical truths as untenable. The following is a translation of the canon determined at this council, as published by Carranza: "Whereas in these our days, some have dared to assert concerning the nature of the reasonable soul, that it is mortal, and one and the same thing in all men; and some rashly philosophizing declare this to be true, at least according to philosophy. We, with the approbation of the Sacred Council do condemn and reprobate all those who assert that the intellectual soul is mortal, or one and the same in all men; and those who call in question these things; seeing that the soul is not only truly, and of itself, and essentially the form of the human body, as is expressed in the Canon of Pope Clement the Fifth, published in the General Council of Vienna, but likewise immortal; and according to the number of bodies into which it is infused is singularly multiplicable, multiplied, and to be multiplied. And seeing that truth never contradicts itself, we determine every assertion which is contrary to revealed faith, to be false; and we strictly inhibit all from dogmatizing otherwise; and we decree that all who adhere to the like erroneous assertions shall be shunned and punished as heretics." Thus the seal of authority was given to this dogma; since which other dogmas have been fulminated from councils and the Vatican; one with which we are all acquainted, "The Immaculate Conception." These dogmas, however, have not been believed by all! Popes and Prelates, Priests and Deacons, may bowl their anathemas as thick and as fast as they may, they only fall harmless at our feet, for we dare think and express our thoughts, fearless of the rack, the pulley, the dungeon and the fire.

Luther said in his response to the Lateran decree, "I permit the Pope to make articles of faith for himself and his faithful, such as, the soul is the substantial form of the human body; that the soul is immortal; with all these monstrous opinions to be found in the Roman dunghill of decretals."

Luther embraced and taught the doctrine of the sleep of the soul, and continued in that belief to the end of his life; why is it those who call themselves Lutherans, and glory in the name, do not believe as he believed? If we are disciples of Luther then let us abide by his teachings, and if followers of Jesus then let us follow his teachings, and he certainly taught the possibility of the soul's destruction. Matt x. 28.

Sir Thomas More published a work in reply, to which Tyndale the translator said, "In putting departed souls in heaven, hell, or purgatory, you destroy the arguments wherewith Christ and Paul prove the resurrection, and the Pope joineth the doctrine of Christ and the fleshly doctrine of the Philosophers together, things so contrary that they cannot agree. "If, said Tyndale, the souls be in heaven, tell me why they be not in as good case as the angels; and then what need of a resurrection?"

To all who hold the doctrine of inherent immortality, virtually say there is no death, and have to confess with Stephen Brackpool, "Its all a muddle," and so it is! We have only to attend a funeral service where such views are presented, and with one breath the deceased is dead awaiting the resurrection, and with another breath he is crowned with glory in heaven! And instead of coming together to rejoice that the sufferings are over, and the glory begun, with muffled sounds and solemn faces, and dolorous tones the service begins and ends. Thank God indeed, for the lifting of the curtain hiding the future, in the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ. Thank God for the hope set before us in the gospel; the hope of life that is life indeed. To all who have heartily embraced this good hope of eternal life I would say, never yield to the wiles of the adversary, in whatever form he may come, for many false influences are abroad, and in subtle form they come.

Time, reading the Scriptures, and observation, confirms me in the things concerning the hope of life, present blessings, the faithfulness of God, the perfect harmony of his word, and agreement with all to which we stand related here and now, should make us a happy and a useful people, to help break the fetters of iron with which men seem bound in ignorance and confusion!

May we, who have known what bondage was, see the freedom wherewith Christ has made us free and hopeful. GEO. W. YOUNG.

Dear Restitution:

Permit me to second the timely and business-like suggestions of Bro. Dwiggins in THE RESTITUTION of Oct. 17th and to urge upon all the churches that they have some delegate at the Conference to represent them. Where a church cannot, for any reason, send its own delegate let it select from those in whom it has confidence, one of the other delegates who may be already chosen or is about being chosen, and authorize him to cast the vote of the Church at the Conference. There are brethren Fry, Willey, Chaplin, Dwiggins, Conner etc., in Indiana; Elton in Ohio; Reed and Wilson in Illinois; Woodward in Michigan; Eychaner, and Adams in Iowa and Nebraska, and many others good brethren in all sections. Why not select one of these and forward your delegate notice to him.

GEO. F. WORK.

DO WE NEED A CREED?

Dear Restitution:

Since the proposal by our beloved Bro. Work for a National Conference has been made a number of responses have been published, some heartily endorsing and warmly seconding the proposed meeting, thereby encouraging the enterprise, while others view the movement in a light so different that it seems to demand the warm approval of all who favor the plan. Fears have been expressed that an iron creed will be formulated by that meeting that shall forever stifle the right to investigate the Bible. But while I rejoice in the right to investigate all Bible truth I frankly confess that I see no just cause for alarm in the call for such a Conference, and further have not the least fear that the men who will compose that Conference will attempt to bind upon me any article of faith that I cannot read plainly in the Bible, and I stand ready now to subscribe to a covenant that embodies only such faith, and further to demand of every applicant for membership in the church of God a full and hearty endorsement of this creed if you choose to call it by that name or better "a declaration of those things most surely believed among us," call it a creed if you will, but do not be afraid of it.

That our "creed" needs to be more explicit is clear to each laborer in God's vineyard. That I may not be misunderstood in the above sentence let me illustrate. At a meeting held years ago in this State a lady came forward to be admitted into the church, after taking her confession of faith in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, the question was put to her, do you now desire to be baptized into the all-saving name. She replied that she had been immersed years before; when interrogated as to her faith at the time of her baptism she replied that she had not at that time understood the gospel, and upon her declining to be baptized after hearing the gospel, she was refused admittance into the church. There are men endorsed by us as a people who would have received that lady into the church in full membership. This irregularity needs correcting. But we are told that the covenant that "the National Conference may make may not be the standard of admittance into the church which God requires." O what baseless fears! Why my dear Bro. who will constitute that ecclesiastical body that may wield such dangerous power?

It will be composed of such men as Bro. Work, Ramsay, Chaplin, Woodward, Wilson, Eychaner and others of like precious faith. These men who have wielded the gospel individually without abusing the privilege, will not I feel free to say, become dangerous when acting in a collective body, and that to under the restraining influence of delegates chosen by the churches in each place? No my dear brother; danger lurks not in such a conference, heresy cannot live in such an atmosphere as will pervade that assembly. The truth will there be zealously guarded.

As well try to substitute tallow candles for sun-light, as try to impose error upon men who are taught of God. Then to all who feel that they are guardians of the precious truth of God, Let us all who can go then in the strength of Israel's God, and zealously guard the truth and like the bold Swiss soldier, let each one "Feel as though there he on whose sole arm hangs victory." Let us all look upon this as the most important meeting ever held in the land where God is preparing material for his kingdom, and fervently ask his blessing upon this well-meant endeavor. Yours in the hope, J. F. WAGONER.

Thoughts for Thinkers.

In the eighth chapter of Daniel, is the king of fierce countenance a symbol or the interpretation of a symbol? If it is the interpretation of a symbol, is it fair to say it symbolizes the Roman empire? Is the interpretation of a symbol a symbol? If not, then is not the king of fierce countenance an individual king, yet to be taken without hand? In the eleventh chapter of Daniel, after Alexander's kingdom is divided toward the four winds of heaven, can we find a universal ruler prior to the thirty-sixth verse? and is not the king brought to view in the thirty-sixth verse, an individual whose career is traced in the eleventh chapter of Daniel to his coming to his end with none to help him on Mount Zion in Jerusalem? Is not this glorious holy mountain identical with the sanctuary (Heb. V.) in which Paul's man of sin is to sit? Is not Christ (and not the man of sin) exercising authority in his temple, which is his body the church? Is the Pope of Rome sitting in the church of Christ? What concord hath Christ with Belial? Is not the man of sin be the pinnacle of fame and glory at the revelation of the Son of God? Any light upon the above questions will be thankfully received.

Yours for the truth,
IRA FORBES.

WILLIAM IN DANGER.

LONDON, October 12.—It is now as much a war to the death between the German revolutionists and their ruler as it has been for years between the Czar and the Nihilists, and for the future it will be an unceasing contest between official watchfulness and a determined cunning that will be content to wait for years for a favorable opportunity. An added cause for offense has been given to the Liberals by the priority of the Kaiser's visit to his holiness, King Humbert willingly agreed to the arrangement as a meaningless diplomatic compliment, but it is well known that some of his own Cabinet was averse to the programme, while even Conservative citizens were loudly indignant at what they consider their monarch's lack of proper urgency. The Irridentists are rather pleased than otherwise, for they can refer to the incident as another proof of the threatened retrogression toward despotism and the impossibility of obtaining liberty while a fragment of monarchal government remains. It is confidently told that lots were drawn in Switzerland and Italy, and that the persons thus chosen to shorten the Emperor's reign were two Germans and one Italian, and the weapons decided upon single barrelled pistols of heavy calibre. The time chosen was the moment when the proposed royal victim should set his foot upon the first step of the grand staircase of the Vatican. The shots were not to be fired simultaneously, and whether the first marksman missed his aim or not the other two were to press forward while the attention of the throng was drawn to the struggle between the police and the assassin and deliberately kill the Emperor during the confusion. An anonymous telegram from the Swiss border gave these descriptions of the selected German Socialists to the Italian authorities, and their watchfulness prevented the coolly arranged plan from being carried out. Several arrests have been made as a display of activity and in the hope of eliciting some information concerning the plotters against the German monarch's life, but they have eluded detection as yet, and if reports be true have friends and sympathizers enough in every grade of society who will conceal them until an opportunity occurs of escaping from the country. To a temperament such as that of the German Emperor, a life like that of a hunted animal which is led by the Czar would be unendurable, and the German police have a task of no ordinary magnitude in shielding him against the attacks of assassins, considering the opportunity given to the latter by William's out of door life.

Risen With Christ.

Risen with Christ! When you have Joyfully cried, Easter morning, "Christ is risen!" then add "Risen with Christ!" It is an easy thing to bring flowers to Church and say, "Christ is risen!" But that is only a half truth. The other half is "Risen with Christ!" We are to rise out of the grave of sin. We must leave behind, like grave-clothes, the sinful things we have cherished, and come up into Christ's life of purity, holiness, love.

That there may be this resurrection, a duty rests upon us. Too many people are willing that Christ should do everything for them—decide for them, plan for them, act for them. They would have him stop their sleeping, and they do nothing! They act as if they expected Christ would take them to heaven while they stay in a life of sin.

Easy to sing over Easter flowers, "Christ is risen," and be no better for the song or the flowers. It is "Risen with Christ," through our penitence for sin through our submission to him, trust in him. Clung to the Savior, and what a blessed resurrection with him there will be! This will make Easter flowers bloom in our hearts, and Easter songs echo in our lives evermore.—Classmate.

BY AND BY.

By and by all will be over,
All the earthly care and pain;
Every wearying endeavor
After worldly good and gain.
Discord sharp, and tribulations
Which like fire our spirits try,
All the tears and all the sighing
Will be over by and by.

By and by will come the victory,
Satan bruised beneath our feet;
Sin no more shall sting and wound us,
We no more temptations meet;
Weapons of defence and warfare
Conquerors need no longer ply:
We may lay aside the armor
In the triumph, by and by.

By and by will shine the glory
All about us and within,
By and by we'll join the anthem
To the blood that makes us clean.
Oh, the long, the blissful rapture
Of the bride, the bridegroom sight!
When in joy supreme, eternal,
We are with him by and by!

By and by! Why heed the present
Though the shadows thickly fall:
Be the anguish never so bitter,
Be the pleasures never so small,
An eternal weight of glory
Afterward shall satisfy;
We can bear both worst and keenest
With the watchword, by and by.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 22.

BY DR. J. H. THOMPSON.

THE THEOCRATIC OR AGE TO COME.

CONTINUED.

4th. The Ruling Class....

Sufficient has already been offered to somewhat clearly show who will rule as the chief executive officer and supreme authority under God in his future age kingdom. It has been shown that the Christ was raised from the dead for that purpose, and that when all rule and all authority and power shall have been made subject to him, he, still retaining his position as head of the king-priestly power over the territory of the whole earth, over all the inhabitants of the earth, and they and it perfectly redeemed from the curse and its effects, surrenders the kingdom in its mountain form, complete in all its parts,—in its elemental formation, completeness of organization, perfect submission and infinity of duration,—to God, the universal Father, Creator, Savior, and Disposer, that God may be all in all, through the age of the ages.

In the judgment era preceding this age, it may be recalled that he was promoted from Prince of the kings of the earth, (his present title,) to King of kings and Lord of lords, which is the highest dignity known or recognized under God: for the purpose of bringing all the earthly powers under subjection to the will of Jehovah,—the supreme ruler of the universe. When all this shall have been accomplished the prophecy of David, the sweet singer of Israel will be fulfilled, so that "In his days the righteous shall flourish: and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the rivers unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him: and all his enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him," etc.... "His name shall endure forever; his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed. Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things. And blessed be his glorious name forever; and let the whole earth be filled with his glory: Amen and Amen." Psa. lxxii. 7–19. Verily, "The Lord shall be king over the whole earth: in that day there shall be one Lord and his name one," Zech. xiv. 9, for "in his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely." Jer. xxiii. 6, and "all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord," Isa.

In his righteous rule all the nations of the earth will be blest,—blest with universal peace, blest with prosperity, blest with longevity, blest with human laws, blest with an absence of miracle, and crime, and sin, and death, blest with pure associations, blest with free access to the tree of life, noted for the rendering of its partakers God-like and immortal, blest with the union of church and state in purity and holiness, blest with the immediate presence of God, the angelic host, and the society of the redeemer,—in fact, all of them, of love, comfort, consolation, joy and good cheer to the co-workers with God's chosen ruler throughout the age. My theocratic saint will wear deformity in the raiment of pride, of triumph and adoration, but, instead, there will be one continuous, everlasting exhibition of glory, honor, power and dominion to God, The Father, and to his King, on Zion's hill, from the entirety of earth's inhabitants: north, south, east and west under the whole heaven, will unite in the universal song, for his glorious works of earth-perfection,—for his plan of redemption, and for his great love wherewith all has been wrought in one general plan for man's benefit, and for his own glory.

Subordinates, or assistant rulers are essential elements in the organization and harmonious workings of the governmental machinery of every nation, and it will be readily comprehended and appreciated, that they are no less essential in the kingdom of God, than in the human governments of the present time. No kingdom or nation has ever existed without them, and their existence as well as necessity is obvious in any government, as-pecially where its rule is extended over a number of subordinate sovereignties. Each state has its own governor under our own republican form of government, with the innumerable number of his staff and subordinate county, town and city officials, and these are all subordinate to the chief executive and his associated cabinet. So, also, the crowned heads of Europe and Asia have their counsellors, and advisers and under officers, through whom the affairs of the respective kingdoms are successfully carried on, aiding in the enforcement of just laws, in the suppression of vice, immorality and crime, and in the protection and encouragement of the law abiding ones. That such is the true history of all the past is readily confirmed by reference to the annals of those nations; and that such subordinates will enter quite largely into the composition of the kingdom of God in the Theocratic age is shown by the prophecies which pertain to it, thus, "The kingdom and the dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High; whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him," Dan. vii. 27.

"To him that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end will I give power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I received of my Father," Rev. ii. 27, 28.

"As many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God,.... and if children then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ," Rom. viii. 16, 17.

Further, it will be remembered that John in his exile; in his wonderful vision of the things that were shortly to come to pass, heard "great voices of much people in heaven saying, Alleluia; Salvation and glory and honor and power unto the Lord our God: for true and righteous are his judgments," etc.; and again he heard a voice, "as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thunderings, saying, Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him," Rev. xix. 1–7. This praise song, however, was not that of the world-inheritors whose offered prayers and now song was sung by the four and twenty elders before the throne. No. Theirs was a still nobler, higher, holier, sweeter, loftier strain. Theirs not only recounted the great work of God culminating in their redemption, but it reaches to notes of greater sublimity, and closes by rehearsing the fact that they are made kings and priests unto God reigning on the earth, while the former, only afford praise and thanksgiving for God's kingdom established under the rulers of his own selection. While the subjects render their heartfelt adoration for the glory, power and honor of the kingdom of God under whose benign sway they live, and wherein they enjoy every blessing that makes perpetuated life endurable and pleasurable, to them, the rulers associated with the Lord in administering the governmental affairs of that kingdom, redeemed from sin, and reclaimed from death, fashioned like their Master, awake the echos of a glorified earth, singing, "Thou, O Lamb of God,—Lion of the tribe of Judah,—wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth," Rev. v. 9, 10, and "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hast made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen." Rev. i. 5, 6.

The associate rulers will be divided into two general orders corresponding with the division of the nations; i. e. Jew and Gentile. The Lord Jesus promised Peter and his brethren, (as has already been quoted under another head), as a reward for having left all and followed him, that, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, See Matt. xix 28.

The same promise is repeated to his disciples at another time, thus "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me: that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel," Luke xxii. 28. Matthew repeats similar language and the phraseology could not have been made more forcible or concise in relation to the exact relationship or standing of the disciples with the Jewish nation, or indicate more clearly and definitely the limits of their dominion. Wherever Israel may be, in the regenerating time, the disciples will be their assigned rulers. Whatever the national status of the Jewish people no others except the disciples will control their theocratic restoration, for, he who was born King of the Jews; who came to his own but his own received him not; who was slain as King of the Jews and raised from the dead with unlimited power, as prince of the kings of the earth,—has promised them this rulership when he shall sit in the throne of his glory, —King of kings, and Lord of lords.

Having been slain as King of the Jews the Christ no longer retains that title, or confines his benefits to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but having been raised to the power of an endless life, and endowed with all power in heaven and on earth, he delegates that power and authority to whom he will, and he has seen fit to place the Jewish nation restored under the control of his patient immediate followers, selected from that people for that specific purpose, as a reward for their obedience and faithfulness

Over the Gentile nations, however, a different cabinet will be organized as associates in their governmental relations. It is to these that John referred when he recorded among the things that must shortly come to pass, that "To him that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron," and, "Thou hast made us kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth."

The present dispensation of time is for the "taking out" of the Gentile nations a people for the name of God,—a class of rulers for the express duty of administering the edicts of the Father —among the Gentiles, even as the disciples were especially taken out from among the Jews for a similar office toward Israel and Judah. Hence the present dispensation is appropriately styled "the times of the Gentiles" in contrast with the long period preceding it, when the oracles of God were safely kept by the fathers of Israel, and the Gentile world were strangers to the covenants of grace; aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; without Christ, having no hope, and without God in the world; and we may readily observe the peculiar aptness of the promise to the overcomers of the gospel dispensation, already quoted, as well as of the phrase "people of the saints of the Most High" in Daniel's prophecy relating to the same period and work. A majority of the epistles are addressed to the "saints," or those "called saints,"—a significant word applied only to the overcomers under the gospel.

The Lord Jesus informed the disciples that "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness," (one who testifies), "unto all nations: then shall the end come," Matt. xxiv.: and again he tells them, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth" (the testimony of the witness,) "and is baptized shall be saved: but he that believeth not, "(the testimony of the witness,) shall be damned." (Mark.) Those in connection with John's promise to the overcomers,— "To him that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations," mark out the Gentile path to the regal power and unending life in the Theocratic age soon to be revealed.

The present dispensation of the "Post-tertiary age is not intended for the conversion of the world to the tenets of the gospel of Christ, nor is it for a consequent establishment of a present age Millennium. Such a doctrine is nowhere taught in the Scriptures. On the contrary, the present is the teaching time, preparatory to that era, and to its succeeding age of completed creation in its finished form. Man's passions, prejudices, animosities, stupidity and superstitions run riot with him in this age, in that, blest with immortal angel-equals for rulers under the Christ,—rulers whose individual reign will be unending, and without successor, there will be one continuous period of national and individual blessedness, joy and peace. Swords, spears and munitions of war are now in continual store and preparation for national offense and defense, then swords will have been turned into plowshares, and spears into pruning-hooks, neither shall they learn war any more. Now the gospel is preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, then, they shall not say "Know ye the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest," and, "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters that cover the sea."

The living nations of the earth will then be blest with longevity, peace and plenty under righteous rulers, and of the increase of that government and peace there will be no end.

Now, the ruling class are removed, and their place is filled by other members of the human race;—through succession, or usurpation, or election, and not unfrequently the basest individuals in the government, arrange the laws, —those, whose only ambition is personal aggrandisement, and whose chief motives are the gratification of selfish popularity or pecuniary gain,—then, an unchanging, pure form of government with its affairs administered by undying, perfected sons of God, whose rule shall flourish, and be blest with "an abundance of peace as long as the moon endureth," will fulfil the prophetic covenant and promise made of God to Abraham in the Quarternary age, as well as the encouraging prophecies to the overcomers for their faith, reformation of character, obedience to the gospel, and holy living, preparatory to this great work, made by prophets and holy men of old from the beginning of the age.

Israel as a nation in her own land, ruled by the apostles chosen from their own people and educated under the personal tuition and daily supervision of Messiah himself,—the Gentile nations controlled by king-priests selected on account of their obedience to the gospel of the present dispensation, —all under the direct rule of a glorified King of kings and Lord of lords, who is himself subject to the Father, —the world in its entirety submissive to the laws and ordinances of God,—the earth purified and Eden-like, with the curse and its effects obliterated, with weeping, and mourning, and sorrow and death, forever abolished,—the kingdom of God endowed with all these, and other untold blessings, national and individual, will continue through the unending Theocratic age, a marvelous wonder of perfection and God-work, ever attesting his attributes of power, of love, of forbearance, of righteousness and true holiness, throughout the works of creation, redemption and perfect salvation.

I shall be satisfied when I shall awake with thy likeness. Psa. xvii. 15.

There is in man a continual yearning for satisfaction, but David, notwithstanding his nearness to God, was not fully satisfied. He had enemies within as well as without, which marred his happiness. With prophetic eye he looked down the ages and longed for that time when he should awake with the likeness of Jesus. The apostle Peter says David is not ascended up into the heavens but his sepulchre is with us till this day, Acts ii. 29. As with David so with all true believers the awaking with the likeness of Jesus will be the consummation of all their desires. The resurrection morn when the dead in Christ shall awake and ascend to meet the Lord in the air, will be a time of unmarred pleasure. Are we looking and waiting and longing for the coming of our Lord? This same Jesus which was taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. Acts i. 11. Dear reader search God's revealed word which testifies of Jesus as the way, the truth, and the life. Accept of Jesus now as your Redeemer and Savior and Life-Giver, and then you will rejoice at his coming. Come Lord Jesus; come quickly.

Dear Restitution:

Please find enclosed order for my subscription to the good paper. I am here in this section of the field striving as best I can to serve the Master. The struggle is great, being beset on all sides by those that are doing what they can to serve the doctrines of men. Most of them have learned that contraction to a more certain victory than true literal Bible discussion. So I am trying to hold the fort alone or nearly so; there is one brother and sister live a few miles distant. I hope the church will organize so we will have some help. Yours ever in the faith.

ON A MISSION TO THE LAND OF MY FATHERS.

AT SHECHEM, GERIZIM, SAMARIA.

The night at Shechem will ever be memorable. Evening was spent most profitably in rambling round the city. Passing the mosque, it was interesting to notice the Mohammedans flocking together for evening prayers. The people here seemed unkindly disposed. Now and then we were jeered at by the street prowlers, and one or two youths. "Nazarene!" We accordingly thought it better to leave the city, and return to our tent outside the gate, as we did not think it safe to ramble about in the dark in the town noted for the most fanatical of inhabitants. We were now weary, and yet, because the place of our encampment was so interesting, we read our Bibles as much as possible before giving ourselves over to the slumbers of the night. How realistic was Gen. xii., as we remembered that it was here that the father of the faithful received the wonderful promise. "And Abraham passed through the land unto the place of Sichem..... And the Lord appeared unto Abraham and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land." What an exercise of faith! The Canaanites then possessed the land, yet the father of the faithful recognized the promise and believed, knowing what is impossible with man is a blessed possibility with God. Here we also thought of Jacob returning from a long exile, many divine promises already fulfilled, and some yet to come to pass. Gen. xxxiii. 18–20. We here thought of the terrible tragedy of Simeon and Levi, and the fall of the city into their hands, and the awful slaughter of the male inhabitants. Gen. xxxiv. Here many refugees found shelter when this was the appointed city of refuge. Joshua xx. 7. Here also Joseph came by the request of his father to look after his brethren, when, to his disappointment, they had departed. Gen. xxxvii. Somewhere near here, too, they sold him to a company of Ishmaelites! The night was now advanced. Weary, and anxious to rest, we retired to our tent beds, but to our weary bodies there was no rest that night.

Like all Turkish towns, the streets are full of half-starved dogs, and those wretched animals in Shechem, like some of their masters, delight to bark at strangers. Their noise was so great that during the whole night we did not have any sleep. We then realized how comforting it was to know that our dwelling was a movable tent, and we determined next time to have it pitched where no dogs would destroy our rest. Hearing the constant howling of these dogs we were reminded of the description of the Psalmist concerning his enemies, "They return at evening, they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city." Psa. lix. 6.

The night was spent in this manner, and we were thankful when morning came, and after partaking of some breakfast, we again visited the city, and all places of interest, although we were not, however, greatly struck with much therein.

The city of Shechem contains over 13,000 inhabitants. The want of cleanliness at once convinced us that the populace was composed mostly of degraded Greeks and Roman Catholics, and of Mohammedans! Strange that cleanliness and godliness are so conspicuous by their absence amongst them.

Having seen the mosque the previous evening, we thought it worth while to have another view by daylight. The architecture looked somewhat ancient. Its history is not a little interesting. In the time of the Crusaders it was a church belonging to the Knights of St. John, that sanctuary having been dedicated to the apostle of that name. It is strange that the church, once hallowed as the place where the Cross was erected, should now be the sanctuary over which the crescent waves! Near to this mosque stands another small one of reverence and importance to the inhabitants. This small mosque is said to stand on the site where the almost broken-hearted Jacob sat when his cruel sons discovered him, and spread before him the bloody coat of his darling Joseph. Here I was delighted to meet with a Jew with whom I had a profitable conversation about the expectation of Israel. With a sigh this poor Israelite said, "I am now too weary to walk. Our learned men have declared over and over again that the Messiah would come at certain periods, and we have earnestly and most prayerfully waited, yet Israel's hope is not realized." Seeing the earnestness of the man my heart was touched, and I felt deeply moved, and said: "I am also an Israelite, who have, like yourself, waited and longed, hoped, yearned, and sighed after the promised Messiah, but, blessed be the Holy One of Israel, I have found the Messiah, the son of David, even according to the divine predictions of the Scriptures." The conversation became so warm, friendly, and truly touching, that I gave up my going sight-seeing any more, and returned with him to my tent, where we spent a good time in reading several portions of Scripture, and endeavored to show him from Moses and the prophets that Jesus is the Christ. I presented him with a Hebrew copy of the New Testament which he gratefully accepted, and on leaving me he thanked me for my friendliness, and promised to read carefully the presented book.

The Jew having left me, I again took a good walk through the city and round it.

How delightful it was to read the Scriptural accounts of events so thrilling which took place in this city. Nothing could be more charming than to walk about with an open Bible in hand and read 1 Kings xii. Here the Samaritans, after their return from captivity, made their centre of worship. But, above all interesting events, it was delightful to remember that here the Redeemer of the world paid a most blessed and memorable visit. Here into this city came the woman of Samaria, and testified of Christ, who told her all things that ever she did, and through her instrumentality many believed on him. John iv. 39–42. We also met and conversed with some of the Samaritans, who took pleasure in telling us of their condition and history. With no little interest they showed us the Pentateuch, supposed to have been written in the time of Moses, but afterwards we were informed that the copy shown us was one of a later date, as the genuine one is rarely shown. Having seen almost everything of interest in Shechem, we returned to our tent and prepared for our onward journey. Having taken once more to our saddles, our tent was soon taken up and our caravan moved onwards. We made a little ascent of Mount Gerizim. As it was now becoming very hot, we retraced our steps, and the journey before us being of some distance we at once took the direct route towards Samaria.

The country round here was charming; lovely fields decked with verdure. The songs of the reapers, men, women and children, on every hand greeted our ears. The best view which presented itself to us was that as we descended Mount Gerizim. Majestic hills, delightful valleys full of fruitfulness, babbling brooks, splendid fruit gardens, reminded us of what Eden must have been like. The vision before us was truly poetic, and we were almost sorry as we realized that all these lovely scenes would vanish from our eyes as our Arab steeds carried us onwards. Passing through a stretch of country so full of loveliness, here and there quaint and yet somewhat pleasant villages, we beheld the city of Samaria, standing conspicuously on a hill. We ascended and found the ancient city was now nothing more than a filthy small village. Here, as elsewhere, some of the inhabitants came out with outstretched hands asking for bachshish. Their appearance did not inspire us with confidence in their honesty. We therefore gave them bachshish and with all speed left them. Passing through the village, once so full of grandeur and power, we remembered the words of the prophet, which have been so truly fulfilled, Hosea xiii. 15, 16. "Though he be fruitful among his brethren, an east wind shall come, the wind shall come up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry and his fountain shall be dried up. He shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels. Samaria shall become desolate, for she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword."

How truly also have the words of Micah been fulfilled: "I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard: and I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley: and I will discover the foundations thereof. And all the graven images thereof shall be beaten to pieces, and all the hires thereof shall be burned with fire." Micah i. 6, 7.

The city was once in a flourishing condition, and was the capital of the ten tribes before the Captivity. Here Ahab distinguished himself in his defence of Jehovah, and built the Temple of Baal, which was afterwards justly destroyed by the indignant Jehu. 1 Kings xvi. 32, 33.

With no little interest we read the tragic story of the siege of Samaria and all the events that took place. 1 Kings v.

And as we turned over the pages of our sacred book, how interesting it was to read the story: "Then Philip went down to the city of Samaria and preached Christ unto them, and the people with one accord gave heed unto the things which Philip spoke, hearing and seeing the miracles which he did. For the unclean spirits, crying with loud voice, came out of many that were possessed with them. And many taken with palsies and that were lame were healed. And there was great joy in that city." Acts viii. 5–7.

Passing through the miserable village, some ancient and historical sites were pointed out to us such as Herod's Temple and Ahab's Palace. The Mosque, once a church of the Order of the Knights of St. John, contains the supposed tomb of St. John. In consequence of the great heat oppressing us, and the undesired company of followers—some of the inhabitants—we earnestly pressed onwards until weary, and then we dismounted and spread our rugs under a grove of olives, where bread and wine refreshed us. Then we slept, and the sleep, like the repast, was most refreshing and enjoyable.—Isaac Levitsohn, in Jewish Herald.

BURCH.—At the home of his son, near Tyner City, Marshall Co., Indiana, Brother Warren H. Burch, aged 76 years, 3 months and 27 days.

Brother Burch was born in Chatauqua Co., N. Y., June 20, 1812, and died Oct. 17, 1888. He was a firm believer in the glorious gospel of the kingdom of God, and was one who adorned his profession with a consistent Christian life. His funeral was largely attended, and a discourse was delivered by the writer in the chapel of the United Brethren from a text chosen by our deceased brother himself—Acts xxvi. 6–8. Our brother came to LaPorte County in 1833, and from thence to Marshall County in 1842, where he continued to reside till his death. S. A. CHAPLIN.

The Rev. John B. Cook died at his residence, 469 Franklin Avenue, at 11:20 a. m., Sunday, Oct. 14, 1888, after a protracted illness. The cause of his death was heart failure. His health had been poor for a number of years. He was born near Hanover, N. J., in 1803 and came to Brooklyn in 1869. After his ordination he accepted a call in the City of Rochester, this State, and afterward filled the pulpit in several cities in the west. He was a free and generous hearted man, and, although far from wealthy, he devoted a very large proportion of his income to charity. During his residence in this city he was not connected with any church as pastor, but for many years was a member of the Church of the Blessed Hope, of which the Rev. George R. Kramer is the pastor. The deceased was an excellent Greek and Hebrew scholar and for the past twenty years lived almost solely among his books. The funeral, which was private, was held at his late residence this afternoon. The interment will be at Hartford, Conn.—Brooklyn Eagle.

"THE DANGER AHEAD."

Such is the title of a book a copy of which we have just received from the author, Mr. A. J. Grover, of Muscotah, Kansas. It sets forth in vivid light a long array of facts showing the evil intentions of the Catholic hierarchy in this country, and the inevitable results of their plottings for the subversion of liberty and religion in this, so far, favored land, unless the people shall awake to the danger, and by some means arrest the progress of the insidious foe. We are glad to see such works as we have before us, appearing from time to time; and we bespeak for them an extensive circulation. This work is not a mere blind tirade against Romanism, but backs up its statements by reference to author, volume, and page of Romanist writers themselves. There is no gainsaying its testimony.

Mr. Grover is now a candidate for Congress, from the first district of Kansas, embracing Doniphan, Brown, Nemaha, Jackson, Pottawatamie, Jefferson, Atchison, and Leavenworth counties. We hope he will secure a sufficient number of the suffrages of his constituents to place him in Congress. His influence is needed there. The papacy seeks to further its ends in this nation at the ballot box. It is an augury of evil when it succeeds in controlling any election; for if it should ever succeed in controlling them all, the death knell of the best hopes of humanity would be sounded in our land. Every lover of civil liberty, of religious freedom, of enlightenment and progress, should rally to the right side, in such an issue.—Advent Review.

CHRIST'S LOVE.

There is a song of praise in my heart today,
And a gladness no words can tell,
As I think of the love that is holding me,
That never can change or fail.
Other love may grow cold as the years roll by,
Other friends may forget me,
But Jesus never forgets his own
Through the years of eternity.

This love everlasting what tongue can express?
What heart can its strength understand?
A love that can reach to the depths of sin,
And seat us at his right hand.
He hath borne our sorrows, he hath known our griefs,
He hath suffered with us below;
And now from his throne he in pity looks down
To comfort all human woe.

Sorrows may gather about my path,
Kind friends may be borne from my side,
But the arms everlasting around me fold,
And still I in peace abide.
He hath promised me strength for the stormy days,
As well as for those that are bright—
He hath bidden me rest in his loving care
In the darkness as well as the light.

My footsteps may falter along the path,
And I may lie down to rest;
But nothing can sever me from his love—
In life or in death I am blest—
For he knoweth each grave where his loved ones sleep,
They are safe in his tender care;
And though I may pass through death's gloomy vale,
His love will surround me there,

As the living plant to the sunlight turns,
Unconscious of all beside,
So my heart would forget all its earth-born joys
In the love of the Crucified.
Oh, I cannot be satisfied until I shall see
The light of his beautiful face,
And hear the sweet welcome he hath for me—
Forgiven and saved by grace!

REMINISCENCES.

HANKOW, China, Aug. 22, 1888.

There are a great many queries to answer on the part of one who has come to believe what he was taught from childhood not to believe. The question comes do you think yourself right and all your brethren wrong? By no means. As one has well put it "we are only wise in spots." The theoretical and practical truth to secure as ours possession is boundless. My brethren are informed on thousands of points where I am ignorant, and so in the virtues of life this one has few and that one a few, and in one these predominate and in another those. It were preposterous for one to call his brethren heretics in the wholesale and not style himself in the same manner.

It has been very, very hard all my life not to pray to be seen of men. I remember once hearing Henry Ward Beecher say that he thought it late in the day and out of place for a minister of religion to kneel and pray in the presence of a waiting congregation.

The criticism seemed good in certain respects, still I felt that if the clergyman sincerely prayed in his study; and, instead of listlessly waiting for the moment of service to begin, staring at the people, he improved the time to pray, there was no harm in it.

On another occasion, however, after hearing a clergyman put it to me very strongly in private, that our Lord when about to express the words known as the Lord's Prayer, most solemnly warned us against using it as an "Om'ton Feh," I was shocked to see him a little while after, kneel for some time before a large audience who seemed to have nothing to do like myself, but to stare at him. The rapid recital of the Lord's Prayer made me under the state of mind in which I then was feel like almost sinking to the floor in poignant grief and shame at the hypocrisy of my life-long habit which I saw in my missionary brother's looking glass as it reflected myself.

Of course, I could not then nor shall I now charge hypocrisy on another whose heart I cannot see but I am sure of the effect which the unusual scene at that period of my life had on me.

It was not long after when breakfasting on a steamer as it sailed out of Tientsin, I bowed my head to say "grace" before beginning the meal. Opposite me, a brother missionary made no motions that I noticed of bowing his head and shutting his eyes as if asking a blessing, so I judged him as not having done so—a heinous offense it seemed to me at first.

After a little, however, I began to ask myself if the Lord did not tell us to go into our secret retirement to pray and not be seen of men. I saw then that I had judged the fellow Christian falsely and had better turn the shafts of criticism upon self.

WATCH.

Yes brethren and sisters, let us watch not only for the coming of the Lord; but let us watch ourselves, lest we get out of the straight and narrow way that leads to life.

Since the death of my dear husband "a noble and careful expounder of God's everlasting truth" I see more than ever the necessity of myself making greater effort to watchfulness. In my sad bereavement I have many kind and sympathising friends. But alas! they are powerless to restore my irreplevisable loss. While these attentions may alleviate they cannot heal. Our hearts burn in anguish when we see our loved ones torn from our embraces and laid away in the cold and silent tomb no more forever to hear their loved voice proclaim the glad tidings of the coming King. Fond memory on the speedy wings of thought will fly back to scenes of other days when we have heard him speak the word so faithfully and always uncomplainingly. And it nearly takes the breath away to think that cruel death should rob us of one so much needed. But is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician? O yes, if we can only wait there is. Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. He is the great physician that can heal all of our wounds, if we only trust in him. He knows how to feel for us; himself having suffered in the flesh is able to succor all that suffer in him. He is the great restorer. He has been in the grave under the dominion of death. But arose triumphant over death and today he bears the keys of death and the grave, and ere long his voice will pierce the tomb and all that sleep in Jesus will hear his voice and come forth clad in the habiliments of glory, honor and immortality, and with the living saints who will be changed in a moment in the twinkling of an eye and be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. O glorious thought of soon seeing that blessed Jesus and the dear ones that have been so rudely snatched from among us. Let us strive to meet beyond this age of toil and care; beyond the ever varying perils of mortal life where there will be no more parting, no more death. Christ died that we might live. Unless we forsake all and follow him we can not be his disciples. Oh! let us keep our lights burning and our garments pure. Be waiting, and, waiting, for the Bridegroom draweth near.

MRS. T. FINN.

Notice of the General Conference.

Philadelphia having been chosen by the voice of the Church as the place, and November 16th named as the time for the holding of the General Conference of the Church of God, and of other churches in sympathy with the general doctrines taught in that Church, notice is now given that the General Conference will convene on the afternoon of November 16th at the Blessed Hope Mission, corner of 12th and Dickinson streets, Philadelphia, and continue in session, if found necessary for a period of ten days from that date. The business questions embraced in the call made for this Conference and such other questions as the delegates may themselves decide to consider, will be brought up and decided upon by the regularly appointed delegates from the several churches, who shall cast the votes of the churches they represent in deciding these questions. It is proposed to have devotional and religious meetings carried on simultaneously with the business meetings, and to these, all preaching brethren and all brethren and sisters who can come are cordially invited to be present, and all who come will be provided and cared for during the sessions of the conference. It is hoped that all who can come will do so. Each delegate and each preacher or evangelist regularly appointed, and serving one or more churches, who may attend, will receive from the Phila. Church a contribution to make up any deficiency up to, but not exceeding, $20.00 in the amount supplied him from other sources toward his traveling expenses. Any regularly organized church may send one delegate and any group of churches may unite and send one delegate. Any State or local conference of churches may also be represented by a delegate. The following are offered as suggestions to delegates:

1st. A delegate may be appointed at any time before conference meets.

2nd. Let each delegate bring with him official notice of his having been appointed by the church he represents; such notice to be signed by some officer other than himself.

3rd. Let each delegate get together statistics as to membership and officers of the church he represents and of any neighboring church not represented, giving names, etc., of each, for purpose of record.

4th. Let each intending visitor, whether a delegate or not, send his name and address to Elder C. C. Ramsay, 1002 Mount Vernon Street, Phila. who will thus be able to provide accommodations for him.

5th. If any delegate or visitor cannot come for the entire time, he will probably accomplish the most by coming at the latter end of the conference.

For the Churches at Phila.

To the Church in Iowa.

The Conference at Marathon, Ia. Sep. 13-16, appointed me to represent Iowa in the General Conference, and that an appeal be made for donations to defray my expenses.

Let contributions be made at once for this object and sent direct to me. Our state ought to be represented and the money shall not be taken from the evangelist fund. If more is contributed than is needed to send your delegate, the amount will be turned over to the evangelist fund.

A. J. EYCHANER, Marshalltown, Ia.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Weethee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting to the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Among the matters treated under "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar items, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE CHRIST: Is it the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of commercial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Christian Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the facts of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that the supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to cause preparatory to the dispensation yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Eastern Question

As to various phases,—Egyptian, British, Russian, Ottoman, Hebrew, American and Messianic, by J. F. Weethee. The title of this book gives a good idea of its contents, and the reputation of the author is a guarantee of its worth. The subject as a whole, and in its different divisions is handled in a masterly manner, and the reader is convinced at once that the author has spared no labor in the study of his topics. The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $3.50. Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled, as we have received an invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. The two books, "Coming Age" and "Eastern Question" if ordered together, $4.00.

It gives an account of each of the books of the Bible; explains Jewish and religious institutions, the manners and customs of the Jews, as well as other nations alluded to in the Scriptures. This work by Dr. Wm. Smith, is just the "aid" to Bible study that you need, and every thorough student should place a copy on his table—you cannot read a chapter in your Bible without coming to some question on which you wish more information, and the best help you can get is Smith's Standard Bible Dictionary. Bound in cloth, 770 pages, price $1.50.

"The Gospel of Our Salvation and kindred doctrines—as Life only through Christ—Resurrection of the dead—Second coming of Christ—The Kingdom of God, etc., will be faithfully preached every Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m., to which services we heartily invite the seeker after divine truth! This service will close at 11:30, after which the church will meet for conference, "breaking of bread and prayers." 116 Grand st., second floor, Brooklyn, N. Y.

ROMANISM:

THE DANGER AHEAD. THE REASON WHY A GOOD ROMAN CATHOLIC CANNOT BE A GOOD CITIZEN OF THIS REPUBLIC.

—BY—

A. J. GROVER.

The writer has given to the people of America statements of facts and figures which they will do well to reflect upon. The prospect for the future of the United States is not encouraging. "Romanism has votes to be cast as a unit. These votes are necessary in national elections, and in most local elections, to party success; whichever party will promise to do most for Romanism, will get them. Here lies the danger. Politicians have already silenced or subsidized the Protestant pulpit and the partisan press. As in the days when slavery ruled, everybody interested in the success of a party caters to Romanism. The national policy as to slavery almost cost the life of the republic. There is ten times as much danger to our free institutions from Romanism now, that there was from slavery in 1861."

Cloth bound, 196 pages, paper, with portrait of the author; Price, 50 cents.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE EARTH: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.—No. 23.

BY BRO. J. E. THOMPSON.

THE THEOCRACY, OR AGE TO COME CONTINUED.

3d. LAW.... Equitable laws enacted for the mutual benefit of every person under their influence, are necessary for the existence of any nation or kingdom, and the successful working of its governmental affairs. Without law anarchy and confusion will prevail. Murder, arson, and extreme lawlessness are the usual accompaniments of mob rule, which is dreaded and avoided by every lover of order. Under just laws enacted and enforced for the well-being of all, peace, harmony and national prosperity are uniformly, necessary results, and it is a maxim that in proportion as the laws of the land are just and equitable will its institutions, and its subjects be prosperous, and in the same proportion will its permanence be assured.

National history is one protracted record of efforts to procure the best of human enactments for the control of the nations, but with all the experiences of the past and with the expenditures of the best talents of the world, purely human laws utterly fail to promote public security and suppress crime. The laws continually change; and re-enactments, because of the insufficiency of the present to accomplish the desired results, are a yearly necessity. Session after session of our state legislatures are devoted so completely to this work of remodelling existing statutory provisions, as to almost exclude that which is requisite to insure needed appropriations for the current expenses of the government.

Under the absolute monarchies of the past and present the will of the reigning sovereign has ever been the supreme law of that land, while under the more liberal forms of government, not infrequently, the consent of the governed, controls the character of the laws, and of their enforcement. Eminent lawmakers,—such as Lycurgus of Sparta, and Augustus Cesar of the Roman Empire, and very many others, of less note,—have devoted their best talents to the production of laws, which should be models of perfection. Although they failed to attain to perfect success, their laws are referred to as models for the guidance of legislators, even at the present day.

After many centuries of trial and failure the world today fails by all its combined efforts at law-making, to furnish any extensive country, in which the law fully protects the interest of the governed. And it is a notorious fact that with all the laws that have been framed, "evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." While the repeated efforts to increase a legislation that shall eradicate evil, or even restrain it, have been unsuccessful. It is therefore, safe to conclude that purely human laws can never be enacted to effectually extirpate evil, or remedy the evil passions and practices of mankind.

That the kingdom of God in the Theocratic age will be under the control of law, is only to give it a position equal to every one of its predecessors in this particular line. Hence it is written, "It shall come to pass, in the last days that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills: and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob: and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many peoples: and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," Isa. ii. 2–4. Such is the positive prophecy of God's prophet and is confirmed by almost the exact language of another, thus:—"In the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills: and people shall flow unto it. And many nations (people) shall say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob: and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law shall go forth of Zion and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem," Micah iv. 1–2. Another bears record that "this is the covenant I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their mind," (Israel and Judah), "and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: and they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me from the least to the greatest," Heb. viii. 10, 11.

Since "the law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple: the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart, and the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes," Psa. xix. 7, 8, we can easily conceive how, in an age when even "the bells of the horses are inscribed with holiness unto the Lord: and the pots in the Lord's house are like the bowls before the altar." Yes, when "every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord:" and when "all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them and seethe therein."—I say, we can readily conceive how, then, the enforcement of pure law justly administered will conduce to righteousness, and purity, and true holiness, and how all the ends of the earth shall be subjected to the control of the Lord's Anointed.

What other result could be expected under the influence of well-obeyed physical, moral and social laws, than that spoken by Isaiah the prophet? Is it a matter of wonder that under such laws "there shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days?" or that, as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands?" "They shall not labor in vain," says he, "nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them," (65)

Thus we observe that the prophecies concerning the kingdom of God in its future age, perfected form make it correspond with the structural composition of those that have preceded it during the historic age. We are therefore led to conclude that the various teachings extant in the world today, are mythical, false and unworthy of our confidence. How very common it is for us to hear of "the kingdom of God in the heart," and of "the kingdom of God beyond the skies," or, of "the one" in the kingdom, or, of "the upper and the better kingdoms!" etc. Christ Jesus told the Scribes and Pharisees "in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men," Matt. xv, 9. Are the teachings and expositions of men less pernicious now than they were then? Has our God changed the plan of the ages, and especially of the "age to come," to conform it to the popular doctrines of the present day?

The structural difference between the Kingdom of God as revealed in the Bible and of those that have existed previously, is in quality rather than in elemental formation. The kingdoms of the past and present have been only partial in their actual extent of territory, the kingdom of God in its perfection will comprise the whole earth. They endured for a season, and were subverted to give place to others, this will endure forever and ever. The subjects of the former have been constantly liable to sickness, sorrow, disappointment, pain and death; to the subjects of the latter the tree of life will yield its fruit every month, to perpetuate the lives of those who are obedient to the laws of the age, while the leaves thereof are a specific for all individual ailments. Under the imperfect elements of human rulers and legislators, and the lack of power to enforce the laws of the present age lawlessness, vice and crime abound; in the "age to come," the enforcement and observance of law will make the people all righteous. Crime and its punishment will be unknown. God's law embedded in the minds and hearts of all the people, will be obeyed, and that obedience will insure the perfection of each individual subject. Public executions will be dispensed with, Penitentiaries and houses of correction unneeded, criminal courts abolished, officers of justice and lawyers discarded, fetters, and chains, and dungeons laid aside as useless, and all traces of strife and discord overcome.

The rulers of the nations in this age are changing in consequence of their death, or incapacity; in that there will be an undying, unchanging and unchangeable royalty, joint heirs with the Christ,—just, pure, holy,—to teach and enforce the law of the Lord God for national and individual well-being.

Those conditions will be perpetual,—enduring while eternity lasts,—an entity commensurate in extensiveness of duration with all that is, or can be comprehended in that word.

Of the full extent and completeness of the glories of that age it is impossible for us to conceive, for "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him," 1 Cor. ii. 9. Yet he has unfolded sufficient of his will, purpose and work in the inspired word, to not only acquaint any earnest student of the word, and of his great work in the past, with his labors, and their results for the perfection of the earth, and of its fauna and flora, but, especially, with all that is requisite to develop such an one, from his present immaturity and imperfection, into that perfect type of life which is necessary to make him a participant of all that pertains to the blessedness of the age to come.

To labor successfully with, and under a master mechanic, his plan of the work to be performed should be more or less definitely comprehended; and it will readily be conceded, that the more thoroughly his plan is understood the better are the laborers; or skilled workmen prepared to perform their respective duties acceptably. Is it not imperative then, that those who desire to labor for, and with the Supreme Artisan of the ages in order to their perfection, that they should know his design, so that they work intelligently in accomplishing the ends sought?

Surely, anything done which is not in accord with his will and his methods, will neither benefit the worker, nor fail to receive the disapprobation of the Father which is in heaven.

To his children alone he vouchsafes the promise of rulership in the age to come, as kings and priests over the nations of the earth. (These, both Jew and Gentile, will, as has been shown, be subjects in the kingdom of God, while to the children of God,—the saints,—the overcomers, is promised the rulership over them. During the present dispensation, the middle wall of partition between the two classes is broken down; the rent vail of the temple leaving the holy of holies exposed to the gaze of the Jew and Gentile alike, until "the times of the Gentiles" are accomplished, and mankind is everywhere urged to obey the gospel of the kingdom;—there, as is depicted in type by the tabernacle, and in the language of prophesy, there will be, in the restitution, an outer and an inner compartment, and each of these divisions,—the Jew and the Gentile, will occupy its assigned position, under the rulers respectfully assigned to each nationality.)

How to become children of God,—sons of God, then, is an important subject to every person in this dispensation.

Paul informs the enquirer that "without faith it is impossible to please him;" (God) "for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him," Heb. xi. 6. Faith then, is an important factor, and indeed is the basis of obedient God-service, yet it is not a God-given attribute but an elective act of the individual, induced by testimony. "Faith," says Paul, "cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God," and again he writes to the Thessalonian brethren, "if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him," etc. 1 Thess. iv.

Among the very many proof-texts teaching the importance of faith the following will be readily received as evidence of its necessity as fundamental to sonship, towit: "Go ye into all the world," said Christ to the disciples," and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned," Mark. xvi. 15, 16.

"For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. There is neither Jew or Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male or female, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise," Gal. iii. 26–29.

"That no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, is evident. The just shall live by faith," Gal. iii. 4.

"Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," Rom. v. 1.

See also, 2 Cor. xiii 6; Eph. ii. 8; 2 Pet. i. 1–11; 1 Pet. i. 18–23; Eph. iv. 4, 5. But James writes to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, that "faith if it have not works, is dead, being alone." Chap. ii. 17 and 20. The legitimate result of faith is repentance, and repentance is the stepping-stone to a reformation of Character. Hence when the multitude were pricked in their heart by the words of Peter on the day of Pentecost, and cried out saying, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Peter said unto them, Repent and be baptised every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. For "the promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call," Acts ii. 37–39. This reply was made to their question because Christ had forewarned the disciples only a few days before, "that repentance and remission of sins should be preached among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," Luke xxiv. 47.

As has been remarked faith begets repentance and these work an urgent desire for a reformation of character, before God and man. Whereas carnality of mind had been a principal trait of his former character, the reformed, now becomes spiritually minded, desiring to learn of God, and of the Son of his love. He becomes actuated by a strong desire to obey in all things that God requires of those who diligently seek him. He investigates for a line of duty and finds that every thing is predicated on baptism for the remission of sins, and he performs the first act of obedience as God demands by being immersed in the name of the Lord Jesus; into his death, that as Christ was raised from the dead by the Holy Spirit, he, too, may arise from his watery tomb, to walk in newness of life, under the guidance of the Spirit that raised the Lord Jesus from his tomb.

This is the adoption by which persons become the sons God, and are better prepared to labor with him in the God-work of the ages. Paul witnesses this. "For as many," says he to the Roman church, "as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear: but ye have received the Spirit of Adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself bearing witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: And if children, then heirs: heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ," Rom. viii. 14, 17. Peter says, speaking of the subsequent career of one who has thus been adopted into the household of God, "Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord, according to his divine power hath he given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue; whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity. For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins. Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall: For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," 2 Pet. i. 2–11.

But it is asked, Why is all this routine required? Because it is the only method of adoption, and development, by which God, the Father'—Creator of the heavens and the earth, has revealed himself as a sin-pardoning, life-giving, man-perfecting, Omnipotence, to the human family. God has proposed this means of salvation and asks mankind to accept, instead of amending it. His method of preparation for life in an age to come, is as important to us and as imperative, as was his plain, easily-obeyed law which Adam and Eve transgressed in the garden of Eden, to them; and a failure to yield strict obedience in God's own way will certainly work out as disastrous results for the transgressor now, as it did for them then; for "the wages of sin is death" under the gospel dispensation, even as it was at that time.

If the God of the ages requires a definite work to be performed for the adoption of children (sons of God) into the household of faith, with a view to life and joint labor through the age of the ages, will any other than his revealed method be accepted by him? It is by our works we are to be judged, and out of the things that are written in the books.

Faith, repentance, baptism, for the remission of past sins, and a continued walk in newness of life is what God requires as essential to initiate individuals into the family of God. To obey his will, in his way, ensures life; to fail to obey, leaves man without God and without hope in the world.

THE MAN OF SIN. 2 Thess. II. No. 11.

To the same effect quotations are given from Dr. Waterland's Doctrine of the Trinity and Dr. Chapman's Miscellaneous Tracts; the latter including the fifth century.

"Mr. Whiston contends, that these miraculous powers were totally withdrawn at the very time when the Athanasian heresy, as he calls it, was established by the second Council of Constantinople, about A. D. 381; and that as soon as the Church became Athanasian, Antichristian, and Popish, they ceased immediately, and the Devil beat it his own cheating and fatal powers in their stead." p. 10.

"Thus these eminent divines pursuing their several systems, and ambitious still of improving upon each other's discoveries, seem unwarily to have betrayed the Protestant cause by transferring the miraculous powers of the Church, the pretended insigne of truth and orthodoxy, into the hands of its enemies, and yielding up this sacred depositum like the old Ancilia of Pagan Rome to the defence and support of Popish Rome. For it was in these very primitive ages, and especially in the third, fourth and fifth centuries, those flourishing times of miraculous powers, as Dr. Chapman calls them, in which the chief corruptions of Popery were actually introduced, or the seeds of them so effectually sown that they could not fail of producing the fruits which we now see. In these corruptions, I mean the Institution of Monkery, the worship of reliques, invocation of saints, prayers for the dead, the superstitious use of images, of the sacraments of the sign of the cross, and of consecrated oil, by the efficacy of all which rites, and as a proof of their divine origin." p. 12.

Dr. Middleton then shows that "all the principal Fathers of the Church, both Greek and Latin, recommended Monkery, quoting Athanasius, Basil, Jerome, Chrysostom and Augustine.

The great esteem in which the so-called reliques of the martyrs were held, to regard to "the daily miracles which were wrought by them," is shown by quotations from the above named Fathers.

There was one Protestant, however, in those days, whose treatment is given by Dr. Middleton, who informs us that "Vigilantius, a learned and eminent Presbyter of the Church, wrote a book, just as a Protestant would now write, against the institution of Monks, the celibacy of the clergy, praying for the dead, and to the martyrs, adoring their reliques, celebrating their vigils, and lighting up candles to them after the manner of the Pagans. Jerome, who answers him, defends all those rites with a most outrageous zeal and acrimony of language, and treats Vigilantius as a most profligate heretic, uttering the blasphemies with which the Devil had inspired him against the sacred doctrines of the Church: 'Answer me,' says he, 'how it comes to pass, that in this vile dust and ashes of the martyrs, there is so great a manifestation of signs and wonders. I see, then most wretched of mortals, what thou art so grieved at, what so afraid of; that unclean spirit, which compels thee to write thus, has oft been tortured and even now is tortured by this vile dust.'"

In the sacrament also of the Eucharist, several strange abuses were introduced long before this fourth age. In Justin Martyr's time within fifty years after the days of the apostles, the cup was constantly mixed with water, and a portion of the consecrated elements sent also to the absent, which soon became the source of much superstition. For that mixture, considered at first as prudential only, and indifferent, is declared by Irenæus, to have been taught and practised by our Savior, and by St. Cyprian, to have been injoined to himself by a divine revelation.

"This Sacrament was administered likewise in all their public communions, to infants, even of the tenderest age, before they were able to speak; and was constantly styled, the Sacrifice of the body of Christ which was always offered up, as Cyprian says for the martyrs, in their annual festivals, as it was also to St. Jerome, by the Bishop of Rome over the venerable bones of St. Peter and St. Paul. Hence flowed those amazing titles which were given to it in this fourth age, of most tremendous mystery, dreadful solemnity, terrible to angels, mystic table, whose very utensils and sacred coverings, as St. Jerome says, were not to be considered like things inanimate, and void of sense, to have no sanctity, but to be worshiped with the same majesty as the body and blood of our Lord. And what is all this but a description of that sacrifice of the Mass, which the Romanists offer at this day, both for the living and the dead; and the same miraculous tales which they still relate of their transubstantiated bread?

"The custom of praying for the dead had also a very early origin; for it was common, as we learn from Tertullian, even in the second century; and became the universal practice of the following ages; so that in the fourth, we find it reckoned as a sort of heresy to deny the efficacy of it. The purpose of it was to procure relief and refreshment to the departed souls in some intermediate state of expiatory pains, which according to the opinion of those times all men were to suffer for their sins, except the martyrs, and saints of the first class. A doctrine and practice which could not fail of giving birth to the Popish purgatory."

"The Sign of the Cross likewise was the subject of much superstition in those ages. Every step that we take, says Tertullian, when we come in or go out, put on our clothes or our shoes, when we bathe, eat, light up candles, go to bed or sit down, we mark our foreheads with the sign of the cross. If for these and other acts of discipline of the same kind, you demand a text of Scripture you will find none, but tradition will be alledged to you, as the prescriber of them." p. 19.

"The sign, says St. Chrysostom, both in the days of our forefathers, and in our own, has thrown open gates that were shut, destroyed the effects of poisonous drugs, dissolved the force of hemlock, and cured the bites of venomous beasts." p. 20.

"Thus were the principles and practices of the fourth century, as they are declared by the most eminent Fathers of that age; whence every one may see what a resemblance they bear to the present rites of the Popish Church. But some perhaps will be apt to suspect that I am really defending the corruptions of that Church by assigning to them an origin so ancient and venerable; and the suspicion indeed may seem plausible, since I have been saying little else but what the Papists themselves would say on the same occasion. Yet it is no more than what fact and truth oblige me to say, and as controversy, I hope, will ever heat me, or prejudice bias me so far, as to make me deny or dissemble what the conviction of my own mind requires me to confess. But whatever advantage the Romanists may hope to reap from this confession, it really gives them none at all." p. 21.

"Our dispute with them is, not how ancient, but how true their doctrines and practices are; and if they are not derived from Christ or his apostles, nor founded in the Holy Scriptures, it is wholly indifferent to us Protestants from what age they drew their birth; whether it was from the four first or the four last centuries of the Church." p. 22. J. CAMERON.

Dear Restitution:

In reading the letters from the dear ones so scattered, concerning the great National Conference, which time and place is determined upon, and who so much anticipate it (and well they may), I want to say a word. I am glad in my heart that such a movement was ever thought of, and this thought will be ascribed to Brother Work. God surely put that in his heart, and I feel it will be the grandest meeting that Advents have ever known. It will be a little semblance to the final great gathering. But these must part after their hearts have been more closely knit together by acquaintance and communion together. But when we all come up before the great white throne (the poor can go there) there will be no more parting. We long for that time when we can meet the dear ones on earth, and the dear sleeping ones, and the dear Savior who by his death and resurrection has reconciled us to God, and who by faith and obedience are made partakers of his rich grace, that will give us a title to the everlasting kingdom.

Many or some of the brethren that will be there we have seen, and many more whose names are so familiar with us through the paper it seems we are acquainted, and many more as all are dear to us as brethren of the One Faith.

We organized a little church twenty-five miles from us, and chose Brother W. B. Fisk as our Evangelist. He has been about fifty miles away through the summer, holding meetings in that vicinity and also writing his autobiography, which I trust will find a ready sale, for he is an old man highly educated and has had great and wonderful experiences.

Being so scattered we have not met since April at our quarterly meeting, and not knowing how many of the brethren read THE RESTITUTION, I do not know as the church have any knowledge of it. I would have been so glad to have sent Brother Fisk to the Conference as a delegate. It is rather late but I will write to several and see if we cannot send him. Nothing but the means keeps my husband and myself from attending that glorious meeting. But I am trying to say with Paul, to learn in whatsoever situation I am therewith to be content. I hope the means will be at hand so our dear Brother John Foore can attend; would gladly help him some if it were possible. It would do me so much good if I could give in many ways for God's glory. But the lowly violet and many a flower blooming in seclusion has the rays of the sun upon it to open its petals and perfect it in beauty as does the cultivated and admired flower. We pray for God's blessing upon you all dear ones and that you may all be strengthened to work more earnestly till the end. We love to see our dear Brother Ramsay's name, and that he has so wide a sphere of usefulness.

MRS. MARY R. CAMPBELL.

STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association will be held at Plymouth, Ind., on Saturday, Nov. 10, 1888, (as per Articles of Association), for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors and for the transaction of such business as may come before the meeting. It is important that stockholders take an interest in this meeting, and be in attendance.

J. H. WILLEY,
Pres. Board Directors.

---

As this number is the last issue before the meeting of the Stockholders to make arrangements for the ensuing year, one of which may be the appointment of a new Editor, we have to say to all our worthy correspondents, that some articles may be delayed a week or two. Indeed did our term of service embrace both November and December, we should have to distribute original and selected matter in such a way as to furnish compositors copy for three or four weeks ahead should we attend the Philadelphia Conference. Let our correspondents continue their welcome contributions, and, whoever may manage the paper editorially, their articles will find place as soon as circumstances will permit.

---

WHEN an additional article or two may find a place in our paper next week and thus reach those in attendance on the National Conference while in session at Philadelphia, we have, however, already inserted nearly or quite all that have come to hand. It will remain therefore for the delegates, who may assemble, to take all that has been, or may be written into prayerful consideration. If we apprehend the object of the conference, it is to devise measures to act harmoniously in concert in our efforts to propagate Bible truth. That each congregation through the length and breadth of the land, organized according to the teachings of the Apostles, is a body perfectly independent of all outside human legislation and control in its spiritual affairs and methods of working will not, as we think, be called in question. Still churches that harmonize in all the great essentials of gospel faith and practice, may, and we believe ought to confer together in order to accomplish unitedly what could not otherwise be effected. In this way, too, brethren will become acquainted with each other. This will be of great advantage to our younger ministers. While man-made creeds are objectionable and to be rejected, there are Bible doctrines that are fundamental, and ordinances that no man or association of men have the right to alter or change. To deny some doctrines is to make one an antichrist. See 1 John ii. 22, 23. For a denunciation against changing ordinances, see Isa. xxiv. 5, 6. For the importance of holding that eternal life is only through Christ, see 1 John v. 10, 12. Without quoting proof texts we are persuaded that we are only saved through the gracious provisions of the gospel, and, therefore, of the paramount necessity of both faith and obedience. Our union in the belief of the truth, in obedience to God's positive ordinances, and the enjoyment of the "earnest of the Spirit," is what brings us into church fellowship, and nothing less nor more will be requisite for our conference unity of faith and concerted action. Let us who go, and those who abide at home, all earnestly pray for the divine blessing to rest upon those who may meet for counsel and concerted action, so that our Redeemer's cause may be advanced and God glorified.

ROMISH DUPLICITY.

It was believed by people who lived a generation or two ago that the Devil sometimes made a personal appearance among men in order to effect some diabolical purpose, but that he always appeared in disguise. But they, at the same time, held that however much he might disguise himself, there was always one mark he could never conceal—he had a cloven foot he could by no possibility cover, He might assume the most attractive form in every other respect, but the hoof could not be changed. In our day, and in our country, he is not so much assuming a personal embodiment, as an incarnation in a politico-ecclesiastic-ism. See Rev. xii. 9, and connected chapters. In attacks on the Public Schools, burning Bibles, etc, the cloven hoof of the arch enemy is fully revealed. But there are "depths of Satan" that are not yet sounded. Papal Rome is working in the dark. We take a clipping from a letter of Elder Miles Grant to the Crisis that is suggestive and well worthy of the careful consideration of the laboring classes. We have uncovered the iniquities of Romanism in the sale of Indulgences—drawing our facts verbatim from the most authentic history—in our issues for a few months past.

We have also pointed out the designs of Rome in her plotting for the destruction of our Public Schools. We now call attention to a covert design to seduce the laboring class. The split-foot is plainly discernable. But as the burning day of the great Harlot is now nigh, the meretricious old sorceress may get hold of the blade of the knife instead of the hilt in manipulating the laboring classes. These will finally side with her paramour kings in hurling her to her merited destruction. See Rev. xvii. 15–18. Elder Grant says:

"In the evening I heard a lecture in the Central Music Hall from the noted Dr. Glynn. His address was to the United Labor Party, and occupied nearly two hours. Some two thousand were present, who listened with marked attention. He is a fine appearing man and an able orator. There are good reasons for believing he is a Jesuit, who is making an earnest effort to persuade the Labor Party to adopt measures and principles in harmony with the Papacy; while at the same time he would persuade the Papists to modify some of their rules in order to prepare the way for the union of all under the flag of the antichrist. It is believed that the Pope's excommunication of Dr. Glynn was for the purpose of blinding the American people, so that they would not understand his true position. As there is now no government in Europe that supports the Pope, he has concluded to make a final effort to secure the control of the United States through political intrigue. It is well known that Mr. Powderly, the leader of the Knights of Labor, is a Papist, and very friendly with Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore. Provided Dr. Glynn and others can succeed in uniting the laboring classes under the Papal banner by any sharp practice, so as to control the ballot-box, then the Pope may think it best to make his home in this country.

"In view of this state of things a strong anti-Papal movement has been lately inaugurated, of which I am not now at liberty to speak definately; but its workings will be manifested in due time. In more than one sense, 'perilous times' are approaching. This is the hour to beware of 'the wiles of the devil.'"

THE American Fat Stock Show will be held by the Illinois State Board of agriculture in the Exposition Building Chicago, Nov. 18–24. In connection, a grand display of Live Stock, Poultry, and Dairy Products will form a very large and attractive part of the exhibit. The officers of 61 railroads have agreed to sell tickets at reduced rates, thereby affording an unusual opportunity to see the display of fine stock as well as to visit the great Emporium of the West. For specific information consult ticket agents of all roads in the surrounding States. Thanks to the Secretary, Mr. Charles F. Mills, for Complimentary Ticket and other favors.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.

We have read with interest the call for a general conference of the churches, and the many letters which have appeared from time to time in THE RESTITUTION relating to the object of the call. We note with pleasure the interest manifested and the probability that this will be the largest delegate body ever assembled by our church in the United States. We would add our voice to that of many others in urging the churches to send delegates. Let every organized church be represented if possible. If it is impossible for you to send a delegate from your own church then adopt Bro. Work's suggestion and send credentials to some one in whom you have confidence. We would suggest that some such church send credentials to Brother Samuel Wilson, of Rahway, N. J. He expressed his sentiments very freely in a late number of THE RESTITUTION, at the same time stating that he would be unable to attend as a delegate because he was connected with no organized body. Brother Wilson is one of those kind of ministers of the word who labors six days of the week for his daily bread and spends the seventh preaching the word at different places for the reward that is hereafter, in many cases if not always defraying his own expenses. Such men are safe counsellors because they are in earnest. We shall need him there.

We noticed some churches were afraid to send delegates, fearing from the wording of the call that the conference will result in establishing a creed and ecclesiastical body. If there is such danger it is all the more reason why they should send delegates to prevent such a calamity befalling the Church. We need neither creeds nor creedlings, but we need a uniform plan, and a better and more Scriptural system of organization for evangelical work. Now is the time to effect such an organization, and while we are about it let us do the work well. To this end we hope the churches will select as delegates, competent men, not mere theorists but practical men who will deal with human nature as it is and not as it ought to be; men of strict integrity and Christian character, with the love of Christ in their hearts, who have been successful in business life. Such men will be the most likely to formulate a successful plan.

We are of the opinion that Article 5th in the "Notice of the General Conference," as it appears in THE RESTITUTION is unfortunate. It seems to us of the utmost importance that all delegates should be on hand promptly Nov. 13th to aid in organizing the conference. This preliminary work of electing officers, organizing committees and outlining the programme of the conference is frequently of great importance and will need the united wisdom of the whole delegation. We can see no good reason for holding the conference over ten days. Half that time it seems to us will be ample to transact all necessary business. Of course there is no objection to holding a protracted meeting as long as desired. But some of us delegates who be limited in time and will want to push business matters through with despatch so as to return home as quickly as possible. To this end we hope all delegates will be on hand promptly on Nov. 13th.

JAS. W. WILSON.

Delegates from the West.

Why cannot all the delegates from the West who will pass through Chicago arrange to meet there and go to Philadelphia in a body. We could have a very pleasant social time en route. You can meet at my office, 156 Washington St., Chicago. I shall go east so as to be at Philadelphia on the 16th, by the Baltimore & Ohio. The scenery through the mountains on this route is grand. It also passes through many historic places. By starting a day earlier we might spend a day at Washington to great advantage. What say you? It is also probable that excursion rates can be secured if we go in a body, providing, of course, there are enough of us. In any case I shall be glad to aid delegates in securing tickets. Please command me for any favors.

JAS. W. WILSON.

What Say You, Brother Woodward?

This I say. About one year ago I made the acquaintance of Bros. G. W. Young and Samuel Wilson at Watson, Mich. The acquaintance was a very happy and I trust a profitable one. Brother Wilson and others ask the question, What do you think of the National Conference. My wife expressed our sentiments in RESTITUTION of Oct. 3d. Brother Work, or the church at Philadelphia expresses my idea exactly; I can say amen to the call and can see nothing in it exceptionable. Many will bear me witness that I have advocated the same ideas for several years. I am not so much afraid of a "creed" as of many other things. Any government is better than anarchy, and while I hold to the broadest religious liberty, still I believe the "Church of God" as a body should have power within itself for its own protection. I am tired of spending the best years of my life in raising up sheep to feed wolves upon. "In union there is strength," and as Bro. Wilson says, "we have had enough of this guerilla warfare;" let us combine our forces all over this broad land, with one "declaration of principles" or "covenant" and do away with this faction business. The children of this world are very wise; if politicians have any difference they are united in the council rooms, and when their orators go before the public they speak the same things. If we can just learn this lesson then we can begin to talk about the "one faith" and we would soon be a power in the world for good. God has committed great truths to our trust. Have we been faithful stewards? Multitudes have perished for lack of knowledge. Have we done our whole duty. I believe there is more danger from sloth and idleness and covetousness, than from creed. One hobbiest can injure the cause of Christ more than all the creeds in the land.

I suppose Hymenæus and Phyletus were great sticklers for gospel liberty, still Paul condemned their work. What was the trouble? They taught false doctrines. 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. And Paul turned Hymenæus and Alexander over to Satan. Rather rigid discipline, but he thought it was necessary. True the church in Michigan have taken the Bible as their only rule of faith and practice, but we and our sister State of Indiana have also adopted a declaration of principles in common, which is a long step in advance of the past thirty years when all has been discordant, because of no order. The step taken will, we hope, control every element that has sought to destroy us. We feel like praying night and day, Lord, prosper the National Conference. Brethren let all who attend that meeting go there with hearts full of nothing but love to all and an anxious interest for the advancement of the King's business. Yours earnestly contending for the faith which was once delivered to the saints. B. W. WOODWARD.

"By Love, Serve One Another."

"Serve one another." Read it again, and be sure that it does not say, "rule one another," nor, "dictate to one another;" because we want to obey the very letter and spirit of God's word, that we may not fulfil the lust of the flesh and so bite and devour until we be consumed, put out as a candle whose wick is nipped close by the snuffers. It does not take long for the lights to go out in a church where such careless snuffers are around. Take heed brethren that ye be not of this class. Let not the liberty into which Christ has called you be an occasion to the flesh.

By love serve one another. Be servants. Do everything you can to help. Let love rule in your hearts. Be led by the Spirit, walk in the Spirit, bring forth the fruit of the Spirit.

Note what the works of the flesh are. Are you at variance with a brother? Are you wrathful? Do you hate him? Is there strife or envy between you? Then—what? You cannot inherit the kingdom of God. You had better put such works away and be quick about it too, for they are in the same category as idolatry and drunkenness and murder. What if a brother has done something wrong? Are you not going just as far wrong when you begin to hate him, and be wrathful against him? Is that obeying God? By love serve one another.

The fruit of the Spirit is love. If you do not have love, you have not got the Spirit, you are not walking in it, nor are you led of it.

The fruit of the Spirit is joy. I never knew an angry, wrathful man to be joyful, nor to shed around him the bright light of joy. He did not serve another by making him joyful.

The fruit of the Spirit is peace. The man who is constantly quarreling with his brethren, cannot be at peace; he cannot feel it in his breast nor can he serve another by making him feel at peace.

The fruit of the Spirit is long-suffering. Are you long-suffering? Do you take things patiently? Look into your hearts and see. Go over your daily lives and mark whether there are any outbreaks of passion, any unguarded words, and treasured up feelings of hatred. The soldier of Christ must learn to endure, and he must not only endure, but that endurance must be of the same spirit that the Master showed when mocked at and spit upon.

"Christ formed in us the hope of glory," is the Christ-like character, without which we can have no hope of sharing in his glory.

We must be long-suffering when wronged, no matter whence the wrong comes, whether from foe or brother.

The fruit of the Spirit is gentleness. We must be gentle in dealing with the dear children of the household. Gentleness is one of the characteristics of those who "serve one another by love."

The fruit of the Spirit is goodness. It is all good things summed up into a pure, and honest, and virtuous life.

We serve one another by love when we live right, when we are prayerful and careful in all our walk and conversation.

The fruit of the Spirit is faith. Yea, faith! All the teachings of the Spirit through the word conspire together to strengthen our confidence in God. The promises of God, given through the Spirit to them that believe, make us to hope in God and to trust in his mercy.

We "serve one another by love" when we keep the bright light of faith burning in our hearts, when we are constantly pouring oil upon it that it may not go out and may shed its radiance into other hearts and upon other lives.

The fruit of the Spirit is meekness. God teaches us humility. He giveth grace to the lowly, but he is against the proud. He loves the teachable, humble mind. We can "serve one another" by being meek and lowly and teachable.

The fruit of the Spirit is temperance. We are to be "temperate in all things." The drunkard has no place in the kingdom, nor has the glutton nor the covetous idolator. "Serve one another in love" by being temperate.

Report of the Annual Meeting of the "Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge."

Our Fifth Annual Meeting was held in the "Blessed Hope Mission" chapel, corner of Twelfth and Dickenson Sts., Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 28, 29 and 30, 1888.

The brethren in Philadelphia proved to us their devotion to Christ and his work, and demonstrated their love of his brethren. Their entertainment of all visitors was simply complete, and will long be remembered by us. The speakers and subjects were as follows: Geo. A. Kramer, The Light of the Coming Age; J. O. Barnaby, What has Baptism to do with a Christian? John Donaldson, How was Christ Perfected; Jas. F. Gelletly, Asaph's Enigma; Wm. Brookman, The Woman's Seed and the Resurrection; A Paper by W. Glen Moncrieff on the Resurrection, read by John Donaldson; Samuel Wilson, Watch, Work, Wait. The attendance at each of the meetings was fair, and the interest good.

At our business meeting, the Treasurer reported as follows: Balance on hand last meeting, $80 00; receipts since, $679 84; total $759 84. Expenditures $646 13; leaving balance on hand $114 71. The report was examined by Robt T. Young and Chas. G. Botelle and pronounced correct.

A few extracts from the Secretary's Report must suffice.

Our Roll of Members now contains a list of 448 names, scattered through the United States and Canada, a gain of 30 since last year.

We have published during the past year, papers, pamphlets and tracts numbering 46,600 copies, containing 474,000 pages.

In distributing literature we have followed the directions as laid down for us by our Constitution, granting to all members, when so requested, the full amount of their subscriptions in publications. In this way a considerable quantity of our printed matter has found circulation. Besides these a number of evangelists in various parts of the country and Canada have made application for and received generous supplies of tracts and papers for gratuitous circulation at conferences, camp meetings and other gatherings. In all we have distributed 55,153 copies, containing a total of 355,798 pages. Besides these we have distributed 224 books of various kinds but principally the "Unspeakable Gift." We have distributed in addition considerable literature that has been donated to the Association by Robt. McLauchlan, W. Glen Moncrieff, Carris Williams, Wm. Brittle and others.

The Board of Managers desire to say that the duties imposed upon them during the past year have been met as the foregoing records show. We could not give an account of the many hours spent in corresponding, book-keeping, addressing wrappers and preparing for the mails our two Quarterlies, Words of Truth, and The Rock, besides many packages of tracts and pamphlets as orders were received. Then the editing of the papers, proof reading and chasing after the printer. These and other duties connected with the work have occupied nearly all the hours of some after the toils of the day for our daily bread. The official Board in giving this report cannot lay claim to having performed their labors without fault; none of us have reached that blessed state of perfection yet, and hence our doings must of necessity be more or less imperfect. But we do claim to have done the best we could according to our abilities.

None of the officers receive any pay for the work they do for the Association. The only remuneration they receive is the kind encouragement from their Christian brethren and sisters, and the knowledge that the work is for the glory of the name of God and the enlightenment of fellow men.

The Secretary at the Business Meeting presented an itemized inventory of property on hand, cost values, summarizing as follows:

|---|---|
| Electro Plates | $131 55 |
| Books, Tracts, Papers, etc | 570 43 |
| Office Supplies | 11 35 |
| Total value all goods on hand | $722 33 |

Thanking all our Members for their kind assistance in the good work, and praying that the Lord shall continue to prosper the Association, we shall close by requesting each and all who love the Lord Jesus Christ and the truth of the gospel, to unite with us in spreading abroad the glad tidings of salvation. Any one paying the sum of one dollar per year or twenty five cents every three months, will be constituted a member and shall be allowed to draw the full amount of their subscription in our literature. Donations sent in will be thankfully received and applied exclusively to the promotion of Christian knowledge.

The Board of Managers for the coming year is: Geo. W. Young, Pres.; M. S. Driggs, Vice Pres; John Donaldson, Sec.; J. O. Barnaby, Ass't Sec.; Lottie E. Young, 2nd Ass't. Sec.; Samuel Wilson, Treas.

IN MEMORIAM.

ELDER J. B. COOK.

A memorial service in view of the death of our beloved brother, J. B. Cook, was held in the Church of the Blessed Hope, Brooklyn, N. Y., Sunday evening, Oct. 28, 1888.

Brother George R. Kramer, Pastor, made the following remarks:

Brother J. B. Cook was born Dec. 17, 1803, and died Oct. 14, 1888, from which it will be seen that he had attained the age of 85 years.

Of him it may be truly said, he sleeps in Jesus awaiting not only the awakening to immortality but the enthronement and coronation of the saints whose privilege it is to reign with Christ in the Millennial Age.

Conspicuous in the character of the deceased was his kindness to the sick and needy. He was the friend of the widow and orphan, and the leisure days of his lengthened life were improved in going about and doing good as his strength and circumstances permitted.

Brother Cook was a gentleman. He was considerate for the welfare of those with whom he came in contact. This gentlemanly department was with him Christian courtesy not coming from the mere polish of the outward man for purposes of selfishness, but springing from the fountain of an inward kindness.

In the sublimity of the primitive Christian faith he was the antithesis of the modern agnostic. Brother Cook loved to say, "I believe," "I know whom I have believed." This faith gilded the last hours of his long life with a radiance that was glorious. Conscious of his affliction he said, "God could do nothing wrong."

Called upon three years before to give up his beloved companion, which loss he felt deeply; he was nevertheless sustained by the hope of the soon coming of the Lord. He did

> Not moan about the retrospect,
> But dealt with the other distance
> And the hues of promise.

Indeed he did not look for death but for the second personal coming of Jesus. His hope spanned the Hudson Abyss. He saw beyond and afar into the perspective of Paradise, and "rejoiced in the hope of the glory of God."

He was a good Hebrew and Greek scholar, which knowledge assisted him very much in his study of the sacred Scriptures, with which he was remarkably familiar and was to himself somewhat of a concordance. As a preacher he was faithful, earnest and edifying.

In his last hours he was devotedly ministered to by his affectionate daughter, who with him is a firm believer in the pre-millennial coming of Jesus.

Brother Cook was preserved in great physical and mental vigor, but during the summer season he succumbed to the infirmities of age, and fell asleep in hope of a glorious immortality.

He is buried with his wife in the old cemetery in Hartford, Conn., where they both wait the descent of the Lord from heaven, "with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God." A number of others spoke and the following preamble and resolutions were passed.

WHEREAS: Our beloved Elder, John B. Cook, for more than sixty years a faithful and honored minister of the gospel, having served his generation, by the will of God fell asleep in Christ, Sunday, Oct. 14th inst., in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and

WHEREAS: For the past ten years he filled the office of Elder in the Church, witnessing to all by his holy walk and conversation, and simple manners, the charm and beauty of the Christian life. Ever intent upon his Master's work, he was of such tender sympathy for the needy, the widow and the orphan, that it is truly said of him, "he gave all his goods to feed the poor." Therefore as an expression of our love and sorrow,

Resolved, That in the death of our venerable and beloved Elder and brother, the Church of the Blessed Hope has lost a wise examples, a true friend and brother, as well as one whom we shall greatly miss in his inspiring exhortation and holy enthusiasm felt by us, as he proclaimed among us the coming and kingdom of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

Resolved, That we will cherish his memory and will endeavor so to live that by God's grace, we may again meet our beloved Brother Cook in the morning of the resurrection of the just.

Resolved, That we tender to his family our heartfelt sympathy in their bereavement.

Resolved, That these resolutions be printed in THE RESTITUTION and in the World's Crisis.

M. S. DRIGGS,
Church Clerk.

Why Mummies have Kept so Long.

It is hard for those who have always lived in a climate like ours in this country to realize that bodies can possibly be preserved anywhere for three thousand years like the Egyptian mummies. Two things, however, should be remembered in this connection: one is that a religious custom required the embalming of each body as soon as possible after death; the other is a natural phenomenon consisting in the fact that the climate in Egypt is almost positively rainless. Of the latter Dr. Robinson says in his Pharaoh's of the Bondage and Exodus: "There might be said to be no showers even in Egypt. The river Nile gives all the moisture the fields have, with its annual inundation, but this covers only the plains; the hillsides are always dry. Hence it results that, when the bodies of the dead were properly embalmed, and then deposited in one of these dry receptacles of the rocks beneath the unchanging sands, they might be considered well-nigh impetishable. It need give no surprise whatsoever to us that the bodies of veritable men and women, who lived four thousand years ago, are still on the earth, unchanged in lineament and feature. Not unlikely there are countless thousands of those who saw Joseph on his throne in Egypt now lying undisturbed in their sycamore coffins, their hands on their breast, their eyes closed, their funeral garlands still twined."

Everything goes to rebuke the confidence with which skeptics wrote a few years ago concerning references to Egypt and Canaan in the early books of the Bible. The facts mentioned in Scripture were treated as unsubstantial myths of an illiterate age. In the Contemporary Review of August, Prof Sayce refers to "the great event of the season"—the discovery in Upper Egypt of letters and despatches sent by the governors and kings of Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Babylon to Egyptian monarchs. Evidences of this active literary intercourse go back to the date of the Exodus. Henceforth, instead of regarding the period of Joseph as fabulous, it is evident that schools of literature then existed; and Prof. Sayce avers that the discoveries are likely to have most important bearings upon the criticism of the Pentateuch.

How fast we learn in a day of sorrow! Scripture shines out in a new effulgence, every verse seems to contain a sunbeam, every promise stands out in illuminated splendor; things hard to be understood become in a moment plain.—H. Bonar.

HEAVENLY CITIZENSHIP.

A man dwelling in one country, and holding citizenship in another and far remote country, is not an unknown circumstance. In such a case, we may have the singular anomoly of one being most a stranger in the land in which he is present, and most at home in the land in which he is absent. Our blessed Lord was the first perfectly to realize this idea respecting the heavenly country. For he speaks of himself as, "He that came down from heaven, even the Son of man who is in heaven." So truly a citizen of the other world was he that even while walking with men and talking with men he regarded himself as there, not here. And this saying of his occurs in that discourse where, with an emphatic "verily, verily," he declares that "except a man be born from above he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Here is the key to the whole mystery. As the only begotten of the Father, Christ's native country was above; and during all the days of his flesh he neither relinquished his heavenly citizenship nor acquired an earthly residence. "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel: for he hath visited and redeemed his people," is a significant note in the prophecy of his birth. And four times in the gospels is our Lord's advent to earth spoken of as a visit. But it was a visit which never for a moment looked toward a permanent abiding. At his birth he was laid in a borrowed manger, because there was no room for him in the inn; at his burial he was laid in a borrowed tomb, because he owned no foot of earth; and between the cradle and the grave was a sojourn in which "the Son of man had not where to lay his head." The mountain top whither he constantly withdrew to commune with his Father was the nearest to his home. And hence there is a strange pathetic meaning in that saying, "And every man went unto his own house, Jesus went unto the mount of Olives."

Now, as it was with the Lord, so it is to be with his disciples. "For our citizenship is in heaven," says the apostle. Herein is the saying of Lady Powerscourt true, "The Christian is not one who looks up from earth to heaven, but one who looks down from heaven to earth." A celestial nativity implies a celestial residence; and with a certain divine condescension may the Christian contemplate the world, self-seeking children of this present evil age and say, with his Lord, "Ye are from beneath; I am from above; ye are of this world; I am not of this world." Let us be admonished, however, that to say this truly and to live it really may subject us to the experience indicated by the apostle. "Therefore the world knoweth us not because it knew him not." There is a certain quaint beauty of the apology which an old Reformer made for the hard treatment which he and his friends received from the men of the world. "Why, brethren," he would say, "they do not understand court manners or the etiquette of heaven, never having been in that country from whence we come, therefore it is that our ways seem strange to them." Would that in the Christians of today celestial traits were so conspicuous as to occasion like remark. Perhaps it is because there are so few high saints in the church that there are so many low sinners outside the church, since the ungodly can never be powerfully lifted up except by a church that reaches down from an exalted spiritual plane.

What means that lofty address of the apostle, "Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling?" The reference is not merely to our final destiny as those who are to be called up to heaven, but to our present service as those who have come down from heaven—sons of God rejoicing in a celestial birth, bringing the air and manners of glory into a world that knows not God. As such we are exhorted to "consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus"—an apostle being one who comes forth from God, and an high priest one who goes in unto God. And Christ Jesus not only fulfils both these offices in himself, as he says, "I came forth from the Father and am come into the world; again I leave the world and go to the Father," but he makes us partakers with him of the same heavenly calling, sending us into the world, as the Father hath sent him, and permitting us to enter into the holiest of all by the blood of Jesus, as he has entered in by his own blood.

Confessing that our citizenship is in heaven, it should be easily determined what our conduct and bearing towards the world must be. One is expected to pay taxes and make investments where he holds residence. Therefore earthly possessions for the church all calls to bountiful giving, and all demands for right self-denial, are to be esteemed as reasonable assessments, not as gratuities. Christianity is no paradox, in which believers are required to do peculiar things for the sake of being peculiar, and to exhibit startling contradictions for the sake of arousing the contradiction of sinners against them. When we are called to lay up treasures in heaven, it is because that is our country: when we are enjoined not to love the world, neither the things that are in the world, it is because this is not our country. Two practical errors spring from an earthly theology, viz., that the world is the Christian's home, and the grave the Christian's hope. On the contrary, one possessed of clear advent faith would choose for himself such an epitaph as that which Dean Alford composed for his tomb, "The inn of a traveller on his way to Jerusalem." Ah, yes, that is it! A pilgrim's portion, food and raiment and contentment therewith; the mansion which fortune has provided, or the cabin which penury has reared, each alike counted a hospice where one lodges as "a pilgrim and a stranger in the earth;" and the grave a narrow inn whose windows look towards the sunrising, where the sojourner sleeps till break of day—this, without question, is the ideal of the Christian life as outlined in the gospel.

An impracticable ideal! it will be said. But it was not so in the beginning. To say nothing of apostolic Christianity, let us ask what it was that gave the Christianity of the first two centuries such extraordinary vigor in its conflict with heathenism. An eminent writer, Gerhard Uhlhorn, has shown with graphic hand that it was just this quality of absolute unworldliness which constituted the secret of its power. The men who conquered the Roman Empire for Christ bore the aspect of invaders from another world who absolutely refused to be naturalized to this world. Their conduct filled their heathen neighbors with the strangest perplexity—they were so careless of life, so careful of conscience, so prodigal of their own blood, so confident of the overcoming power of the blood of the Lamb, so unsubdued to the customs of the country in which they sojourned, so mindful of the manners of "that country from whence they came out." The help of the world, the patronage of its rulers, the loan of its resources, the use of its methods, they utterly refused, lest employing these they might compromise their king. An invading army maintained from an invisible base and placing more confidence in the leadership of an unseen commander than in all imperial help that might be proffered—this was what so bewildered and angered the heathen, who often desired to make friends with the Christians, without abandoning their own gods. But there can be no reasonable doubt that this age, in which the church was most completely separated from the world, was the age in which Christianity was most victorious in the world.

This was also the era of undimmed hope of the Lord's imminent return from glory, so that it illustrated and enforced both clauses of the great text: "For our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus."

Our Lord set forth his departure from the world under the parable of "a certain nobleman who went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." As a Roman, living in Judea, on appointment to the governorship of that province, would go to Rome to be invested with office and then return to rule; so Christ has gone to heaven to be invested with the kingship of the world, and now he and his watchful servants are eagerly waiting for the same thing, he sitting at God's right hand "expecting till his enemies be made his footstool," and they expecting till he shall return to reign over the earth. Of the kingdom, king and kinsmen of the king, the same avowal of unearthly origin is made by Christ. "My kingdom is not of this world." "They are not of the world as I am not of the world." The kingdom is the "kingdom of God," the "kingdom of heaven;" its constituency are those who are "begotten of God," and "born from above." True, this kingdom is now in the world in its rudiments and principles; in its citizens and representatives, those who like their Lord have been sent hither to accomplish the work of gathering out a people for his name. But lest we fall into fatal error, let us not imagine that we are now reigning with Christ on the earth, or that the kingdom of God has been set up in the world. The Church's earthly career during the present age is the exact facsimile of her Lord's; a career of exile rather than of exaltation; of rejection rather than of rule; of cross-bearing rather than of accepted sceptre. Grasping at earthly sovereignty for the church while the Sovereign himself is still absent has proved, as we shall show hereafter, the most fruitful root of apostasy. It may be said that this picture of the church, as despised and rejected in the world, suffering, outcast, and in exile, does not correspond to the facts. Not to the facts of our own generation, we admit, wherein the world is on such excellent terms with Christians. But that it represents the character of the dispensation as a whole cannot be questioned, when we recall the dark ages and martyr ages of the Christian era; the prisons and racks and dungeons and stakes which stretch on through so large a portion of this age. And the pictures of prophecy are composite pictures, gathering up the main features of the entire dispensation and presenting them in one. Viewed thus, prediction and history perfectly accord.

"The kingdom is now here in mystery, and to be here hereafter in manifestation," one has tersely put it. And to this the predicted destiny of believers corresponds. "Your life is hid with Christ in God; when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory. "Sons of God, therefore, the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not." "The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the Sons of God." "If we suffer, we shall reign with him." Obscurity, rejection, exile and trial in the world now; manifestation, vindication, enthronement when the king comes—this is the foretold calling of the children of the kingdom. The unprecedented exemption of the church from persecution, and the extraordinary triumphs of the gospel which have characterized this nineteenth century, may tend to seduce us into the notion that the kingdom has already come, though the nobleman who had gone into a far country has not yet returned. That we may think truly on this subject, let us hear our Lord's voice, saying, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Instead of the widespread conquests of the gospel the Church is still "a little flock," amid the vast populations of Pagans, Mohammedans, Infidels and Apostates. This flock in every age has been branded with the cross, and torn by persecution and beaten by hireling shepherds, and the end is not yet; for as good Samuel Rutherford says, "So long as any portion of Christ's mystical body is out of heaven, Satan will strike at it." However favored in our times this flock is not the kingdom: but it has the promise of the kingdom, in which rejection shall give place to rule, and crucifixion to coronation. When? "And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away."—Editor of Watchword.

THE DEATH-BED.

You may never have a death-bed; but imagine yourself on a death-bed now. If you were, indeed, stretched on the bed from which you should arise no more, how would all your little frivolities, all your vices, and spites, and enmities, and hatreds, and worldly schemes seem to you then? Would they not shrivel into insignificance? Would they not seem to you small, poverty-stricken, base, as well as evil? What alchemy has death to transmute these into things of eternal value? Two children are sent into the field to glean among the reapers. The one comes home laden with the ripe golden ears, happy with the results of toil and the sense of duty done; the other has played, and idled, and chased butterflies all through the long summer day, and comes back, sick and ashamed and fretful and afraid, with nothing in its hand but a few acrid, flaccid, poisonous, withered poppies faded from scarlet into livid bleakness, which have poisoned its blood and stained its hands, and are only fit to fling away as hateful, not only valueless but vile.

Which child will your life resemble? I am speaking to some of the young. "Rejoice, oh, young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth." I believe the advice was given seriously, not cynically, and in a world "wrapped round with sweet air, and full of sunshine, and abounding with knowledge," if you keep innocence you will find much happiness. Only "remember;" remember that the vernal hues of life's sunshine gleam on the solemn and awful background of the eternal realities. Ah, try now to look at the world and its allurements as they will seem in the last hour; to look at unlawful pleasure as it shall then seem, not only a disappointing, but a depraving and an unvenomed thing; to look at the small aims of ambition as they shall seem when they have dwindled into their true pettiness. "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth, for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."—F. W. Farrar.

THE NEW HEAVENS AND NEW EARTH: REMARKS ON 2 Pet. iii. 13. No. 1.

"But, according to his promise, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

In regard to this prophecy there is something very difficult. Peter speaks of Paul having said some things hard to be understood; but this passage of Peter's seems as hard, or almost as hard, as any thing uttered by Paul. This passage has given rise to a great variety of views, and as we think, to some that are very erroneous, and that have no foundation for their support. But it must be evident to the unprejudiced mind, considering that the Holy Spirit cannot contradict himself, and that there must be unity in all his teachings, that if Peter is made to teach what is not in accord with other inspired penmen, Peter must be misunderstood. The meaning of Peter's language, therefore, should be sought by carefully comparing it with other Scripture language referring to the same subject.

Now Peter, after referring to the dissolving of the elements, says, "But according to his promise, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." Here he has his eye on the prophecy of Isaiah, chap. lxv. 17: "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former things shall not be remembered, nor come into mind."

Isaiah's "new heavens and a new earth," and Peter's "new heavens and a new earth," the latter writer quoting the promise of the former, can only be realized in a partial fulfilment in the Millennial age. If otherwise interpreted, the interpretation will not accord with other statements of the word.

When this promise is fully realized, when there are "new heavens and a new earth," in the sense of the phrase intended by the prophet and by the apostle, "death shall be no more;" but in the Millennial state there will be death; not, indeed, often, as far as we can gather from the Word; but the state will not be entirely free from death.

We have very exulting language used in the 98th Psalm, where there is evident allusions to the restored, renovated earth in the Millennium. But the phrase in verse 11, "let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof," is not consistent with the new earth state of Rev. xxi., where it is said distinctly, "And the sea is no more." This would lead us to infer that there is a renovation of the earth during the Millennium, which brings it, to a great extent, to what it was before the fall; but that which is meant by the new earth, properly so-called, is a renovation by fire after the thousand years' reign, including the removal of every evil. Those who hold to a fulfilment of the promise during the Millennial age, answer this by affirming that sea is used "to denote the agitation, unsettled condition, revolutionary tendencies, anarchy, warlike and turbulent commotions of nations." But this explanation, if applicable here, would prove too much; for it would teach us that as there is sea in the Millennial age, these terrible evils will exist in that age, a thought that cannot for a moment be entertained.

Numbers of writers insist that the word sea is used for peoples, multitudes, nations in agitation, revolution, etc., and even Dr. Kurtz, by the sea being no more, concludes that the sea shall disappear from the face of the renewed earth, in the sense of the heathen ceasing to rage. But if in the one passage heaven, and earth, and sea are mentioned, as in Rev. xxi. 1, and by heaven we understand heaven, and by earth we understand earth, by what law of language have we the right to understand sea to mean any thing else than sea? The three words all occur in the same connection, and there is absolutely nothing to show that one of the words is used not in its natural sense, as the other two are, but as a symbol of something else.

In the prophetic descriptions of the Millennium, there seems to be a return, to a considerable extent, to the Edenic state. Excepting that death, as the result of occasional and personal transgression, will continue to exist, every thing that came upon man and upon the earth through the fall, seems to be removed; the earth is fruitful, beautiful, peaceful, is, indeed, delivered to a large extent from its bondage. Now is the earth, thus far restored, to be subject, after the thousand years' prosperity and blessedness, to a conflagration as apparently described by Peter, whatever may be intended by it, or whatever may be its extent?

Or is this conflagration, as some believe, at the beginning of the day of the Lord,—the commencement of the thousand years? In the restoration, as set forth in the prophetic writings, what is really meant by the new heavens and a new earth? And is any thing more indicated, though the language may be very strong, by Peter's conflagration, that what is indicated by the flaming fire, and burning as a furnace of other passages, indicating temporal judgments on the wicked introductory to the Millennial kingdom? These are questions which naturally spring up in considering this subject, and the mind will not be satisfied unless these difficulties are at least, to some extent, solved. In endeavoring to solve them, we offer the following remarks:—We think it is certain that the conflagration to which the apostle refers, will take place at the end of the thousand years, because he associates it with the judgment and destruction of ungodly men. "But the heavens that now are, and the earth, by the same word have been stored up for fire, (or, stored with fire, as in the margin) being reserved against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men," Ver. 7. As the day of judgment, in an important sense, will continue through the Millennium, we think the apostle refers to the destruction of the ungodly at the end of that day; that is, at the great white throne judgment. His words in the second chapter confirm this view. "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to keep the unrighteous under punishment unto the day of judgment," Ver. 9. The unrighteous are kept under restraint, kept in custody, or reserved unto the judgment day; "actually in a penal state, and thus awaiting their final punishment;" just as some of the angels, when they sinned, were cast into dungeons, or into tartarus, to be reserved unto judgment. For this final judgment, the wicked dead are not raised until the end of the thousand years.

And further, we do not think the conflagration Peter refers to will be so general, and perhaps not altogether of the same nature, as some writers have thought. Instead of the phrase, burned up, it is stated in the margin of the Revised Version that "the most ancient manuscripts read discovered;" whatever may be meant by that word in this peculiar connection. Still, we believe that more is implied in this conflagration than what is indicated by the burning at the beginning of the day of the Lord, for part, at least, of the judgment then will be temporal judgment,—the destruction of living and incorrigible enemies; and such, we conceive, will be raised from the dead at the end of the thousand years for final judgment and the punishment of the second death.

Once more; we believe the state of things intended to be set forth by the new heavens and a new earth, will be a far more advanced and perfect state than that which is generally set forth as the restoration by the prophets. This will appear more clear as we proceed.

The Sabbath and the New Earth.

Before me is a borrowed book entitled "The history of the Sabbath and First day of the week, by J. W. Andrews." The volume shows diligent and patient research, and appears to have been written in a spirit of candor. In the concluding pages the author says, "The Sabbath was ordained to commemorate the creation of the heavens and the earth. The importance of the Sabbath as the memorial of creation is that it keeps ever present the true reason why worship is due to God. For the worship of God is based upon the fact that he is the creator and that all other beings were created of him. The Sabbath therefore lies at the very foundation of divine worship, for it teaches this great truth in the most impressive manner, and no other institution does this." He brings out this thought to his satisfaction, and then says, "This great truth, (that God is the Creator) is therefore worthy to be remembered even in the glorified state. And we shall presently learn that what God gave to man in Paradise, to keep this great truth before his mind, shall be honored by him in Paradise restored. The future is given to us in the prophetic Scriptures. From them we learn that our earth is reserved unto fire, and that from its ashes shall spring new heavens and earth, and ages of endless date. Over this glorified inheritance, the second Adam, the Lord of the Sabbath, shall bear rule, and render his gracious protection; the nations of them which are saved shall inherit the land forever. When the glory of the Lord shall thus fill the earth as the waters that cover the sea, the Sabbath of the Most High is again and for the last time brought to view. For as the new heavens and the new earth which I will make shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain. And it shall come to pass that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord," Is. lxvi. 22, 23.

1. Why should it be deemed necessary in order to restore "Paradise," to reduce the earth to "ashes" and then out of the ashes create new heavens and a new earth? Paradise occupied but a small portion of the surface of the earth. There is no evidence that the land included in it was destroyed. It was a garden of fruit trees planted by the Creator. To replant these trees on the old site would be to restore Paradise. That would be a literal restoration. The creation of a new earth is not a restoration of Paradise. The creation of the present earth was not the planting of Paradise. The garden was planted after the earth was created. See the account Gen. ii. 4–8.

2. The burning of the earth down to "ashes" by a fire dissolving the heavens would render the succession of days impossible and so abolish the Sabbath.

Does our author suppose that the destruction which he looks for will be instantaneous? And the resurrection instantaneous? It would take time for even so great a fire to destroy the structure of the earth and then go out leaving the ashes. And of course it would take time to recreate the heavens and earth. While this wonderful work of destruction and reconstruction is going on what will there be to mark the beginning and ending of the days so that the "nations of the saved" can keep the Sabbath; and keep it in memory of the old creation now being dissolved and superseded?

The evening and the morning were the first day; the second day, and so on. How can there be evenings and mornings marking the beginning and the ending of days during the demolition of the heavens and the earth?

3. The prophet says, "Behold I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind." Mr. Andrews understands the prophet to use the terms "heavens and earth" in the literal sense, and think that the new heavens and earth are to be produced out of the ashes of the old earth. Suppose that is so: then what follows? When the new earth is created the former creation is not to be remembered. Then the memorial of the former creation is not to be observed.

Then if a Sabbath is to be observed in the new earth as a memorial of creation it must be a memorial of the new creation; and if that Sabbath is a seventh day the Creator must occupy six days in the new creation work and rest upon the seventh day from the beginning of the new creation work, and bless and sanctify the seventh day, that is create a new Sabbath, and enact a new Sabbath law. If he takes six days in effecting the new creation will he create the second, or new, Adam on the sixth day? That cannot be for he has already produced the second Adam, and is now forming the wife of the new man, namely, the church. And he is the "beginning of the creation of God;" of course he is the beginning of the new creation. These things make it evident that God will not occupy six days in a literal re-creation of the earth. If such a creation is to be the saints will be raised from the dead before it commences. How then can there be a Sabbath in the new earth memorializing its creation? As long as the present Sabbath is observed the present earth must remain. If it is to be observed in the restitution the constitution must take place in the present earth. It is possible that Isaiah uses the terms heavens and earth in a symbolic sense representing the kingdom of God under its new constitution.

One thought more. When "all flesh" from month to month and from Sabbath to Sabbath appear before Jehovah to worship him in the restitution, they go forth and look upon the "carcasses" of the transgressors. How can those carcasses be preserved through a fire that burns the earth down to ashes, and through the process of the new creation, so as to be visible to the immortal inhabitant of the new earth? And as there is to be no curse in the new earth why should carcasses of transgressors be found there? If this earth is to be burnt up and reduced to ashes it is because of sin; and the object of its destruction is the destruction of sinners. Their carcasses then will not be reproduced to be an object of loathing to the dwellers in the new earth. All of which makes it probable that the new heavens and new earth represent a new state of things on this earth—"the restitution." Mr. Andrews had better study his lesson more.

Notice of the General Conference.

Philadelphia having been chosen by the voice of the Church as the place, and November 16th named as the time for the holding of the General Conference of the Church of God, and of other churches in sympathy with the general doctrines taught in that Church, notice is now given that the General Conference will convene at 3 o'clock p. m., November 16th at the Blessed Hope Mission, corner of 12th and Dickinson streets, Philadelphia, and continue in session, if found necessary for a period of ten days from that date. The business questions embraced in the call made for this Conference and such other questions as the delegates may themselves decide to consider, will be brought up and decided upon by the regularly appointed delegates from the several churches, who shall cast the votes of the churches they represent in deciding these questions. It is proposed to have devotional and religious meetings carried on simultaneously with the business meetings, and to these, all preaching brethren and all brethren and sisters who can come are cordially invited to be present, and all who come will be provided and cared for during the sessions of the conference. It is hoped that all who can come will do so. Each delegate and each preacher or evangelist regularly appointed, and serving one or more churches, who may attend, will receive from the Phila. Church a contribution to make up any deficiency up to, but not exceeding, $20.00 in the amount supplied him from other sources toward his traveling expenses. Any regularly organized church may send one delegate and any group of churches may unite and send one delegate. Any State or local conference of churches may also be represented by a delegate. The following are offered as suggestions to delegates:

1st. A delegate may be appointed at any time before conference meets.

2nd. Let each delegate bring with him official notice of his having been appointed by the church he represents; such notice to be signed by some officer other than himself.

3rd. Let each delegate get together statistics as to membership and officers of the church he represents and of any neighboring church not represented, giving names, etc., of each, for purpose of record.

4th. Let each intending visitor, whether a delegate or not, send his name and address to Elder C. C. Ransay, 1002 Mount Vernon Street, Phila. who will thus be able to provide accommodations for him.

5th. If any delegate or visitor cannot come for the entire time, he will probably accomplish the most by coming at the latter end of the conference. For the Churches at Phila.

C. C. RANSAY.
GEO. F. WORK.

P. S. In order that no delegate may be prevented by lack of means from attending this Conference, the church at Philadelphia, while not intending to bear all of a delegates expenses, recognize that the expenses of delegates coming from the far west will be greater than the others, and offer to increase the contribution to such delegates, but to delegates only, who attend from points west of the central line of the State of Illinois, to an amount not exceeding $50.00 per delegate in all, to each one, to be paid to the delegate at the close of the Conference. G. F. W.

Dear Restitutionist:

Enclosed please find my renewal of subscription. I sincerely wish you future success, as I regard THE RESTITUTION as the only paper which advocates the truth, or more of truth, than any other paper in our broad land. I am looking for the King of the coming kingdom, in the renewed earth. I am glad that the people of God are being called together in the proposed conference at Philadelphia; it seems like the invitation in the inspired word, "gather yourselves together unto him." And may the Comforter fill the hearts of all with joy in the bridegroom. "Our hands are clean, having been washed, together with our whole body in the blood of Christ. He hath clothed us with his righteousness, and our heart panteth for him as the hart panteth after the waterbrooks." If in the Lord's will, I hope to meet you at the coming conference, and my prayer is that we may meet with Jesus there. Resting in him I wait with all that love his appearing until he comes. Your brother in Christ. J. O. BARNABY.
